It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

v. 12

Senator O'CONNOR.—Under ordinary circumstances, it can make no difference. Only when there is an extraordinary drought or other conditions which shorten local production will any increase in the price be caused. The only effect of the duty is to preserve the market for the local producer, and protect him from the occasional shipments of special lines which come in and disturb prices. The duty makes the market steady, and enables the local producer to invest with the certainty of a return.

Senator O'KEEFE. — The duty only operates when the public are hard up.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Not when the public are hard up, but when for some reason or other the supply runs short. It is better to have continuous protection which will operate permanently, and will not damage the consumer, than, in a condition of panic, to make an alteration which will apply during years and years of good production, merely for the sake of obtaining something cheaper in an occasional period of scarcity. It would be most unfortunate for Australian industries, and for the future of the Commonwealth, if we were to be guided by the exceptional circumstances of the present season, and refuse the reasonable amount of protection now proposed.

Senator EWING.—In all the other States for years 2d. was the maximum duty.

Senator O'CONNOR.—For some years in New South Wales the duty was, I think, 2d.; but in Queensland the duty was 3d., South Australia 4d., and in Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia 2d. The average duty was about 3d., putting aside New South Wales, in which State latterly there was free-trade. Where the duty was imposed for revenue purposes it was not more than 2d., but what is now proposed is both a revenue and protective duty.

Senator EWING.—Was not the duty in Victoria protective?

Senator O'CONNOR.—At 2d. it certainly was not. Was the duty of 2d. in Western Australia protective?

Senator EWING.—Undoubtedly it was intended to be.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The duty of 2d. was imposed for about twenty years in New South Wales, for the sole purpose of raising revenue. If we are imposing these duties simply from the point of view of revenue, let us fix them at such rates as are necessary for that purpose. Do not let us delude the public with the belief that we are preserving existing industries, when we are imposing merely revenue duties, and leaving the industries to be hampered and endangered by importations. There is, perhaps, no industry which affects to a larger extent the people of the country than that of pig raising and ham curing. It is an industry which is not carried on in great establishments, but as a general rule by small farmers and their families all over Australia. There is hardly a farming community which, under conditions at all suitable, does not make the industry a means of income. This is a question which ought to receive our most careful consideration. We ought not to propose a duty which is entirely insufficient for protective purposes, simply because an occasion has arisen which may give rise to a wish for the cheapening of the product.

Senator EWING.—A duty of 2d. is about 40 per cent.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do not care whether a duty of 2d. amounts to 40 per cent. or 50 per cent.; it is insufficient.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—It was found ample in Victoria.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I should like some proof of that.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—The honorable senator has only to go to the westward in order to see the results.

Senator O'CONNOR. — The duty was 4d. in South Australia and 3d. in Queensland, and I know that it is necessary to have the duty placed at such a figure as will result in both revenue and protection.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales). — This question was considered very fully by the Senate, and the conclusion was arrived at that a duty of 2d. was quite sufficient. Senator O'Connor proposes that bacon, which is worth about 4d. per lb., shall, along with York hams, which are worth 1s. or 1s. 2d. a lb., pay a duty of 3d.

Senator O'CONNOR.—As a matter of fact, from a duty of 3d., there will be £6,000 collected.

Senator Major GOULD.—If we place the duty at 2d., which was the rate in Victoria, where the people professed to have a scientific system of protection, we shall be meeting our protectionist friends as far as they can expect to be met. The honorable and learned gentleman says that the present time of scarcity is exceptional, and therefore it is severely felt. A time of scarcity is a time when the duties on articles of food should be decreased instead of increased. It reminds me of the old story of a man who has an article which he sees a chance to sell profitably. He does not care how many persons may be victimized so long as he is able to put a few shillings into his own pocket. The States are supposed to be federated for the purpose of helping one another. I submit that a duty of 2d. per lb. is more than ample for the purpose of both protection and revenue. I hope that the committee will reflect very carefully before it imposes heavy duties on articles which constitute the food of mankind.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—This afternoon Senator O'Connor on behalf of the Government and the other House, asked the Committee to place a duty of 1½d. per lb. on articles of luxury, such as game and poultry. And now he insists that we shall place exactly double that rate of duty on such common articles of daily consumption as hams and bacon. It does not seem to me that there is the smallest effort towards consistency between the two proposals. If boned pheasant, tinned peacock, preserved grouse, and other luxuries are to come in at a duty of 1½d. per lb. under the aegis of Senator O'Connor, how can he reconcile it with his conscience—how dare he attempt to fold his eyes in slumber to-night when he knows that he has been insisting upon the imposition of a duty of 3d. per lb. on ham and bacon. Is there any consistency of idea or principle there? I hope that he will not press his motion, because he admits that it is really a tax to operate only when people are "hard up." It is not to apply when people are well off. The tax-gatherer is only to come round when the poor taxpayer has not the wherewithal to meet the ordinary needs of life. That would not apply to all the luxuries which come in at a duty of 1½d. per lb. These are cooked and prepared for the table in the majority of cases, and in regard to which there is nothing like the same loss of weight as there is in the cooking of bacon. It should be remembered by honorable senators that the tax on bacon is increased very greatly by reason of the reduction in weight in the process of cooking. With every desire to conciliate honorable members in another place, I must press the request for a reduction of the duty in this case.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — The senators for New South Wales seem to have come here to help that State at the expense of Queensland, in which farmers depend very largely on hams and bacon for a considerable portion of their monthly income. They are able to do well in the industry in districts which are not affected by the drought. Farmers who five years ago used to live in the poorest way are now doing fairly well owing to the operation of the State tariff, and owing, I suppose, to the prospect of a similar tariff being adopted by the Commonwealth.

Senator CLEMONS.—Are they not up to the level of the Victorian farmers?

Senator HIGGS.—They are up to the level of any of the farmers in the Commonwealth.

Senator CLEMONS. — Victorian farmers have done with a duty of 2d. per lb.

Senator EWING.—And the Canadian does with a duty of 1d. per lb.

Senator HIGGS.—The "Pineapple" brand of Queensland hams and bacon is the best brand to be found in the Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE. —Hutton and Company cannot keep their orders filled.

Senator HIGGS. — The senators for New South Wales should show some consideration for the farmers in the northern State. What is the good of the honorable senators going round and seeking trouble? They are simply trading the senatorial coat before the other House. They will trip up the whole community by delaying the completion of the Tariff, as they apparently intend to do. Time after time, they have argued that the duty on an article was of no importance, because we produced enough to supply our own requirements. If the duty on these articles is of no service to the producers, its protectionist incidence disappears, and it becomes merely a revenue duty. Surely those gentlemen who want a York ham ought to be willing to pay a duty of 3d. per lb. The free-traders in this Chamber seem to have no regard for the interests of the farmers in the Commonwealth. Although the whole of the commercial community desire the Tariff to be settled in some way or other, these honorable senators are delaying its completion on account of a duty which they say has no protectionist incidence. I seriously urge honorable senators not to kick up a row about nothing—to take up a stand in relation to those items on which they feel strongly, and not to deal with trivial matters. If a compromise is offered by another place, and the Minister in charge of the Bill moves its acceptance, it shall have my support whether it is in the interests of free-trade or in the interests of protection, because I am anxious to get to the end of this long-drawn-out session, which is wearying us all, and will drive some of us to an early political grave.

Question—That the request be not pressed—put. The committee divided.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 26 August, 1902.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Mr. DEAKIN laid on the table the following papers:—

Report of Commissioner appointed to inquire into the foreign labour contract question in Western Australia.

Ordered to be printed.

Correspondence with the Premier of New South Wales with regard to the Federal Electoral Bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN seems to be a general desire on the part of the honorable members to know what remains to be done before the close of the session. I understood from the information previously supplied to us that no new business except the Estimates was to be introduced, and that the Judiciary Bill and the High Court Procedure Bill were to be pressed this session. It is desirable that we should have some definite idea as to what remains to be done in order that we may make our arrangements for some time ahead. We recognise, of course, that the business will depend to some extent on the work done in another Chamber. Independently of that, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister to give us some assurance regarding the actual work expected of us.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall be very glad to endeavour to make an authoritative statement after the next Cabinet meeting. As far as I know no measure of importance is to be introduced except those in the business-paper. The measures proceeded with during this session are one or two purely mechanical amendments of a few clauses, chiefly relating to the Treasurer's Budget, with which we have no honorable members to deal.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Will you be asked to consider the Judiciary Bill?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have had some conversation with the honorable members canvassed twice with a view to ascertain their feeling, and on both occasions they have received the assurance that they were not prepared to pass the Judiciary Bill, or without very prolonged debate. I deeply regret having to consent to the postponement of that measure, but unfortunately, it may be necessary. I will make an authoritative statement after the next Cabinet meeting. The Loan Bill is one of the measures that will depend on the Budget, and it is impossible just now to say whether this and one or two other measures will be proceeded with.

BUDGET.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I desire to know whether it will be possible for the Treasurer to deliver his Budget speech in the next month, instead of holding it in the first week of October?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I know where the honorable member idea that I intended to defer the delivery of the Budget until October.

Mr. McDONALD.—The statement was made in the press.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Then it is incorrect. The Budget statement will be made as soon as possible—I hope not later than the middle of September.

Mr. WATSON.—We ought to get rid of a few of the civil servants if they are incapable of preparing the Estimates of three departments before that time.

FEDERAL CAPITAL SITE.

Mr. THOMSON.—I wish to know from the Minister for Home Affairs when the further action promised in connexion with the selection of the site of the federal capital will be taken. I desire also to know whether his attention has been given to the fact that the considerable expenditure incurred in connexion with the visits of inspection to the proposed sites by honorable members may prove futile if the selection of the site is not made by this Parliament?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The matter will be discussed at the next meeting of the Cabinet, or the one following. I quite recognise that unless further action is taken, and a further report is obtained during recess, so that the site may be selected by this Parliament, a great deal of money already expended will have been wasted.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN MILITARY FORCES.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I desire to know whether the Acting Minister for Defence is prepared to lay on the table the report furnished to him with reference to the appointment of ten additional drill instructors for the military forces of South Australia?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think I have the report with me, and I shall lay it upon the table a little later on.

Mr. POYNTON.—I wish to direct the attention of the Acting Minister for Defence to a telegram from Adelaide which appeared in to-day's newspapers, and which reads as follows:—

The local military forces expected that under federation their pay would be increased so as to bring it up to that in the other States; but instead, a general order just issued announces that "special pay" will be stopped. Hitherto the men received special pay for guards of honour and other special duties, the buglers and band men for practising, and non-coms. for giving instructions outside their own company, and officers for various duties. Under the new regulations a captain who subscribes to the military club will be about 10s. better off than a private, and a lieutenant will be £1 worse.

I wish also to direct his attention to the scale of pay of officers and men of the South Australian forces which, I understand, is by this regulation reduced by one-third. A private in the South Australian defence forces receives £5 per annum as against £7 10s. paid to privates in the Victorian defence force. A corporal receives £5 5s., as against £10 in Victoria, a sergeant £5 10s. compared with £11 5s., a lieutenant £6 against £15, a captain £7 10s. as against £22 10s., a major £10 contrasted with £30, and a lieutenant-colonel £15. I have not been able to ascertain the Victorian rate of pay for the last-mentioned grade of officer. The horse allowance in South Australia is £4 per annum, whereas in Victoria it is understood to be £30 per annum. In view of these facts, I ask the Minister whether he considers it fair to reduce the rate of pay of the South Australian forces by one-third.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is rather unfair to expect me to answer without notice a question such as the honorable member has submitted. I presume that the present rates of pay in South Australia are the same as prevailed before the defence forces were taken over by the Commonwealth Government. The rates paid in South Australia were lower than those in force in either Victoria or New South Wales, and I think also below those paid in Queensland. If the honorable member will give notice of his question as to the regulation, I shall be glad to furnish him with an answer as soon as possible.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is the Minister quite unaware of the fact that the pay for special duties hitherto given to the military forces of South Australia by the State Government, has been disallowed by the Commonwealth authorities?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I presume that the honorable member's question refers to the regulation mentioned by the honorable member for South Australia (Mr. Poynton). I cannot be expected to keep every detail in my mind.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This is hardly a detail.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it is, considering the thousands of questions and the number of regulations which are placed before me. I will give the honorable member the information desired as soon as possible.

Mr. GLYNN.—Can the Treasurer inform us whether, when military officers are transferred from one State to another—as in the case of the drill instructors recently appointed for the South Australian military forces—the expenditure involved is treated as new expenditure, or is debited to the State to which the officers are sent?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That matter has not been brought under my notice for decision, but if the honorable member gives notice of his question I shall have it looked into.

PEARL-SHELLING INDUSTRY.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the Government are prepared to be guided by Judge Dashwood's report on the pearl-shelling industry, and if the exemptions already granted with regard to the employment of coloured crews and divers will be made permanent, so that an industry which now yields £25,000 per annum to the State revenue may be preserved?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Although I have found time to read the report of Judge Dashwood, I have not been able to look at the evidence on which it is based. Several of my colleagues are in the same position. When the members of the Ministry have had an opportunity of considering the reports of Judge Dashwood and Mr. Warton, and the evidence upon which they are based, I shall be prepared to make a statement to the House.

Mr. McDONALD.—Has the attention of the Acting Prime Minister been drawn to a statement which appeared in the Argus a few days ago regarding the report of Judge Dashwood, and is it the intention of the Government to issue any more permits?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The statement made in the Argus had reference to the concessions granted by the Prime Minister, Sir Edmund Barton, when the whole matter of the pearl-shelling industry was referred to Judge Dashwood and to Mr. Warton. An exemption was given for three months, and this expired about six weeks ago. Since then those exemptions have not been granted, nor is it proposed to grant more.

RE-IMPORTATIONS OF WHEAT.

Mr. BROWN.—I desire to ask whether the Minister for Trade and Customs proposes to charge duty upon Australian wheat exported and afterwards re-introduced into the Commonwealth?

Mr. KINGSTON.—There is a provision in the Customs Act which permits Australian produce to be re-introduced free of duty, subject to two conditions. I think these are, first, that an export entry shall have been passed, and second, that the produce shall be re-introduced within two years of the date of export.

NEW MILITARY APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I wish to ask the Acting Minister for Defence whether his attention has been directed to the following statement which appeared in to-day's Age :—

The work of creating new billets for military men under the Commonwealth Government must have been going forward at a merry pace during the past few months. There are already more than 300 officers—commissioned and non-commissioned—on the salaries and wages list.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did read that statement, and I was very much surprised that an article containing so many inaccuracies should have been published in the Age. The statement that the work of creating new billets has been going forward at a merry pace in the Defence department is entirely incorrect. There have been no new billets created in the sense that the number of permanently employed officers and non-commissioned officers has been increased beyond the number existing at the time the departments were taken over by the Commonwealth. The contrary is the fact. Instead of the permanent appointments being increased, they are being considerably decreased. The number of commissioned officers, even when the General and his staff are included, will be at least 15 less than the number which existed last year. With the retirements now made it is actually 31 less at the present moment. The number of warrant officers—instructors—will be 48 less. The total number of permanently employed commissioned officers provided for last year was 132, and of warrant officers, permanent instructors, 253. The numbers being provided for this year are—officers 117, instructors 205. There are sixteen vacancies at present, and some of these may be filled and some may not. In the naval forces the officers have also been reduced in number, the services of seven permanently employed officers having been terminated.

PACIFIC ISLANDS LABOURERS ACT.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I wish to know if the Acting Prime Minister can inform us whether any correspondence has passed between the Federal Government and the Imperial Government relative to the petition to the Throne from certain kanakas in Queensland, and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay the correspondence upon the table?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not remember any correspondence. The only reference I have seen to the petition was contained in a cablegram published in the press last week. I shall, however, assure myself on the point to-morrow.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSE, SYDNEY.

Mr. SALMON.—I desire to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has obtained copies of the correspondence which has passed between the New South Wales Government and the Secretary of State for the Colonies with regard to the occupation of Government-house, Sydney, by His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. I will hand it to the honorable member presently.

CLOSING OF POST-OFFICES.

Mr. MAHON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Have any official post-offices in Western Australia been disestablished since the department passed to the Commonwealth; if so, will he name the offices?

2. How many official post-offices in other States have been abolished during the same period?

3. What is the annual saving thereby effected in each State respectively?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes, foreclosed; namely, Bannister, Diorite, King, Londonderry, and Tambourah. The following have been reduced to the status of non-official offices: Bambo Creek, Black Flag, Cuddingwarra, Gullewa, Kurnalpi, Shark's Bay, Star of the East, and Warrawoona.

2. Seventeen.

3. New South Wales £1,656; Victoria £31; Queensland £1,264; South Australia nil; Western Australia £1,689; Tasmania £145.

SALARIES OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. TUDOR asked the Minister for Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. Whether he has received any additional information from the States of the Commonwealth relating to the salaries of officers in the general division of the public service in connexion with the return ordered by this House, on the 7th of February last, to be laid upon the table?

2. If not, will he take the necessary steps to obtain such information as soon as possible?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable member's question, I have to state—

The return will be tabled within the next few days.

PERMANENT MILITARY STAFF.

Mr. MAHON asked the Acting Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. What is the number of officers and non-commissioned officers on the permanent military staff of the Commonwealth?

2. How are these officers distributed amongst the several States, and what is the number of each rank in each State?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable member's questions, I beg to state—

1. The total number of officers and non-commissioned officers of the district head-quarters and instructional staff is 248.

2. Distributed amongst the several States as shown hereunder—

	Officers.	Warrant and Non-Commissioned Officers.
New South Wales	... 10	... 80
Victoria	... 10	... 47
Queensland	... 10	... 38
South Australia	... 5	... 12
Western Australia	... 3	... 14
Tasmania	... 5	... 14
Total	... 43	... 205

In addition to the foregoing, there are seven permanently employed sergeants-major returning from South Africa. By not filling vacancies, however, the total establishment of warrant and non-commissioned will be cut down to 205.

PUBLIC SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. HUME COOK asked the Acting Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Is it true that the Public Service Commissioner intends holding an examination, about December next, of candidates for the clerical division of the Commonwealth Public Service?

2. Is it not true that there are a number of permanent Commonwealth officers who have passed the State clerical examinations who have not yet been appointed to the clerical division?

3. Will those who passed the State clerical examinations take priority of appointment over any new men passing the commissioner's examination?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The following are the answers to the honorable member's questions :—

1. Yes ; if it is found on inquiry in the various States that this course is necessary.
2. Yes ; in the State of Victoria.
3. This has not yet been finally determined. If it is held that they carry their salary with them, it would obviously not be in the public interest to nominate them to vacancies in the junior positions, as they would then be receiving in most cases pay out of all proportion to the work they would be called upon to perform.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Attorney-General).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

I think that Acts of this nature exist in every Australian State, and although the measure before the House is drafted in accordance with the style adopted by the Crown Law department of the Commonwealth, it does not differ in substance in any particular from the statutes in operation in the various States. This measure has not been brought forward on account of the appointment of the Royal commission in connexion with the Drayton Grange, although that appointment called attention to the fact that while under the Letters Patent the Governor-General had the power to appoint Royal commissions, there was no means by which witnesses could be compelled to attend or the ordinary penalties could be imposed for perjury. Consequently it became necessary to introduce, at the earliest possible moment, a machinery measure which would allow of Royal commissions obtaining the evidence which may be necessary to enable them to report to the Governor-General upon any matters referred to them, and will insure that in such cases the inquiry may not be set at nought by the non-attendance of witnesses, by their refusal to answer questions, or by their failure to produce necessary documents. I do not think that any further explanation is necessary at this stage. Honorable members will see that there are only eight clauses in the Bill, and I shall be able upon each one to point to the precedents which exist in one or more of the States for the particular provisions which are here embodied.

Mr. CONROY.—In how many of the States does a similar law operate ?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. There is a somewhat similar Act in force in Canada, and the same end is attained—though by different means—in the mother country. There is no lack of precedents in this connexion. Every line of the measure is well buttressed by them, as can be shown upon further investigation.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I suppose there is no desire to proceed with this measure immediately ?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not if honorable members do not wish it.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I see no reason for delay if the Attorney-General desires to proceed with the Bill. There are one or two small matters to which attention might be drawn in committee, but it is scarcely worth while delaying the second reading of the Bill to point them out.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee :

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2—

Whenever the Governor-General, by letters patent under the great seal of the Commonwealth, issues a commission to any persons to make any inquiry, the president or chairman of the commission, or the sole commissioner, as the case may be, may, by writing under his hand, summon any person to attend the commission at a time and place named in the summons, and then and there to give evidence, and to produce any books, documents, or writings in his custody or control material to the subject matter of the inquiry.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—This clause does not apply to the Royal commission which is already in existence. If it were wanted in that connexion, it appears to me it would be necessary to constitute the commission afresh by the issue of letters patent. The provisions of the clause as drafted clearly have reference to the future, and cannot possibly be deemed to be retrospective.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I confess that the point raised by the honorable and learned member is open to some doubt. However, as I did not see the necessity for the provision applying to the commission already in existence, I allowed the clause to stand in its present form.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3—

Any of the commissioners may administer an oath to any person appearing as a witness before the commission, whether the witness has been summoned, or appears without being summoned, and may examine the witness upon oath.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—In some of the States the commissioners do not examine witnesses upon oath.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Provision is made in the next clause for allowing a witness to make an affirmation in lieu of taking an oath.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not understand the necessity for examining a witness upon oath. Of course the penalties attaching to perjury are equally applicable to any false declaration. It appears to me that the practice of examining a witness upon oath is a rather peculiar one. It is not the South Australian practice.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is the practice in vogue in New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Penalty for failing to attend or produce documents).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I would point out that this clause provides that if any person summoned to attend the commission fails to produce any documents or writings in his custody or control, which he was required by the summons to produce, he is liable to a penalty of £50. No provision is made by means of which a witness can claim privilege. This proposal really goes further than does either the common law procedure or the States Acts, which preserve to witnesses the right to refuse to produce documents which are privileged.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does not paragraph 2 of clause 7 cover that?

Mr. GLYNN.—Perhaps it does.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7—

2. Every witness summoned to attend or appearing before the commission shall have the same protection, and shall, in addition to the penalties provided by this Act, be subject to the same liabilities in any civil or criminal proceeding as a witness in any case tried in the High Court.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—It is somewhat doubtful whether the word "protection" does cover the question of privilege to which I have previously alluded.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Look at the words "reasonable excuse" which are contained in clause 5. Surely anything that constitutes "privilege" is a "reasonable excuse."

Mr. GLYNN.—Perhaps those words have the effect indicated.

Clause 8 agreed to.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSES AND EXECUTIVE COUNCIL: EXPENDITURE.

In Committee:

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Attorney-General).—I move—

That an expenditure upon Government-houses of £5,500 a year, and upon the Federal Executive Council of £1,925 a year, as submitted in the statement ordered to be printed on the 7th inst., is approved.

Mr. McDONALD.—I did not understand that we had gone into committee upon this motion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We carried a motion to that effect the other night.

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not remember any such motion having been moved, although I understood that we were to deal with this matter in committee.

The CHAIRMAN.—I would point out to the honorable member that the House has already determined that this committee shall consider to-day the motion before it.

Mr. McDONALD.—I really do not remember any such motion being submitted. I wished to raise a question of order, and I did not desire to take that course of action in committee.

The CHAIRMAN.—I would point out that on Thursday, the 21st instant, the following resolution, which was proposed by the Attorney-General, was agreed to:—

That the House on Tuesday resolve itself into a committee of the whole to consider the following motion:—"That an expenditure upon Government-house of £5,500 a year, and upon the Federal Executive Council of £1,925 a year, as submitted in the statement ordered to be printed on the 7th instant, is approved."

Mr. McDONALD.—I was under the impression that before the House went into committee the motion would have to be moved—"That the Speaker do now leave the chair."

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not under our standing orders.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is the procedure to which I have always been accustomed. The point of order which I desire to raise is one of sufficient importance to warrant its determination by Mr. Speaker.

Now, however, that object cannot be achieved unless I move that the committee dissent from the ruling of the Chairman, and request him to refer the point at issue to Mr. Speaker. I think that the Attorney-General will realize that the matter to which I intend to refer is one which should be dealt with in the House. Standing Order 125 reads:—

No question or amendment shall be proposed which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative.

I maintain that upon the 30th of April last a Bill was introduced to this House, in which substantially the same question as that under discussion was involved. That Bill provided that there should be granted to the Governor-General the sum of £8,000 annually for the upkeep of his establishment. The motion which is now under discussion contemplates making a similar provision, though the amount has been reduced to £5,500. When clause 2 of the Bill in question was under consideration upon the 2nd of May, an amendment was proposed—"That all the words after 'establishment' be omitted." The words which it was proposed to omit had reference to making an annual allowance of £8,000 to the Governor-General for the upkeep of the vice-regal establishment, and the question then put from the Chair was—"That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question." The committee decided that they should not stand part of the question and inserted in lieu of them a provision that £10,000 should be granted to the Governor-General to cover the extraordinary expenditure which he had incurred in connexion with the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. The committee distinctly refused to vote an annual sum of £8,000 for the upkeep of the Governor-General's establishment. I maintain that the motion now before the Chair is substantially the same proposal that was contained in the Bill which was considered in the month of May last. On page 264 of the tenth edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, I find it stated—

Nor can a motion be brought forward which is the same, in substance, as a question which, during the current session, has been decided in the affirmative or negative.

There have been cases in which attempts have been made to evade this rule by the alteration of the wording of a motion, but it has been repeatedly ruled in the House of Commons that a mere alteration of the wording of a motion cannot be permitted to enable it to evade the rule. Those decisions are referred to in May on page 288, where it is stated that—

A mere alteration of the words of a question without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade this rule. On the 7th July, 1840, Mr. Speaker called attention to a motion for a Bill to relieve dissenters from the payment of church rates, before he proposed the question from the Chair. Its form and words were different from those of a previous motion, but the object was substantially the same; and the House agreed that it was irregular, and ought not to be proposed from the Chair. Again, on the 16th May, 1860, the order for the second reading of the Charity Trustees Bill was withdrawn, as it was discovered to be substantially the same as the Endowed Schools Bill, which the House had already put off for six months. So, also, on the 17th May, 1870, a motion for an address in favour of emigration was not allowed to be made, being substantially the same as a resolution which had been negatived in the same session. On the 9th May, 1882, it was ruled by Mr. Speaker that a motion affirming the necessity of legislation to enable members duly elected to take their seats was inadmissible, as an amendment to the same effect, but in different words, had been negatived on the 7th March.

If the practice of allowing questions which have been settled by the House to be brought up for discussion again in the same session were allowed, it would produce endless confusion and trouble; and we might have two or three contradictory resolutions on the same question. On page 289 of May there appears this very emphatic statement—

Nor can a proposal contained in an amendment which has been practically negatived by a decision of the House, whereby it was determined that the words of the original motion, on which that amendment was moved, shall "stand part of the question," be again submitted to the House during the same session.

I have raised this point of order quite apart from the merits of the proposal before us, because I think that the procedure which I wish to prevent is a bad one. The point is sustained by Bourinot and by Todd, though, no doubt, both writers availed themselves largely of the precedents to be found in May. It seems to me that the object of the motion before us is practically the same as that of the Governor-General's Establishment Bill. It may be argued that, inasmuch as the motion also makes provision for the expenditure of £1,925 in connexion with the executive, the question is a different one; but I would point out that the House in dealing with the Estimates has already determined upon that expenditure.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not for this year.

Mr. McDONALD.—In any case, I maintain that it would be to trifle with the question to argue that, because a slight addition has been added to the motion, it is therefore substantially a different motion. If that contention were allowed, the parliamentary rule to which May refers could be evaded in every case by merely tacking on to a motion some paltry addition.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I admit that.

Mr. McDONALD.—It may be argued, too, that the Governor-General's Establishment Bill was a measure for the appropriation of money, whereas what we are now considering is merely a bald motion which may or may not have effect.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall not take that point.

Mr. McDONALD.—I maintain that the motion before us deals with substantially the same question as was dealt with during the consideration of the Governor-General's Establishment Bill, and that it therefore is out of order.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not take any exception to the doctrine which the honorable member has laid down, nor to the authorities whom he has cited in support of it; my whole point is that neither it nor they have any reference to the case before us. When the measure providing for the appropriation of £8,000 a year for the Governor-General's establishment was submitted it was pointed out that about one-half of the sum would be spent upon entertainments, and that of the balance, part would be expended in defraying the salaries of His Excellency's staff, and another part in paying for fuel, lighting, and other et ceteras connected with the upkeep of the Government-houses; but the whole amount was in addition to the sum which appeared on the Estimates for the ordinary upkeep of the Government-houses, the items of which were carefully detailed. The vote then proposed was for purposes quite different from those which the sum now proposed is intended to cover. There was on the Estimates a larger sum than that now submitted to meet the various requirements of the Governor-General's household, but those requirements were quite different from those which were to be covered by the £8,000. None of them have been revived. The Government are not submitting any proposal to cover expenditure for entertainments, salaries of staff, fuel, or any of the charges which were to be covered by the £8,000. The honorable member is a careful custodian of the rights of the House, but he has overlooked that point. If he had referred to the speech made by the Prime Minister in introducing the Governor-General's Establishment Bill, he would have seen that the objection which he has raised, although a good one under other circumstances, does not apply in this case.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am inclined to agree with the honorable member for Kennedy, and to consider the remarks of the Attorney-General altogether beside the question. The point we have to deal with is whether the motion now before us is substantially the same question as that submitted to us on a former occasion. If reference is made to the Governor-General's Establishment Bill, it will be seen that it is entitled—"A Bill to make provision for the Governor-General's establishment," while this is a motion to provide an allowance for the upkeep of the Government-houses. If it can be shown that there is a distinction between the one and the other, the Attorney-General's contention is a good one, but, unless the distinction can be made, the point raised by the honorable member for Kennedy must be upheld. If it is permissible for us to re-open this question on the plea that some of the details connected with it were not considered on a former occasion, it is competent for us to re-open the consideration of the electoral measure which we have just disposed of, and, if we like, to resurrect every other political question with which we have dealt during the session. I maintain that the question now before the committee has, in substance, been discussed and dealt with in this chamber during the present session.

Mr. McCAY.—While I accept the exposition of the honorable member for Kennedy of the practice of Parliament, I hold that that practice is not applicable to the case under discussion. If Parliament has agreed to give the Governor-General a carriage—which we may take to represent the salary of £10,000 provided for in the Constitution—and a greyhound—which we may take to represent the £13,000 set down on the Estimates—but has refused to give him a yacht—which we may take to represent the

Mr. GLYNN.—That is during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly. The reason why I do not make this resolution the foundation of a Bill at the present time, is because there has been very great difficulty, indeed, in arriving at a correct estimate as to what the expense under these several heads will be. None of this money will be paid to the Governor-General. It will be paid for the upkeep of Government-houses which are not absolutely our own freehold property to deal with as we please, but which have been handed over to us by the great generosity of the States. We are therefore under an obligation to maintain them with the same appliances and furniture, and in the order and condition in which they were when the State Governments entrusted them to us. We have arrived at the lowest possible estimate of cost, but it will require at least a year's experience before we should commit ourselves to a statement of this sum in a Bill which would become an Act, and which would then bind us until it was repealed. This resolution indicates the intention of the Government to submit this sum upon the Estimates in the hope that after twelve months' experience of the control of the Government-houses it will be found to be sufficient. They have, until recently, been under the management of the Public Works, or other departments of the States, but have now been taken over by the Department of Home Affairs, under a most capable officer (Major Miller), who has had previous experience in dealing with the establishment of a State Governor. Under the circumstances, he has thought it necessary to have 12 months' practical experience before he binds himself to this sum as being adequate. There is every reason to suppose that it will be found adequate; because, although some of the items may fall short of the required expenditure, a lesser amount required in connexion with other items may be found to balance the amount.

Mr. WATSON.—Who proposes that this sum should be asked for twelve months?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Major Miller advises that, without twelve months' experience, he would not like to commit himself absolutely to these figures.

Mr. WATSON.—Do the Government propose to alter this every twelve months?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, they propose to submit this sum on the Estimates for this year. At the end of this year they or their successors will, no doubt, think it desirable to include a fixed sum in a Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The honorable gentleman brings this forward in order that he may be able to acquaint the Secretary of State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. McDONALD.—In the meantime a Governor-General is appointed, and the question of his allowances again crops up.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member is too previous, as the Americans say. Unquestionably, if we carry this, then, during the term of office of the next Governor-General, the amount paid to him during his term of office cannot be less. his House may choose, upon further considering the matter, to slightly increase the amount here proposed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If experience shows that more will be required we shall have to provide more?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. But I think Parliament would be likely to do so. We will be under an obligation to place the matter before the House in the form of a Bill, in order that we may fix, once and for all, a limit to the expense to be incurred by the Commonwealth in the maintenance of the Government-houses occupied by the Governor-General, in order that during the term of any given Governor-General no discussion shall take place regarding the amount to be paid on his account. During his term of office, of course, it will be always possible to reconsider the question as affecting the next Governor-General. But during the term of office of a Governor-General, who accepts the position upon a certain given statement, the amount can not be reduced. I have every reason to hope that the amount here proposed will not require to be increased. At the same time, it has been felt that it is only fair, in view of the difficulties with which this question has been surrounded, and in view of the warning I have received from the officer who will be charged with the control of the expenditure to ask that we should be given twelve months' experience before we absolutely pledge ourselves to these figures.

Mr. POYNTON.—Where will the Government get the money required to pay railway fares?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall deal with that in a moment. I hope that honorable members have grasped the position, that this

Mr. CONROY. — The figures proposed in this resolution are so extremely reasonable that I should have been only too willing, under other circumstances, to support it; but, however anxious I might have been to support it, I am afraid that the point of order raised by the honorable member for Kennedy is a sound one. There can, I think, be no question that a decision has already been arrived at by this House upon this question, though that decision did not meet with my entire approval. Are we to go back upon the sound parliamentary rule, and permit this matter to be discussed again? I think that a Bill would require to be introduced to give effect to this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. — That question may be raised later on; but it is not at present before the Chair.

Mr. CONROY. — Unless I hear some statement from the Acting Prime Minister which will relieve my doubts, I shall feel compelled to support the honorable member for Kennedy in the point of order he has raised. The Government might advance the ground that these buildings for the time being are Federal property, but the same objection would arise then, so far as the Parliament is concerned, as we might prefer to allow them to fall into disrepair.

Mr. O'MALLEY. — It seems to me that the Acting Prime Minister is, in the language of the turf, ringing the changes on us. There can be no question that, in substance and in reality, this is the same little bit of business that was before this House on a previous occasion, when the proposal to grant allowances amounting to £8,000 a year was made. The honorable and learned member for Corinella drew a fine distinction. He told us that the £8,000 had nothing whatever to do with this. But was the £5,500 a year in the rear waiting in case the Government were outvoted on the proposal to grant £8,000? It seems to me like starting one crook and a real racer in the same race. This is the dark horse, and he has been kept waiting until a convenient opportunity to trot him out. Is it not all a question of allowances? In my opinion it certainly is. This recalls to my mind a passage from the Scriptures wherein it is stated that a certain king, with the advice of his inexperienced counselors, said to his people — "My father has laid upon you a heavy yoke, and I will add to your burdens." That is precisely what is being done with us to-day. I support the contention of the honorable member for Kennedy.

The CHAIRMAN. — The honorable member for Kennedy in raising the point of order has referred me to Standing Order 125, which says —

No question or amendment shall be proposed which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative.

I have given the matter consideration, and, in my opinion, there is a sufficient difference between the motion now before the committee and the Bill previously discussed in this House to enable me to rule the present motion in order.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy). — I do not intend to move that the ruling of the Chairman be dissented from, for the reason that the motion means nothing. If there were anything in it, and if it meant the appropriation of money, I should take further action.

Mr. WILKS. — It is a pulse-feeler.

Mr. McDONALD. — That is all. It is a proposal to feel the pulse of the committee. As it stands at present there is nothing in the resolution, even if it be carried, and I shall, therefore, take no further action at the present time.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I do not wish to take advantage of the honorable member's statement in any way, but I can assure him that this resolution means a great deal. Though it does not in itself authorize the payment of a single shilling, if carried in this form it would express a deliberate judgment of the committee with a view to that being conveyed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, so that the future Governor-General of Australia will know exactly what sum this Parliament or future Parliaments of the Commonwealth will provide for him.

Mr. McDONALD. — Not future Parliaments.

Mr. McCAY. — I suppose that the honorable gentleman means that it will impose an honorable obligation.

Mr. DEAKIN. — It is perfectly true that the carrying of the resolution will not impose a legal obligation even upon this Parliament, but it certainly will impose an honorable obligation upon this Parliament, and one which I am perfectly certain future Parliaments would also consider binding.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly. The reason why I do not make this resolution the foundation of a Bill at the present time, is because there has been very great difficulty, indeed, in arriving at a correct estimate as to what the expense under these several heads will be. Mr. POYNTON.—Where will the Government get the money required to pay railway fares?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall deal with that in a moment. I hope that honorable members have grasped the position, that this proposal requires none of the extraordinary expenditure in connexion with the Governor-General, which was proposed to be made by a special grant from this House of £8,000 a year. That extraordinary expenditure has been abolished once and for all, and this proposal is only to cover the expenses of the upkeep of the Government-houses which have appeared on the Estimates already for last year, which will appear for this year, and on the Estimates in each succeeding year. The total cost to the Commonwealth is to be fixed after this year's experience, if not once and for all, at least for each term of office of a Governor-General, and, at all events, for the term of office of any Governor-General who may accept the position on the given statement. Honorable members will see that this proposal is brought before the House to enable a new appointment of a Governor-General to be made without any possibility of a misunderstanding on his part as regards future expenses.

Mr. GLYNN.—It binds the House to future Estimates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It binds the House to provide a certain sum for a certain time. If the honorable and learned member can find any objection to that, I shall be glad to hear him on the point.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why not go through the whole of the Estimates in the same way?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because the general Estimates relate to people whose rights are safeguarded, so far as we are concerned, by a Public Service Act. That can be dealt with under the provisions of the Act. The Governor-General, however, can be provided for only in this way. He is the head of the State, and it would be unfair to refuse to give to him the same guarantee that we extend to all the members of our public service.

Mr. McDONALD.—What right have we to pay this money at all?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is another question that will be discussed at the proper time. We should be acting unjustly if we refused to extend to the Governor-General the same treatment that is accorded to every officer under the Public Service Act.

Mr. McDONALD.—Is he employed by us?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; but it is now sought to place him in the same position of security as is every public servant. Those who object to our present proposal are entitled to do so, but they must confess that they would be establishing a precedent entirely new in Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; this is the new precedent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member would have done credit to the profession to which I belong; but he has exhausted his subtleties unavailingly in this case. I would remind him that in every State provision is made for items exactly similar to those now before honorable members, and the sums of money voted to cover them amount year by year in the States of New South Wales and Victoria to a greater sum for each of the States Governors than is now asked on behalf of the Governor-General of the whole of Australia. A larger amount is set apart in Canada—partly by special appropriation—and a larger amount is provided in two of the States of Australia, whilst an almost equal amount is appropriated in one or two of the other States. The amount for which we are asking represents, in my opinion, the bed-rock of economy. It provides simply for the cost of the upkeep of the residences of the Governor-General, the offices and their necessary appurtenances connected with the discharge of his duties. I hope that when we come to consider, as we shall do very shortly, the various items included in the Estimates, honorable members will closely scrutinize them. I challenge them, however, to find any serious fault on the score of want of economy or simplicity.

Mr. GLYNN.—I should agree with the Minister if the provision for the second Government-house were struck out.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I would remind the honorable and learned member that both in New South Wales and Victoria a second Government-house is provided for the State Governor. In South Australia, also, as the honorable and learned member must be aware, a large sum of money has been expended in providing a country residence for the State Governor. In our proposals there is no mention of a country house for the Governor-General, and if we give His Excellency a second establishment, we shall provide for nothing more than is already enjoyed by the Governors of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—It is purely an accident that the second residence should be situated in Sydney.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; it is not an accident at all; it is intentional.

Mr. POYNTON.—Has the Minister copies of the correspondence with reference to the occupancy of the Government-house, Sydney, by His Excellency the Governor-General?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unfortunately I have only two copies. The choice of Sydney Government-house as a residence for His Excellency the Governor-General dates back to a period prior to the birth of the Commonwealth. As some honorable members appeared to suppose that there was a mystery in connexion with the negotiations which led up to that, I asked and obtained from the New South Wales Government the papers relating to the case. These I have now laid upon the table for the perusal of honorable members. At a very early period the Government of New South Wales were naturally concerned to see that at the birth of the Commonwealth the importance of New South Wales and of its metropolis, Sydney, were recognised. It was generally admitted throughout the Commonwealth that in view of the peculiar circumstances in regard to Sydney, and of the disability imposed by the terms of the Constitution upon that bright and beautiful city, its prominence and importance should be recognised by holding the inaugural celebration of the Commonwealth there. The celebration took place at Sydney, and was distinguished by a regal magnificence which will live in the memories of all who witnessed it. The action of the State of New South Wales was most generous, and no nation ever had its existence more fittingly inaugurated than did this Commonwealth on the 1st of January, 1901. Honorable members must recollect that on the very first day in the history of the Commonwealth we found the Governor-General in occupation of Government-house, Sydney.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes, and it cost the New South Wales Government £20,000 to fit it up for him.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The letters and telegrams exchanged between the Premier of New South Wales, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, are now before honorable members. These show a legitimate desire on the part of New South Wales, when it undertook the burden of conducting the celebrations at the birth of the Commonwealth, to be allowed to make provision for the residence of His Excellency the Governor-General in Sydney.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That was "bossed" by Sir William Lyne.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, and very well, too. As I have stated, the Governor-General was in occupation of the Government-house at Sydney at the time that the Commonwealth was inaugurated, and nothing was more natural than that the Government of New South Wales should invite him to stay in Sydney for at least a part of the time during which he was not detained in Melbourne by his parliamentary duties. That was a perfectly legitimate aspiration, one that is shared by every capital city in the Union, which ought to be gratified in every possible way. The only distinction between Sydney and Melbourne and other capitals lies in the fact that they are the two great centres of population, influence, commerce, and wealth of this Commonwealth. These two great cities are so much larger than any others within the Commonwealth that it is but natural that the Governor-General should be expected, in order to make the acquaintance of the people, to spend a longer time in these centres than in remote districts. The great metropolis, Sydney, no longer belongs to New South Wales, except in a narrow and restricted sense, but it constitutes the centre of a great part of this Commonwealth. It is an Australian city of which Australia is proud. The recognition of its importance is not due to the fact that it happens to be the great centre of a wealthy and enterprising State, but to the circumstance that it is one of the vital centres of the Commonwealth. We can no more ignore Sydney as a great power and population because of State sub-divisions, than we could ignore a large and important city within a State because of municipal sub-divisions. It appears to be abundantly easy, without taking into account the many charms which that metropolitan city can claim to possess, to justify the choice of Sydney as a place of residence of the Governor-General. No country house will be provided for His Excellency the Governor-General, but it is inevitable that he should visit Sydney, and spend a good deal of time there. It is desirable therefore, that he should be, so to speak,

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Will the Attorney-General leave the decision of the question to the American Consul (Mr. Bray)?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am indebted to Mr. Bray for these figures. The Appropriation Act passed by Congress last year set apart £20,000 for expenditure upon White House, and in connexion with the President.

Mr. CONROY.—An additional £25,000 has to be credited to other departments.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not desire to compare America with Australia, but whenever an undue expenditure is cast upon the President of the United States on account of special entertainments, Congress makes special provision for them, just as this House voted a sum to compensate the Governor-General for the extraordinary outlay incurred by him in connexion with the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. Of course, it is impossible to compare a nation which has developed such greatness as has the United States with a young community of yesterday—the Commonwealth of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Therefore, we ought to pay less.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have no desire to institute any comparisons. At the same time, the United States cannot be quoted as an instance of greater economy than we are proposing to adopt if the conditions are considered. On the contrary, if all the circumstances are taken into account, it will be found that in this, as in every other respect, the United States exhibits a magnificent determination to maintain its prestige amongst the nations of the world. The question of the Governor-General's railway travelling has been referred to by the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Poynton. In this connexion, I would say that if all the States Governors have hitherto been accorded the privilege of free railway travelling, I see no reason why that concession should be withdrawn. I decline to believe that it will be withdrawn.

Mr. POYNTON.—Have the Government received an assurance that they will not be charged for the Governor-General's railway travelling?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If it is withdrawn, the effect will be that the Governor-General would go nowhere in Australia other than to those places to which his official duties call him. If he is charged for that portion of his railway travelling, the expense will be borne by the Commonwealth. There is a small sum included in the £1,000 which is set apart for official printing, &c., which would cover any slight outlay to which the Governor-General would be liable in that respect.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is it not a fact that the Government have already been billed for the Governor-General's railway travelling?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; and when the States Governments have been informed that they must render those accounts to the Governor-General in person, and that they would be paid out of his private purse, they have withdrawn them. I have no reason to suppose that any new practice will be introduced in regard to this matter. Indeed I am confident that the same privilege which has been extended to the State Governors will also be extended to the Governor-General.

Mr. WATSON.—Every visitor from England with a title receives a free pass over the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I anticipate that the Governor-General will always receive the same courtesy as has been meted out to the State Governors, and that the difficulty suggested will not arise. If it does, the Governor-General will travel nowhere but where his official duties call him, and then his expenses will be paid by the Commonwealth. But the cardinal question at issue is whether it is desirable to maintain a second Government-house in Sydney, when normal sessions of Parliament take the place of this extraordinary session, which I am informed by somebody with an historical turn of mind, surpasses in length any session, except that of the Long Parliament itself. Under the circumstances honorable members will realize that a second Government-house is no more than the status of the Governor-General of Australia demands, and no more than its people ought to provide. If they desire the position of the Commonwealth and of the chief representative of the Crown in Australia to be recognised throughout the States, they will at all events pay him the compliment of allowing him a second residence, such as many of the Governors of the States already enjoy.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I confess that I have no fault to find with the manner in which this matter has been introduced. It is questionable whether the provision which it is sought to that economy should be exercised, but I claim that any one who peruses the paper which was ordered to be printed upon the 7th of August, will admit that in regard to the maintenance of the vice-regal establishments in Sydney and Melbourne we have pared down to the bone. If it be possible to maintain those establishments for a less sum, it will be done; but I doubt whether it can be done. The most careful analysis of the outgoings shows that if the amounts which are now proposed do cover the expenses—and I think they will—they will allow of a very scanty margin indeed. Honorable members have only to compare those amounts with the liberal appropriations made by this House in 1901, in order to realize the great reductions which have been made. Of course, the sums specified in this motion are only in the nature of estimates, but there is no reason to suppose that they will be exceeded by more than a little, if they are exceeded at all. Taking for granted that the question of the desirableness of maintaining a second Government-house is the one to be debated, I hope honorable members will remember that after all there are considerations which have a utilitarian bearing upon it, although they may not appear to do so. The Governor-General is the chief officer and representative of the Commonwealth in Australia, and it is not becoming that he should occupy an inferior position to the Governors of the States through which he passes, or in which he lives. If we insist that the chief officer of the Crown in Australia, whilst residing in Victoria or spending a portion of his time in New South Wales, shall, in discharging the duties and maintaining the dignities of his office, be confined to a much narrower expenditure than the States Governor are we shall be placing ourselves in a very invidious position indeed. Those who lessen the standing and impressiveness of the Governor-General, should remember that they are lessening the standing and impressiveness of the Commonwealth. I admit that the utmost impressiveness is consistent with extreme simplicity.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Surely President Roosevelt is as big a man as the Governor-General of Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What amount does he receive?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—10,000, and no more.

It will 43 P

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member ought to know better. According to the United States Estimates for 1901, he not only receives a salary of £10,000, but a further sum of £20,000 for office allowances.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—He does not receive a single penny for the maintenance of the White House.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member is in error. A recent number of a very excellent American magazine, The World's Work—a semi-scientific publication—contains an article upon the White House, and goes to show that to light it and the grounds alone costs £2,600, whilst the other expenditure upon that residence amounts to £6,000 more.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That money is voted in connexion with certain offices.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There are offices in the Government-houses at Sydney and Melbourne in which work is transacted, for which money is voted in the United States. In addition to the salary of £10,000 which the President of the United States receives, I find that a further sum of £10,000 is provided to cover the salaries of officers who work at White House—such officers as the Private Secretary to the President, who has two assistant private secretaries. In fact, the United States Government pays for the President's staff.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Is not the Attorney-General speaking of the Internal department?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, I am speaking of the private secretaries to the President. I have no wish, however, to compare a country containing a population of 70,000,000 with one containing only 4,000,000.

Mr. GLYNN.—The two cases are not analogous.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; but they are analogous to this extent—that though the Constitution of the United States casts far heavier duties upon its President than are imposed by our Constitution upon our Governor-General, yet in spite of the limitation of the salary of the former, it has been found necessary to provide allowances which actually include his carriage horses.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That is the Internal department.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The President of the United States has horses and grooms provided for him.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Will the Attorney-General leave the decision of the question to the American Consul (Mr. Bray)?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am indebted to Mr. Bray for these figures. The Appropriation Act passed by Congress last year set apart £20,000 for expenditure upon White House, and in connexion with the President.

Mr. CONROY.—An additional £25,000 has to be credited to other departments.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not desire to compare America with Australia, but whenever an undue expenditure is cast upon the President of the United States on account of special entertainments, Congress makes special provision for them, just as this House voted a sum to compensate the Governor-General for the extraordinary outlay incurred by him in connexion with the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. Of course, it is impossible to compare a nation which has developed such greatness as has the United States with a young community of yesterday—the Commonwealth of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Therefore, we ought to pay less.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have no desire to institute any comparisons. At the same time, the United States cannot be quoted as an instance of greater economy than we are proposing to adopt if the conditions are considered. On the contrary, if all the circumstances are taken into account, it will be found that in this, as in every other respect, the United States exhibits a magnificent determination to maintain its prestige amongst the nations of the world. Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I confess that I have no fault to find with the manner in which this matter has been introduced. It is questionable whether the provision which it is sought to make for the maintenance of two Government houses should be immediately embodied in a Bill, or whether we should agree to the suggestion of the Attorney-General to await the results of a year's experience before deciding to place it within a statutory appropriation. No honorable member representing New South Wales can find fault with the kind and generous tone of the Attorney-General's address in referring to the necessity for the upkeep of a Government-house in Sydney. Indeed, this preliminary debate ought not to be necessary, because most of us agree that in connexion with the Governor-General's position some allowances must be voted. But it is very clear from the apologetic utterance of the Attorney-General, and from a great many murmurings which we have heard during the past few weeks, that an attempt is to be made to eliminate from these Estimates the amount necessary for the upkeep of a Government-house in Sydney. In to-day's newspapers there appears a sort of inspired paragraph, in which it is stated that a member of this House says that he intends to uproot the whole of this matter, and to go into the correspondence between the Minister for Home Affairs, when Prime Minister of New South Wales, and the Imperial Government. Of course he will be perfectly within his rights in doing that. In my opinion, the time has arrived for taking an historical retrospect of the whole matter. I have always deplored the fact that federation did not come about as the result of the first referendum. I believe that a great many of the difficulties which beset us now in regard to the upkeep of the Government-houses of Sydney and Melbourne, and the establishment here of the departmental and Parliamentary offices, would have been obviated if the people of New South Wales could have been prevailed upon to accept the Constitution Bill on the first referendum. By not doing so, and by insisting upon a Constitution which is not the complete embodiment of the views of the Convention in which the various States were represented, they for the first time in the history of this movement condescended to bargaining.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The whole thing was a bargain.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Very little has, in my private opinion, come of the bargaining. But whether it was right or wrong, a bargain was made, the chief compact in which was that the federal capital should be situated in the State of New South Wales, and, inferentially, that the Commonwealth Government should be carried on from there. There are provisions in the Constitution which—although we have the right, by following a certain course of procedure, and obtaining the popular approval, to amend—could not be changed without committing a dishonorable breach of the arrangements between the States. One cannot imagine the possibility of a referendum for dissolving the union, nor can we imagine a referendum for altering that provision in the Constitution which says that no territory shall be taken from a State to form another State without the consent of its people. Certain provisions of the Constitution are compacts between the States, affecting their rights qua States, which must be honourably observed, and which we cannot think would be amended. I ask honorable members now to consider the question with which we are dealing as a compact with New South Wales. There can be no doubt that if that compact had not been made, the first Parliament would have met in New South Wales. The position of that State was recognised by the fact that the Governor-General first landed there, and that the Commonwealth was inaugurated there. In order that the Governor-General might have a fitting reception, and that proper arrangements might be made for his stay there, the then Premier of the State—the Minister for Home Affairs—placed the Government-house in Sydney at his disposal.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The State Governor gave up his residence there so that it might be done.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Yes. I have felt, as no doubt many other honorable members have done, that this particular compact would bring about some curious results. I want honorable members, however, to understand the whole position, in order to bring them back to the true federal feeling in the matter. We have been told that federation has enlarged our powers of self-government; I hope that it has enlarged our ideas of self-government. We knew directly it was decided that the first Parliament should meet in Melbourne that the Executive offices must be established there. Has there been one grumble from New South Wales because the whole administrative machinery of the Commonwealth has been directed from Melbourne? The only growl that we have heard has come from a member of another place, who objected to the furnishing of a very humble edifice in Sydney to house Commonwealth Ministers when they happened to be doing executive duty there. That unfederal spirit is deplorable. It is our duty to foster in every way the federal spirit. We are here, not merely to pass laws for the Government of the Commonwealth, but also to give life and instinct to the federal spirit. I have been glad to notice during the fifteen months for which we have been sitting, that there has been no attempt by the representatives of the larger States to do anything unfair in the interests of the smaller States. On the contrary, the most generous disposition has been shown towards the interests of Queensland and Tasmania—Western Australia, because of her Tariff arrangements, not having been so greatly concerned. In the consideration of the question now before us we are, to some extent, affected by the fact that this session is apparently interminable; but does any one imagine that we shall ever have another like it? Is it not fair to suppose that in the future the extreme duration of a session will be not more than six months? Of course, the Executive Government and its officers must, during the session, be where Parliament is sitting; but during the recess, if the spirit and, I think, the letter of the compact is carried out, Parliament should be only too glad to allow the Governor-General to reside in that State in which the future federal capital is to be. It must be remembered that this is not a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. But, in any case, the amount involved is only about £2,000, and if it is the desire of the people of New South Wales that the Governor-General shall reside in their State during part of the year, we ought to freely grant the money. There was a clear compact, and it has been clearly understood. The expenditure for the up-keep of the Government-houses has been reduced to, I think, as small an amount as the expenditure of the States in that direction. It must not be forgotten that the Governor of New South Wales, instead of living in the original Government-house, has removed to another residence provided by the State. While it is desirable that the site of the federal capital should be determined upon as soon as possible, a certain period must elapse even after it is determined upon, and perhaps, after. Parliament has begun to meet there, before a residence for the Governor-General can be provided there; and as New South Wales has agreed that Parliament shall, in the meantime, sit in Melbourne, and that the whole machinery of the Commonwealth shall be managed from Melbourne, it would be contemptible to refuse to vote the paltry sum of £2,000 for the up-keep of the Government-house at the metropolis of that State, which is the most populous, and, in many respects, because of its area and position, the most important. It may be said that the Executive Council meetings can be held only where the Governor-General happens to be residing. But honorable members know that Executive Council meetings may be held anywhere without deranging the machinery of government. Then, too, it is our boast that modern appliances have almost annihilated space, and we know that the Governor-General could leave Sydney one evening and be here in Melbourne to attend a meeting of the Executive Council next morning if necessary. Then, again, although the Executive may have their offices in Melbourne, Ministers will have to visit New South Wales to deal with many important matters. I am willing to say that this sum should be voted merely on the ground that the people of New South Wales desire that the Governor-General shall reside in their State for a portion of the year.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They have a right to require that.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Yes. We want to foster the federal spirit throughout Australia. Federation could not have taken place if New South Wales had refused to join the union. That State, however, accepted the Constitution upon certain terms, one of which was that the federal capital should be situated in New South Wales, but not within 100 miles of Sydney—a very unfortunate limitation. Could any one have imagined, eighteen months ago, that this Parliament would refuse to recognise the status of New South Wales, and decline to vote a sum of money for the up-keep of the Government-house in Sydney, upon which the Government of New South Wales have spent £20,000? If we do not vote this sum, we may place ourselves in a very undignified and reprehensible position. We cannot prevent the Governor-General from travelling, as he may think it his duty to do, throughout the States, or from residing in New South Wales, nor can we prevent the New South Wales Government from offering to him any accommodation they may think fit. It was contended a short time ago that it would be undignified for the Governor-General to accept an allowance from a State Parliament. The contention in Victoria when a similar Bill was introduced was, that if a Government-house had to be maintained anywhere it was the Federal, and not the State Government that should maintain; that the Governor-General, in his position, ought not to be beholden to any State for that kind of hospitality; and that our dignity and our position necessitated the other course. Now, what are we doing? We are going back upon our own principles. After having scouted the proposal of New South Wales because we, forsooth, were willing to provide the money, we are saying now that, having stopped that little arrangement, we do not intend to do anything ourselves.

Mr. WILKS.—What about the constitutional right of New South Wales?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The constitutional right of New South Wales is to the capital site, whenever that is decided. I do not know that, as a matter of hard logic, we can deduce anything with regard to Government-house in Sydney to which there could not be an answer. But I do not think we ought to deal with the question in that pettifogging way. We have to deal with this question from a purely federal stand-point, in view of the understanding which was come to, and which to a large extent brought about federation, and we have to deal with it from the highest point of view with a knowledge of the sensitive feelings of the people of the great mother State of Australia. Because—and this is the last word I shall say upon this matter—I would warn honorable members that if by their vote they refuse to carry this small sum for the upkeep of Government-house in Sydney, they will cause an extreme feeling of irritation in that State. There have been many things to create a feeling of irritation there up to the present time. I can say for myself that that is no threat or anything of that kind, because I am one of those federalists who believe that no matter what has happened, and no matter what could happen, union, above all things, is necessary for our national existence. Therefore, while it makes no difference to me as a federalist, I say the duty of this Parliament and of this Government should be to do everything that will allay any feeling of irritation, which, in many respects, is unavoidable in bringing into operation a new system such as that of the Commonwealth. When it is considered that, in allaying the irritation of the people of New South Wales, we shall be carrying out a compact, and that the carrying out of that compact will involve an expense of only £2,000 a year, the question is scarcely arguable.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—The essence of this question is whether, in the opinion of this Parliament, it is desirable that the Commonwealth shall be made chargeable with the upkeep of more than one Government-house for its Governor-General. When I spoke about this matter on a previous occasion, I very warmly advocated the claim then put forward by the Government, that the residence or residences of the Governor-General, which were given to us rent free by the States, should be kept in a thorough and complete state of repair at the expense of the Commonwealth. Ever since this question has been before the Chamber, I have endeavoured to discover why it was thought necessary that, anterior to the establishment of the federal capital, there should be more than one residence provided for the Governor-General. I have my own opinion about it—an opinion formed upon knowledge which came to me in a certain capacity—that previous to the setting out of the Governor-General from England, it was his intention to land at Melbourne. There is no doubt that it was the intention of Lord Hopetoun to land at Melbourne, but after he left England certain pressure was brought to bear upon the Home Government which caused an alteration in his plans.

Mr. CONROY.—This Parliament is not responsible for that, because it was not in existence at the time.

Mr. SALMON.—Certainly not; and I am very anxious that this Parliament should not be placed in the position of being compelled to accept a responsibility which it did not incur. I asked for certain papers to be placed before honorable members. Those papers for a long time were not available; but they are available to-day, or, I should say, that a certain number of them are available. I regret that owing to circumstances, over which we have absolutely no control, we have not been able to get the whole of the correspondence that took place between the Prime Minister, the Governor of New South Wales, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the residences of the Governor-General, his landing, and so forth. But it is patent from the papers that we have at our disposal, that there were two conditions made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The first condition was that the whole of the States interested should be agreeable, and the second condition was that the extra expense should be borne by the States interested. The first of these conditions was carried out. Communications were opened up between the Premier of New South Wales and the Premiers of the other States of the Commonwealth, and, without exception, the new arrangements with regard to landing, the issue of the proclamation, and so on, were agreed to by the States, and perhaps also the question of residence hanging upon that. The second condition, however, was fulfilled only by the State of New South Wales. In the State of Victoria a Bill was brought down for the purpose, but it was rejected on its second reading, and it would have been rejected by a very much larger majority than it was, had it not been for the existence of the feeling of fellowship and comradeship amongst the States which the honorable member for Wentworth desires so much to have expressed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Did that Bill contain a specific reference to Government-house in Sydney?

Mr. MAUGER.—It proposed a certain sum to make up £10,000.

Mr. SALMON.—It was for the set purpose of providing a proportion of the amount estimated to be required for the Governor-General's establishment. In New South Wales the Act passed provided for a sum of over £2,000.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I should like to know from the honorable member what papers are missing.

Mr. SALMON.—If the Minister for Home Affairs will read the letter from the Governor of New South Wales, he will see that the letters are not complete.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Where are they?

Mr. SALMON.—I am sure I do not know; I wish I did. Perhaps the Minister for Home Affairs can tell us more of the matter than any one else, because he happened to be Premier of New South Wales at the time the correspondence took place.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I can tell the honorable member that these papers are very nearly, if not quite, complete. I have read them through and through. There may be one or two more letters in the correspondence; they are not important, and I do not know that there are any more.

Mr. SALMON.—I would ask the honorable gentleman to read the papers, and he will see that they do not present a continuous history of the negotiations which must have been going on. I must say that I had some experience of the Minister for Home Affairs when in office as Premier of New South Wales at this particular time, and New South Wales never had a more valiant champion, or one more watchful of her interests, than she had at that time in the honorable gentleman. We thought that we in Victoria were pretty smart, but we found ourselves, on this occasion, at all events, completely outpaced by the then Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. BROWN.—The honorable member is trying to make up for it now by opposing this proposal.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member is in error in supposing that. I say that the second condition imposed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies has not been complied with. That right honorable gentleman made it perfectly clear that there were two things to be done before a second residence would be agreed to. Only one of those things has been done.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Which is the other?

Mr. SALMON.—The condition that the necessary money should be provided.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is provided by an Act of the Parliament of New South Wales.

Mr. McCOLL.—Have the New South Wales Government ever paid it?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; because the Commonwealth Government objected to it.

Mr. SALMON.—Exactly; the Commonwealth Government took it upon themselves to break the bargain entered into between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Premier of New South Wales. That is really what it amounts to. Now we are implored not to break an implied contract entered into between a previous Premier of New South Wales, Mr. Reid, and a Premier of Victoria, Sir George Turner.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And provisionally entered into by the Federal Government.

Mr. SALMON.—By the signing of a certain document?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—By undertaking the responsibility for the up-keep of Government-house.

Mr. SALMON.—They did that, I know, but, in doing so, in my opinion, they broke the spirit of the agreement made between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. CONROY.—The same people will have to pay in any case.

Mr. SALMON.—I am quite aware of that. The honorable member for Wentworth again fell into the error of quoting the Constitution as making provision for the seat of government for the Commonwealth in Sydney. But the Constitution, in section 125, expressly forbids the seat of government to be in Sydney. In contending that the rights of New South Wales in this particular must be regarded by the up-keep of a second establishment for the Governor-General in Sydney for a certain period of the year, and by the styling of Sydney as "the seat of government," we are contending for something which is not contained in the Constitution.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No one is contending for that.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member for Wentworth indicated that in his argument. Perhaps the honorable member for Parramatta has never said that Sydney should be the seat of government during the time when Parliament is not sitting?

Mr. WILKS.—I will say it to give the honorable member a start.

Mr. SALMON.—I knew that so loyal a son of New South Wales would say it, but I have heard it said over and over again by different honorable members, and especially by honorable members from New South Wales. I do not intend to labour this question. I feel that a mistake has been made by the Government in arranging for more than one residence for the Governor-General. This is entirely opposed to the compact entered into between the Colonial-office and the Premier of New South Wales, and it is against the spirit of the bargain made in connexion with the establishment of the seat of government. No one objects more strongly than I do to the bargain that was made by the State Premiers between the first referendum and the second. That understanding ought never to have been entered into. I would rather have seen federation deferred for years, than that the work of the convention should have been broken up by the resolution arrived at at an illegal meeting.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is an anti-federalist.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member knows better than that. I am not an anti-federalist, but at the same time I am not a federalist at any price, and I never was. I prize the federal union very highly, and I hope that it will be long continued. But in order that it may be based upon a solid foundation, I hope to see greater interchanges of friendliness between the States than have taken place recently. The honorable member for Wentworth took it upon himself to warn us that the cup of irritation was full in New South Wales.

Mr. WILKS.—So it is, full to the brim.

Mr. SALMON.—I would remind the honorable member that there are many ardent federalists in Victoria who never believed for a moment that so little sympathy would be shown towards our industries, and towards our bone and sinew by the representatives of the other States. We have not asked for the expenditure of public money upon the maintenance of Government-houses, but we have desired the continuance of the support and assistance our industrial workers enjoyed in the past, which we had a right to expect from the federation. Before the honorable member for Wentworth takes upon himself the mantle of a modern Jeremiah he should remember what has been done by honorable members from his own State to irritate the manufacturers and operatives of Victoria almost beyond the point of endurance by denying them the right to live within the Commonwealth, and by attempting to take their occupations from them. I honour and respect the State of New South Wales. I recognise the magnificent work she has done, and I shall always look upon her as the parent State. Some Victorians object to this title. They are content that New South Wales should be regarded as the "senior" or even as the "original" State, but they object to her being called the parent State. Personally, I am prepared to give to New South Wales all that respect and regard that any one would give to a parent, but at the same time I ask that more consideration should be shown to the other States by her representatives. I can assure the honorable member for Wentworth that his action, and that of honorable members associated with him, has done more than anything else to make the federal union distasteful to the people of Victoria. I desire to deal with these questions in the interests of the whole Commonwealth, and I should be very sorry to assist one State at the expense of the others. I do not consider that the appropriations proposed by the Government are excessive. I agree with the Acting Prime Minister that we have at last got down to bed-rock in the matter of these expenses, but I regret that I shall have to vote in support of my opinion that it is not desirable that there should be more than one residence for the Governor-General within the Commonwealth. If it were desired, to-morrow, to remove the residence of His Excellency from Melbourne to Sydney, I should not offer any opposition.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Does the honorable member wish His Excellency to live in a hotel when he is in Sydney?

Mr. SALMON.—No, but I regard the principle embodied in the proposal that the Governor-General shall have two residences as opposed to the Constitution, and, also, to the well-being of the Commonwealth, and I shall have to vote against it. Apart from this, the Government proposals are as economical as we could expect, and I am sorry to find myself called upon to record what may be regarded as an anti-federal vote. It is not with any anti-federal spirit that my vote will be given, because if Melbourne, instead of Sydney, were affected, I should act in exactly the same way.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The honorable member for Laanecoorie, who professes to be a federalist, has expressed regret that he should be called upon to give what may seem to be an anti-federal vote, but his reasons for his action do not seem to be sufficient. He evidently bases his objection to the proposed vote for the maintenance of Government-house at Sydney as a second residence for the Governor-General upon the fact that, although one portion of the compact between the States has been kept, the second part has not been carried out. New South Wales has always been ready to carry out her part of the compact, under which the States were to contribute £10,000 towards the expenses of the Governor-General; but Victoria has been found wanting in this respect.

Mr. TUDOR.—Victoria made no compact.

Mr. WILKS.—If the honorable member reads the correspondence laid upon the table by the Minister he will find that there was a compact, because in the communications sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies it was stated that the States would provide £10,000.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is not one word in the correspondence regarding any compact having been entered into by the Government of Victoria.

Mr. WILKS.—It is stated that the sum of £10,000 would be contributed by the States.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not what the honorable member stated, and he should not make a serious charge against any State without having the best of evidence.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable members who represent Victoria seem to think that New South Wales should be prepared to make all sorts of sacrifices, but that the compact with reference to the maintenance of the residence for the Governor-General in Sydney should not be carried out because £10,000 is not forthcoming from the States. For the sake of the paltry £2,000 which is required for the upkeep of Government-house in Sydney, the Governor-General is to be placed in an invidious position and faith is to be broken with New South Wales. The Government of that State spent £20,000 in renovating Government-house in Sydney to fit it for the accommodation of the Governor-General, and provided another residence for the State Governor. Government-house in Sydney has been placed in the possession of the Commonwealth Government, and whether we like it or not we shall have to pay for the upkeep of the establishment. The fact of the matter is that the people of Melbourne do not wish to lose the Governor-General. They do not wish to have more than one residence provided for him, and they are basing their objections upon the ground of the expense that will be involved. The Victorians utter the federal cry only when it suits them, and they fight for their own State entirely. I now propose to take a lesson from them, and to uphold the rights of the State which I represent. I do not care whether my action is regarded as federal or anti-federal. When the Minister for Home Affairs established the federal offices in Sydney, a great outcry was raised in this House and in the Melbourne press, but I am glad that the Minister was true to the interests of the Commonwealth. The motion now before us is evidently intended to feel the pulse of the House.

Mr. McCAY.—Is not that a proper thing to do?

Mr. WILKS.—No, not in this way. The Ministry should take the responsibility of placing the proposed vote upon the Estimates in the ordinary way. We have heard a great deal about federalism, but that the mantle of the greatest federalist whom Australia has known—I refer to the late Sir Henry Parkes—has not fallen upon the shoulders of the Prime Minister is evidenced by his action in recently proposing that an annual allowance of £8,000 should be granted to the Governor-General. If any State is entitled to grumble, because of the neglect to carry out the federal compact, undoubtedly it is New South Wales. If any city throughout the Commonwealth made great sacrifices in order that New South Wales might join the Union, certainly it was Sydney. In this connexion I would remind those who taunt New South Wales, that it is from that State that we derive the biggest share of our revenue. Indeed, the State of New South Wales stands before the world as the banker of the Union. I do not wish to raise the cry of New South Wales versus Victoria, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that both the representatives and press of Victoria are endeavouring, by every means possible, to retain the residence of the Governor-General in this State. If they do not openly declare themselves, they suggest that we should have the federal capital established upon the movable tent system. If that system be adopted I am quite sure that the representatives of South Australia will want to know where Adelaide comes in. At the inauguration of the Commonwealth the Governor-General landed in New South Wales, and took up his residence there. His establishment was furnished by an outlay of £20,000 on the part of the State Government. That expenditure was incurred not simply for the purpose of providing him with a residence for a day or two, but of providing him with a residence during the recess. Naturally whilst Parliament is in session he will reside in Melbourne, so that under ordinary circumstances the people of Victoria would have had the benefit of his presence for a clear period of sixteen months. Now, however, that the people of the Commonwealth are asked to provide £2,077 to maintain the vice-regal establishment in Sydney, some honorable members object. I am satisfied that their opposition to the proposal is not the result of the outlay which it involves. They do not want a second residence.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We object to the principle of maintaining two residences, irrespective of where they may be located.

Mr. WILKS.—I am satisfied that the average elector does not care where the Governor-General resides. He does not share in vice-regal entertainments. He is not amongst the chosen few who frequent Government-house. But I object to any abrogation of the federal compact. My reasons for believing that such a compact was made are: that the present Minister for Home Affairs arranged that the Governor-General should land in New South Wales; that the Commonwealth should be inaugurated there; that £20,000 should be expended in furnishing the State Government-house; and that His Excellency should reside there when Parliament was not in session. These facts were within the knowledge of every State Parliament throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS.—Why did New South Wales not provide the money necessary for the up-keep of the establishment?

Mr. WILKS.—She did, and she now offers to contribute a larger sum for that purpose than is asked from the remainder of the Commonwealth. The Government, however, have informed the Imperial authorities, in a despatch, that they will not allow any of the States to specially contribute to the maintenance of the Governor-General's establishment. The largest share of the £2,000 required for the up-keep of the Sydney residence will be exacted from New South Wales. Personally, I am satisfied that if we allow the Governor-General to remove his residence from that State, we shall hinder the establishment of the federal capital. The opposition to this proposal springs from a desire to prevent the speedy settlement of the federal capital site. It was a condition embodied in the Constitution that the capital should be in New South Wales territory, and naturally that State is grieved to find that after eighteen months, apart from two little trips to the country, nothing whatever has been done to carry out the terms of that compact. Is it surprising that I feel warm upon this subject? I noticed in the newspapers of to-day the following statement by a writer in the London Times :—

A suggestion has, I believe, been made that Lord Tennyson should spend part of his time as Acting Governor-General in Sydney. Here I must speak guardedly, because I have nothing but rumour to go upon ; but among the people in parliamentary circles who are interested in colonial affairs it is reported that a communication has been made by the Colonial-office to the State Government to the effect that, inasmuch as the Federal Government object to the Governor-General receiving any payment except from the Commonwealth Government, the Imperial authorities do not think that he ought to be called upon to keep up two Government-houses on his present salary.

Apparently, in those circles which are in touch with the Colonial-office, the impression is that the Governor-General cannot maintain two residences upon an annual salary of £10,000. Hence the reason why the Ministry desire to obtain an expression of opinion upon the matter by this House. I desire that the two vice-regal establishments shall be maintained in order that the creation of the federal capital shall be expedited. At the same time I am very sorry that the Attorney-General has adopted this method of ascertaining the pulse of the committee upon the matter. To my mind, the Government should have adopted the bold course of placing the necessary amount upon the Estimates, relying upon honorable members to vote it.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I regret that our friends from the great State of New South Wales have again raised the question of sectionalism, because there is no intention whatever on the part of this committee to do an injustice to that State. I can assure them that no honorable member intends to do anything which would cause the weakest child in New South Wales to shed a tear. I may further add that Tasmania is not anxious that the Governor-General shall reside in that State, for while he will always be a most estimable gentleman, he is undoubtedly a most expensive "show." He is a good deal like a man in America who owned a menagerie. After the menagerie had passed into the possession of the sheriff, the latter had to search out the owner and request him to take the elephants, snakes, &c., off his hands, as he did not know what to do with them. Similarly, Tasmania would not know what to do with the Governor-General. There is something about the utterances of the Attorney-General which fairly electrifies the House. There is an indescribable fascination about his eloquence. But I wish to correct his statements with regard to the expenditure upon the White House. The White House belongs to the Internal department. The President of the United States is allowed a salary of £10,000 a year, out of which he entertains the foreign ambassadors, his Ministers, and other important persons ; but the beautiful grounds round the White House, and the building itself, are maintained at the expense of the Government. In the same way, the Commonwealth should undertake the upkeep of the Government-house here. I oppose their present proposal, however, because of the way in which they have gone about the whole thing. If the motion is carried, no honorable member will be able in the future to criticise the actions or conduct of the Governor-General ; but, as members of this House, we are the custodians of the people's purse, and, therefore, should not be debarred from criticising the conduct of any official in the Commonwealth service, from the Governor-General down to the door-keeper of Parliament House. I shall never allow myself to be deprived of that right. It is a right given to us by the Constitution, and a right fought for by our forefathers, and won at such places as Bunker Hill and Lexington. Only a few days ago the papers announced that His Majesty the King had given a feast to 500,000 paupers, gathered together from the four corners of London. All honour to the King for his charity. But the conditions which produced those paupers should not be allowed to obtain in the Commonwealth. It is one of the curses of Australia that we have allowed to be introduced here feudalistic titles and all the despotism of privilege. We are to-day struggling against the spirit which democracy has for years vainly endeavoured to destroy—against a monster generated by corruption and nursed on the bosom of privilege. These grants mean the upholding of caste and rank, and it is caste and rank which have damned and blasted the European nations, so that now they are falling behind in the progress of the world. I am going to oppose this proposal, but if it is determined to provide for the upkeep of the Government-house in Melbourne, I shall not vote against the proposal to provide for the upkeep of Government-house in Sydney, because I think an agreement ought to be kept. But these antiquated systems which we are introducing will plunge us into a bondage more terrible than the darkness of Egypt. Like conditions everywhere produce like results. We have no pauperism in Australia now, because we are younger and bigger than other countries. But danger is lurking ahead. In my opinion it would be better to wipe the whole show out, and let any business man be Governor. McAlister, the Governor of Toronto, and the best man they have had, gets only £2,000 a year. The Governor of New York gets only £3,000 a year, although there are 7,000,000 people in that State; while the President of the Republic of Switzerland upholds the dignity of his State on a salary of £540 a year. The great curse of these aristocratic and quasi-aristocratic countries is that they must pile up the agony. They must gild the rooster, and have the diamonds glittering, or else they think they cannot have dignity. I look upon all institutions for the development of caste and rank as nothing less than gilded, stagnant lakes into which the rivers of privilege empty.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I am afraid that the discussion is becoming rather academic. In the first place, I am of opinion that the House is bound by the arrangement entered into by the Government with the Government of New South Wales, and that for three years at least we must vote such a sum as will provide for the upkeep of the Sydney Government-house. It must be admitted, I think, that we shall have to provide for the upkeep of at least one Government-house, and it cannot be said that the amount set down for expenditure in connexion with the Melbourne Government-house is too large. It must be remembered that the house and grounds must be kept in good order whether the Governor-General resides there or not, because a valuable State property cannot be allowed to fall into disrepair. I find that the whole amount set down for the maintenance of the Melbourne Government-house is only £3,100 a year, whereas the maintenance of these buildings and the adjacent gardens costs something like £4,000 a year. With regard to the Sydney Government-house, I am aware that some honorable members object to any expenditure there, upon the principle that there should not be two houses provided for the Governor-General. I understand that that is the position taken by the honorable member for Laanecoorie. But it must be recollected that an arrangement was entered into by this Government from which we can hardly draw back. I am not now discussing whether it was a good or a bad arrangement; but, as the executive determined, before this Parliament was elected, to lease the building for three years, we must carry out the contract. Even if I thought that no contract had been entered into, but was informed that the people of New South Wales would feel that we were breaking faith with them if we did not agree to this expenditure, I would say that it is too trivial an amount to quarrel about. After all, it is merely a matter of bookkeeping. The people have to find the money in any case, whether it is paid by the State or by the Commonwealth Government. In my opinion the people of Sydney will think that faith has been broken with them to some extent if this expenditure is not sanctioned.

Mr. SAWERS.—I do not think that one man in six will trouble his head about the matter.

Mr. CONROY.—I am very glad to hear the honorable member say that, but there may be some cavil on the part of those who would have liked to see the Federal site chosen quickly, and who think that there has been undue delay in that matter. They will think that it will involve a still further delay, and that will give rise to irritation out of all proportion, in my opinion, to the object to be achieved. If after the establishment of the federal capital in New South Wales it were suggested that a Government-house should be provided at Melbourne, Adelaide, Brisbane, Hobart, or Perth, at a cost of £2,000 or £3,000 a year for each place, I should not dream for a moment of opposing it, if I were informed it would make the people of those States believe that faith was being kept with them. What honorable member on either side would oppose the expenditure of even £50,000 if he were assured that it would create harmony amongst the people of the Commonwealth? If after the establishment of the federal capital I were to be informed that the people of Victoria desired to have a Governor-General's residence established in Melbourne at a cost of £2,000 or £3,000, I should be inclined to say that if the expenditure of that small sum of money were necessary to induce half-a-million of people in this city, and three-quarters of a million around them, to be satisfied that they were getting a fair share of attention, and that no provincialism was actuating the Government, I should be ready to vote for such a proposal. The question as to whether there should be only one Governor-General's residence is one which may be left to the debating schools. I am sure that if honorable members opposite understand that the effect of this proposal will be to remove discontent they will be prepared to vote for it. Though the honorable member for Laanecoorie and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne may object on principle to the establishment of two residences for the Governor-General, they will be prepared to waive that objection if they are assured that it is necessary to do so in order to bring about content. To carry out an existing arrangement the establishment of a Government-house is asked for in the case of New South Wales, and I think that the Federal Government, whether it likes it or not, will be bound to pay this sum. We must remember that although we are keeping up a Government-house in Melbourne and another in Sydney, we are not paying a single penny of interest on the cost of construction of those houses. I suppose that the cost of construction of the Melbourne Government-house alone amounts to over £500,000. It has been placed at our disposal rent free, and it is surely not too much to ask that the Federal Government should bear the expense of maintaining it. Government-house in Sydney must have cost an equally large sum, and it is not too much to ask that the Federal Government should pay merely for maintenance and repairs. After all, is it not absolutely a matter of bookkeeping? The money will have to come from the people whether it is paid by the State or the Commonwealth Government. The time has gone past when we should deal with States as having separate interests in these matters. We as Federal members should recognise that a tax collected by a State is a tax paid by a citizen of the Commonwealth, and that a tax collected by the Commonwealth is at the same time a tax paid by a citizen of one of the States. I think the Estimates submitted in the resolution are extremely moderate, and no objection has been taken to either of them even by the honorable member for Laanecoorie. When the honorable member is assured by honorable members from New South Wales that any departure from the agreement which has been made will be looked upon in that State as a breach of faith, he will not, I think, insist upon striking out the allowance for keeping up the Government-house in Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—This appears to me to be a very simple matter. It is not a question of whether we are in favour of two Government-houses or one. To my mind it is a question whether this Parliament is going to keep an honorable engagement entered into by the Federal Government. Let honorable members consider for a moment what has occurred: In New South Wales it was agreed that the Governor-General should be allowed to use Government-house in Sydney. That agreement was accepted by the Federal Government. There is an agreement extending over three years with the right of renewal for a further term of two years. Already a year's payment has been made on that account and on that basis, and no dissentient voice was raised in this House about the payment of that money. Not a single sound was heard in condemnation of the proposal until now, when honorable members suddenly wake up to find that they never have been in favour of the maintenance of two Government-houses, and that they never have been in favour as they say of the maintenance of the Government-house and grounds in Sydney. Is this the time when they should raise their protest? It seems to me that they have allowed the whole thing to go by the board. After eighteen months of actual occupation of the Government-house in Sydney they wake up to find that they do not approve of the agreement when one-half of its course has run.

Mr. HIGGINS. — We never knew before that there was any such bargain as an agreement to take the house for three years or five years.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Does the honorable and learned member mean to tell me that he has never seen the correspondence that passed between the Prime Minister and the Premier of New South Wales relative to Government-house, Sydney?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Not until to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am amazed to hear such a statement from the honorable and learned member. It is a singular omission on his part. It has been a matter of public notoriety. It has been published by the newspapers, and every newspaper in Melbourne has animadverted upon it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If we are to believe all we see in the newspapers where shall we be?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member will find that the matter has been referred to repeatedly in this House, and I venture to say that he is the only honorable member of the committee who has not been aware of it.

SEVERAL HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is most unfortunate that a matter of public notoriety for eighteen months, and as to which questions have been multiplied in this House on many occasions, should not be known to the honorable member. It is a singular thing that honorable members, who are usually so wide awake, should not be acquainted with the details of this agreement. However, there it is in black and white, and the Prime Minister, on behalf of the Cabinet, has undertaken the upkeep of Government-house in Sydney for three years, with the right of renewing the agreement for another two years if necessary. On the faith of that agreement, the New South Wales Government have taken another large house for the State Governor.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is a very strong point.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Another house has been taken for the State Governor in Victoria also.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—For a definite term, too?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, for a definite term, and they have gone to great expense in refurnishing it and making it a suitable residence for the State Governor. If these circumstances do not constitute an absolutely binding agreement as between the Federal Government and the State of New South Wales, I should like to know what honorable members would regard as a binding agreement.

Mr. SAWERS. — Would the honorable member always approve of what the Cabinet does?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, the moment I find the Cabinet doing what I do not believe in, I take the proper steps to challenge their action. I do not allow them to get away with a matter for eighteen months, and after an arrangement has become almost hoary with age, then begin to repudiate it. It is useless to do so in the first place, and it seems to me that if the House should take the extreme step of not consenting to this agreement entered into by the Federal Government, there is only one thing which that Government can do as honorable men, and that is to throw the responsibility upon the House of taking no further steps in regard to that agreement. Could any self-respecting Government carry on in the face of a vote like that? An agreement was entered into by the Federal Government, and there were numberless comments upon it in all the Melbourne newspapers, and I am surprised that honorable members living in Melbourne had not heard of it before. The question is, are we to faithfully carry out the agreement entered into between the Federal Government and New South Wales? This compact was made on account of the peculiar position New South Wales occupied in regard to the federal bargain. The Constitution does not provide that the seat of Government shall be in Melbourne. The whole of the arrangements for the meeting of Parliament in Melbourne, for the residence of the Governor-General there while Parliament is sitting, and for having the executive and administrative offices also situated there were dictated by convenience and were suggested by the temporary difficulty of fixing upon the site of the federal capital in New South Wales. The Constitution does not provide that the Governor-General shall reside in Melbourne, but it implies that a Government-house shall be maintained in Sydney, although this is not obligatory until the federal site is fixed within that State. The Federal Parliament is to meet in Melbourne only until all the final arrangements for locating it in its permanent home can be made, and the present arrangements are clearly of a temporary character. It is because of that portion of the bargain, by virtue of which New South Wales claims to have the federal capital situated within her territory, and the Governor-General resident in Sydney, that the arrangement for the temporary residence of His Excellency in Sydney was made, and we shall not carry out the spirit and intention of the Constitution unless we abide by that compact. I can scarcely bring myself to believe that the representatives of Victoria would be parties to any abrogation of the bargain entered into with New South Wales. I could understand it if the representatives of some of the smaller States were rather critical, but it does not lie in the mouths of the representatives of Victoria to cavil at the Government proposals. An agreement has been made by this Parliament through the Government which it supports. A large expenditure has been incurred by the Government of New South Wales on the faith of that agreement, and I confidently appeal to honorable members to carry out the manifest spirit and intention of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I think the expressions used in the motion now before us ought to be carefully considered, because I understand that certain action is to be taken by the Government upon the strength of it. We are told that our decision is to be conveyed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and that it will no doubt be communicated to those gentlemen who may be offered the position of Governor-General. The motion commits us to the maintenance of at least two residences for the Governor-General, without any limit as to time. It also—through the papers to which it refers—commits us to the establishment of the new office of Secretary to the Federal Executive Council, a proposal which has not previously been discussed here.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not see why that provision should be included in the proposals.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is placed there for the information of honorable members.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I feel also that the Government have carefully avoided pledging themselves not to ask for further votes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I explained why the motion was framed in its present form.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I had not the advantage of hearing the Minister explaining that point. I hope that he quite understands I do not make the statement offensively; but there is nothing in the wording of the resolution to prevent the Government from coming down in a few months' time, and saying that the money voted is not sufficient for the purpose, and asking for a further appropriation. I feel that there is a great deal of force in the view put forward by the honorable member for Parramatta, namely, that the Federal Government is committed by the agreement entered into with the Government of New South Wales to the maintenance of Government-house at Sydney for a period of three, or, perhaps, five years. I heard of this for the first time to-day, because I much prefer to depend upon official communications than upon news published in the newspapers one day and perhaps withdrawn the next. The Government have practically taken over Government-house in Sydney from 1st January, 1901, rent free, but subject to an obligation to maintain it in good order. Speaking with all respect, I think this was a mistake on the part of the Government. But it is not for us, unless we are prepared to take the extreme course of punishing the Government, to repudiate the bargain made by them. Under the circumstances, therefore, I suggest that we should ease the position, if we could limit the operation of the motion to the period ending December 31st, 1903. I am opposed to the maintenance of two Government-houses out of the Commonwealth funds. At the same time, I wish to assure some honorable members from New South Wales that they are mistaken in supposing that there is a desire on our part to keep the federal capital in Victoria. I speak with a good deal of knowledge when I say that it is not the desire of Victorians to keep the capital in their State. So far as I can gather from most of those with whom I come in contact, they would far rather have the capital in Sydney than create a new capital in the bush, as is now provided for under the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I object to that. Let us adhere to the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—My own opinion, and that of most of those with whom I have discussed this matter, is that the amendment of the Constitution made by the Premiers was weak, pawky, and inexpedient, and that, looking at the question broadly, it would have been much better had it been left to the Federal Parliament to decide upon the site of the federal capital. However, that is a matter of opinion. It is a pity that at the inception of our Commonwealth, when our finances are not in a particularly flourishing condition, we should be forced to incur the huge expense involved in creating a new federal capital. Another misapprehension which I desire to correct is one upon which the honorable member for Dalley laid great stress. He said that the Government of Victoria had repudiated a bargain into which they had entered with the Government of New South Wales for the contribution of £3,000 per annum towards the maintenance of the establishments of the Governor-General. There was no such bargain. I have the correspondence here, and there is no mention of any such compact on the part of the States Premiers. The alleged bargain has been referred to upon the public platforms in many parts of New South Wales, but there is no evidence whatever to support the statement that such a compact was entered into. Some negotiations took place between the Premier of New South Wales and the Secretary of State for the Colonies with regard to the residence for the Governor-General being established in Sydney. Then there was some communication between Sir Edmund Barton, who was in London as a delegate from Australia at the time, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to the provision that should be made for the upkeep of the residence. Some correspondence took place between Sir Edmund Barton and the States Premiers, and eventually it would seem that the Premiers of the various States expressed themselves as not entertaining any objection to the Governor-General residing in Sydney when Parliament was not in session.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But did not the Premier of Victoria submit to the State Parliament a Bill providing for a contribution by Victoria towards the expenses of the Governor-General's establishment?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am speaking of a bargain.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Was there not an arrangement between the Premiers that they should submit Bills to their respective Parliaments providing for the contributions?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Where is the bargain?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The fact that the Premiers submitted Bills to their respective Parliaments shows that there was some arrangement.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We have now before us, presumably, the whole of the correspondence, and it does not disclose the slightest shadow of a bargain. The New South Wales Parliament voted £3,000 towards the expenses of the Governor-General's establishment, and a Bill providing for the payment of a similar sum was brought forward in the Victorian Parliament, and defeated by a very large majority. There was no bargain entered into between the States. The fact of a Minister introducing a Bill into Parliament does not necessarily imply that any bargain had been entered into to make any payment. The only fact of which the honorable member is sure is that a Bill was introduced. It may be that the Premier of Victoria promised to submit such a Bill, but that did not pledge the State Parliament to pass it. I want those honorable members who declare that a bargain was made to point to the bargain. Where is it? It is very anti-federal, and it is certainly very galling to those who desire to keep faith with New South Wales to find such accusations continually being made. So far as I am concerned, although I disapproved of the provision which was inserted in the Constitution with regard to the federal capital, I am bound in honour to expedite the carrying out of that arrangement. I am quite sure that is our only duty. I am very glad that the Government have declined to allow the Governor-General to accept a special contribution from any State Government. I believe that in New South Wales a Bill was passed under which that State would have contributed £3,000 annually towards the vice-regal establishment. The preamble to the measure is—"Whereas it is thought desirable that this colony should contribute to raise the amount to be received by the Governor-General to £20,000," &c. May I ask the Attorney-General if any part of that sum of £3,000 has been received?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am very glad. The Governor-General's duties are towards the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth should be his sole paymaster. I am pleased indeed that the Ministry have refused to sanction a special contribution from any State Government. Even had the offer emanated from all the States it ought to have been rejected. I agree with the Attorney-General that the sum which we are asked to vote in connexion with the upkeep of the Sydney Government-house constitutes "paring to the bone." There is no doubt that £2,077 is a very small sum for the maintenance of a huge establishment like that in Sydney. But it has been my invariable experience that, if one "pares to the bone," he has to spend more money afterwards. I believe in the old adage that "a stitch in time saves nine." If we sanction the expenditure of this £2,077 for the maintenance of the vice-regal establishment in Sydney, I am of opinion that the Government will subsequently come down and say—"It has been found that we cannot keep up the establishment for the amount voted; the committee have already affirmed the principle that there shall be two Government-houses, and we are under a moral obligation to maintain the Government-house at Sydney in good condition for so many years." Last year I find that £2,500 was expended in the maintenance of and repairs to that establishment. This year, however, it is proposed to spend only £250 upon its maintenance. If that amount is sufficient for the purpose, how is it that £2,500 was expended last year, especially in view of the fact that £20,000 had been expended by the New South Wales Government in the first instance?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—But that amount includes the maintenance of the grounds and cost of caretakers.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That fact is not set out. I should like to compare the vice-Regal establishment in Melbourne also. The repairs in connexion with the former cost £2,000 as against £500 expended upon its maintenance. The fittings and furniture cost £900 during one year, and £600 during the following year. Are these figures based upon expert evidence?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The establishments now are under the control of the department of Home Affairs, and each item has been carefully examined with the results which are before honorable members. I think that the amounts provided will be sufficient, but if they are not, they will be very nearly so.

Mr. HIGGINS.—With regard to the proposed Secretary to the Executive Council, I would point out that hitherto there has been no such office. If we pass this motion unqualified, I should like to know whether we are committed to the office?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think that we ought to be.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That item ought to be omitted. It is foreign to the others.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It seems to me to be foreign to them. To my mind, that proposal should be discussed upon its merits in committee of supply. Perhaps the Attorney-General may see his way clear to limit the operation of this resolution to the end of 1903. I am against the maintenance of two Government-houses, but at the same time I think that the Government have committed us to a bargain until the expiration of three years from the inauguration of the Commonwealth. I think we are in duty bound to carry out their promise.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the honorable and learned member will recollect, the object in submitting this proposal in anticipation of the Estimates is that it may form the basis of information to whoever may accept the office of Governor-General in succession to the present Acting Governor-General. Consequently, if any limitation is attached to it, I hope it will be one which is applicable to the term of office of the next Governor-General. Parliament will then be free to revise the arrangement during his tenure in respect to his successor. The object in bringing the matter forward at the present time is to enable the Secretary of State for the Colonies to undertake the task of securing the most competent man whom he can persuade to accept the position. Before any person accepted it he would naturally desire to know what conditions are attached to it. If an alteration is made it will, of course, come before the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but it would be very much more satisfactory if the motion were agreed to in its present form.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I would point out to the Attorney-General that the fact of an officer having to keep up two Government-houses is no inducement to him to accept the position. We shall have no difficulty in securing a suitable occupant of the office, if it is clearly understood that he is not expected to maintain two vice-regal establishments after 1903. At the same time he ought to be given an intimation that if only one Government-house is to be maintained the allowances will be so and so. To be required to keep up two distinct establishments will deter men from accepting the position. I submit that £2,077 will be found altogether insufficient for the upkeep of the Government-house, Sydney. I do not care where the vice-regal establishment is located, but I desire to see only one house maintained by the Commonwealth.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Is not that shunting the whole thing in another way?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I can assure the honorable member that if a vote were taken upon the bare issue of whether a second Government-house ought to be kept up by the Commonwealth he would be badly defeated. I feel that the majority of the people are against the maintenance of two Government-houses, although they do not care where the Governor-General resides so long as he is properly housed.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But the Government-house where Parliament is sitting must be kept up.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Very likely. If a person gets hold of the foal, of course the mare will follow.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The honorable and learned member says that he does not care where the vice-regal establishment is located, because he knows that the Governor-General must reside in Melbourne, whilst the Parliament is in session.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That matter, however, was not decided by me. The honorable member advocated the adoption of a Constitution which compels the Parliament to sit in Melbourne. I opposed it, and, therefore, the honorable member, and not myself, is responsible.

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—I think that the committee ought to arrive at a vote as soon as possible. I have listened to the debate this afternoon with a considerable amount of pain, and I certainly am of opinion that we cannot expect the federal feeling to grow amongst the people unless we show a better example of it in this Chamber. At the end of sixteen months surely we ought to have got a little nearer to each other than the sentiments which have been expressed to-day appear to indicate. I trust, however, that the feeling which has been evinced is only upon the surface, and that deep down in our hearts we are prepared to act in a more federal spirit. I am at a loss to understand the opposition to this proposal. No one has said that he opposes the expenditure for reasons of economy, which are the only reasons upon which I think it could be opposed. I hold that the arrangements made anterior to the establishment of the Commonwealth, and the great expense gone to by the Government of New South Wales in improving the accommodation at the Government-house, Sydney, upon the understanding that it would be used by the Governor-General, bind us as men of honour to agree to this expenditure. I feel that if I did not vote for the present proposals of the Government I should be guilty of an act of repudiation. The point raised that the expenditure should be provided for in some other way is only a question of tweedledum and tweedledee. The Government are justified under the circumstances in ascertaining what, in the opinion of honorable members, is the basis upon which the Governor-General should be expected to take up his residence amongst us. We should not grudge the proposed expenditure to our friends in New South Wales. During the consideration of the Tariff, we have had some hard battles here; but now that the session is coming to a close we might gracefully pass this grant without a division, so that there may be a better spirit between the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria. We have heard too much of both States in the past, and I hope that the comparisons which have been so frequent will at length be dropped. But, while I wish to see every compact entered into by the Commonwealth Government honourably carried out, I could not at the present time vote for the expenditure of any large sum of money upon the building of a federal capital. Rather than do that, I would be prepared to agree to a proposal for the meeting of the Federal Parliament in Sydney for a time. We have waterworks and other large undertakings to carry out before we shall be justified in spending huge sums of money in the erection of unproductive buildings out in the bush. But we who represent Victoria must, in considering this matter, put ourselves in the position of the representatives of New South Wales. I think that if we were in their position, we should act as they are acting. If I were a member of the New South Wales Parliament, and had heard this debate, I would go back to the Premier of that State, and say—"Do not take this money. Let us rather provide the expenditure from our own revenue." If the State of New South Wales did that, the Commonwealth would be humiliated. I trust that the motion will be passed with very little further discussion.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I strongly object to the remarks of the last speaker, who said that those who opposed this grant are anti-federalists.

Mr. McCOLL.—A great many of the speeches which have been made have been anti-federal.

Mr. CROUCH.—The acting leader of the Opposition, in strongly supporting the motion attempting to set up Sydney as a seat of government against the wording of the Constitution, showed as narrow and provincial a spirit as has been displayed in any debate that has taken place since this Parliament first met. He is strongly in favour of Sydney being made a federal centre. But if Sydney is to be regarded as a federal centre, and is to be given money to entertain the Governor-General there, why should not other cities be similarly treated? As Melbourne is the federal capital for the time being, Sydney is merely a provincial centre, and Hobart, Geelong, Ballarat, Adelaide, Brisbane, and Perth, as other provincial centres, have equal rights with Sydney. The honorable member for Wentworth is advocating the interests of his own State in opposition to the interests of the whole Commonwealth. I resent the statement of the honorable member for Echuca, that those who oppose this motion do so for anti-federal reasons. If any State capital has a right to be specially considered in this connexion, it is the former federal capital of Australia—Hobart—where the Federal Council met for years. If the rights of provincial centres are to be considered, Hobart has far better claims than Sydney has in connexion with this matter. I regret, however, that these provincial claims have been brought forward. It has been said that a compact has been made with the people of New South Wales, but that compact, if made, was made by duress and misrepresentation, and therefore is not binding. I say that it was made by duress, because the people of Sydney, in opposition to the interests of New South Wales and of Australia, used their strong position to force the other States to agree to a federal union under certain conditions. New South Wales held the revolver at the heads of the other States by saying that she would not join the union if she did not get her own way. Sydney played for her own hand absolutely, against the interests of Australia, in order to secure a State advantage. Furthermore, the compact was brought about by misrepresentation. The people of Victoria, who accepted the Bill as amended by the Premiers' Conference, never heard of the compact to which reference has been made. If they had known that they were being deceived, that the Constitution Bill which was presented for their acceptance was not the real bargain, but that there was a secret compact in favour of Sydney, and that the rights of Victoria had been abandoned during the conference of the Premiers, they would not have voted for the union of the States with as much enthusiasm as they did. The honorable member for Wentworth, if he knew of the misrepresentation which then took place, was a party to it; but if he did not know of it, he cannot say now that any compact was entered into.

Mr. CONROY.—Will the honorable and learned member express his disapproval of the action of the Government by voting to turn them out?

Mr. CROUCH.—I am willing to vote against this motion, and, if the honorable and learned member thinks as I do, he should vote with me. I trust that the proposal of the Government will be defeated, and that, if we cannot prevent the expenditure of the £5,500 proposed, we should at least reduce it to £3,100.

Mr. POYNTON (South Australia).—The honorable member for Echuca said that he regretted to note the existence of an anti-federal spirit in the House. I deny that any such spirit exists here, though there is cause for it in the action of the Government in the whole of this business. The Government seems on every occasion to have adopted the wrong way of dealing with the matter. A few months ago a Bill was introduced to provide for expenditure in connexion with the Governor-General's establishment, which should have been provided for on the Estimates. That Bill was very much altered, but ever since then the Government have made a continuous series of blunders with regard to the whole question. It has been stated to-day that an arrangement was made between the States about the keeping up of two Government-houses, but I remember distinctly that when it was stated in the daily newspapers that the Parliament of New South Wales had voted a certain sum of money towards making good an additional grant of £10,000 to the Governor-General, the South Australian Premier of the day was asked in Parliament if he had been consulted about the matter, and his answer was that he knew nothing about it except what he had read in the newspapers. Yet we are told to-day that the various States Governments agreed to this arrangement.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a mistake. There was no such agreement.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member for Echuca said that he could understand an objection to this proposal on the ground of economy. But I say unhesitatingly that the sum proposed is not a large one. Does the Acting Prime Minister really think that we shall not be asked within a short time to supplement it?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not think that we shall.

Mr. POYNTON.—Shall we not later on be billed by the States with accounts for the railway travelling of the Governor-General? The Government have had time since the matter was first brought before us to ascertain definitely what the States intend to do. We have no assurance from them that they do not intend to charge us for the railway travelling of the Governor-General. That being so, we may within the next twelve months be called upon to foot a pretty heavy bill for railway travelling. As a matter of fact, the Government have already been billed, and, although they have refused to settle the account, that does not end the matter. Later on we shall be told that there has been a breach of an agreement; that the arrangement for the upkeep of two Government-houses implied an undertaking to pay for the travelling between them. The amount set down here is within the estimate which was arrived at by the Convention in 1898, though there was then no intent on of providing for two establishments. If there had been that intention, the estimate would have been very much larger. Are we to understand that the Sydney Government-house is to be retained by the Commonwealth for all time? I do not know that I have much more to say upon this proposal. I intend to vote against the whole thing as a protest against the method which the Government has adopted in dealing with this question generally. Their course of action has been a series of bungles from start to finish. We had more discussion of the Governor-General's establishment than there would have been any necessity for if the Government had dealt with the matter in a statesmanlike manner. By the action of the Government the House has been placed in a false position. Before we are many years older those who will be in this Chamber will be told that they are in honour bound to support further votes proposed in connexion with the establishment of the Governor-General. I do not believe that it is possible to keep up the two establishments in Melbourne and Sydney for the sum proposed. I remind honorable members that the proposal implies, in addition to the sum stated, a fair claim upon the Parliament for railway charges between the two establishments. Those who will later on be called upon to foot the bill will be told that it must have been clearly understood that when two establishments were provided—one in Sydney, and the other in Melbourne—there must be some means of communication between the two; and the expense of that communication will be submitted as being only a fair charge, and a natural corollary of the agreement entered into.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—As this proposal stands at present, I intend to vote against it. I shall vote for the Government proposal only on the condition that the charge for the maintenance of the two houses shall be limited to the term mentioned in the agreement already entered into. It is not altogether to the amount involved that I take exception, though I venture to say that the Acting Prime Minister, with his experience, will not attempt to demonstrate that the sum proposed in the resolution will be sufficient for the upkeep of these two establishments. The honorable gentleman has himself told the committee that the States of New South Wales and Victoria have each paid more for the maintenance and upkeep of Government-house in their respective States than he proposes under this resolution to expend upon the upkeep of the two. How utterly absurd it is, therefore, to imagine that this sum is going to be sufficient to maintain both. It is simply burking the whole question. The introduction of the proposal in this way is getting in the thin edge of the wedge, and when a further request is made to pay up arrears, the House of Representatives will be told that the money is spent. We have had too much of that way of doing business, and, as I have previously stated, the only way in which we can prevent this expense is by refusing to vote the money. I point out that we are here setting up a standard for all and sundry to follow. As I understand the Constitution, the effect will be to make it more expensive for future Governors-General, as they will be obliged to maintain a residence in Sydney and in Melbourne, practically for the whole year. Later on we shall no doubt have the Federal Government coming down with a proposal for the establishment of federal offices in Sydney and in all the other State capitals. The proposal to my mind, is utterly absurd, and I shall vote against it unless it is limited to the term of the agreement which has been entered into, when it is probable that the Federal Government will have a home of its own.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I should like to say, with regard to the proposal to limit the operation of the resolution, that it seems to me that we should be true to ourselves as a business Chamber. If the proposal of the Government is anything at all, it is a proposal to enable them to communicate with the Home authorities as to the actual financial position regarding the establishment of future Governors-General. It seems to me to be a very reasonable and sensible proposal. If we carry out the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and confine the operation of the resolution to a period of three years, can we expect that a Governor-General will come here under conditions which may be altered during his term of office? I think it would be far better to deal with the matter on the good faith of the Government. They have decided that this is to be taken as an interim provision, subject to alteration in the light of further experience. There are many things which we are doing in this Commonwealth in connexion with which it is impossible for any one to know all the conditions and expenses involved. It would certainly be more business-like to have a proposal which will undergo no change during the term of office of a Governor-General. I am sure that, for the sake of the honour of this House and the credit of its business capacity, honorable members will not consent to a proposal limiting the operation of this resolution to a period of three years, when a Governor-General may be in the middle of his term of office.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—One of the matters which should be considered in dealing with this question is the extent to which the State and people of New South Wales were induced to look to the Commonwealth Government for some arrangement of this character. I know it has been denied that there was anything in the nature of an agreement between the State of New South Wales and the Commonwealth, or between the State of New South Wales and the State of Victoria, regarding this matter. Whilst it is probable that there is nothing in the Federal Constitution relating to the matter, and that there may be nothing in the nature of a formal agreement between the States bearing upon it, I still think there was a certain understanding anterior to federation between the people and Government of New South Wales and the peoples and Governments of the other States, and particularly of Victoria, who were engaged in negotiations which finally led up to the acceptance of the Constitution by the people of New South Wales.

Mr. POYNTON.—Sir George Turner, as Premier of Victoria at the time, has denied it.

Mr. BROWN.—I have not heard his denial, and I should like to be sure that he denies that there was any understanding of that character.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He does deny it.

Mr. BROWN.—I have it now from the Acting Prime Minister that Sir George Turner does deny it, and that being so, I am bound to say that the people of New South Wales were under a misapprehension in regard to the matter. When the Constitution was defeated on the first referendum, there were negotiations between the Premiers of the States which led up to what was known in New South Wales as "the secret conference," a conference of the Premiers representing the different States in which certain agreements were arrived at. How they were arrived at is kept secret, because the meetings were not open to the press, and the press and the public were only informed that certain conclusions had been arrived at. These were embodied as alterations in the Constitution, which was then submitted to a referendum vote, not only of the people of New South Wales, but of the peoples of the other States who had approved of the original Constitution, with the difference, of course, that on the second occasion Queensland was induced to come in. That State took no part in the first referendum, and at that stage appeared to have made up her mind to stand outside of the federal movement for the time being. It was represented to the people of New South Wales that, as the result of the Premiers' conference, certain arrangements were to be made, and, amongst others, that the federal capital should be located in New South Wales, subject to certain limitations, and that in the meantime the Federal Parliament should meet in Melbourne. What the people of New South Wales were led to believe, and what many of them now believe, was that the understanding arrived at by the conference was that, whilst the Commonwealth Parliament should meet in Melbourne, it should be necessary for the Governor-General to reside in that city, and it was therefore necessary that the State of Victoria should make provision for his residence. It was also understood that during the recess, when honorable members had returned to their respective States, the Governor-General, if he chose, should reside in the chief city of New South Wales. That was one position placed before the people of New South Wales prior to the taking of the referendum.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member say that any federal leader in New South Wales asserted that that was an understanding?

Mr. BROWN.—I am not prepared now to name any federal leader who asserted that, but I think I can be borne out in the statement that that impression was prevalent in New South Wales. So far as I am personally concerned, that consideration had no weight with me, because when the question of remitting the decision as to the seat of the Federal Government to the Premiers' conference was proposed in the State Parliament of New South Wales, I was one of the few who voted against it. I considered that there were other issues, of far greater importance, which should receive attention. But in battling against the acceptance of the Constitution on the second referendum, I was met with this argument at nearly every meeting I addressed: It was contended that there would be no injustice done to New South Wales under the arrangement that the Governor-General should divide his residence in the Commonwealth between that State and Victoria during the time preceding the allocation of the federal territory. This was an important consideration in the minds of the people of New South Wales, and was urged very strongly as an inducement to them to adopt the Constitution. There were indications of some general understanding, because the Government of New South Wales initiated legislation making provision for a contribution by that State towards the expenses of the Governor-General's establishment. The Premier of Victoria introduced similar legislation into the Parliament of that State, and if he had been sufficiently supported, Victoria would have stood committed to a contribution of £3,000 per annum. Now we are told that this action was taken quite apart from any understanding arrived at by the Premiers of the States. I am bound to accept the assurance of the Acting Prime Minister that there was no understanding, but it is difficult to conceive how such a strong impression could have been created in the minds of the legislators and the people generally of New South Wales in the absence of some compact such as has been referred to. The Premier of Victoria, at least, thought at one time that an arrangement of this kind should be entered into, and there must have been some common inspiration for his action, and that taken by the Premiers in other States. We were not informed in New South Wales that the course adopted by the Government of New South Wales was the result of despatches received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, but we were led to believe that it was due to an understanding arrived at between the Premiers at the conference held by them some little time before. The matter has now reached such a stage that this Parliament is in duty bound to adopt the Government proposals. If the people of New South Wales were misled, their misapprehension should have been corrected before this, as it is rather late in the day to disillusionise them. It will be difficult to induce them to believe that there was no understanding, and any attempt to vary the arrangements for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney will be regarded by them as a manifestation of an anti-federal spirit. I do not see that there is any great objection to the Governor-General visiting the capitals of the Commonwealth. It is not desirable that the Governor-General should be tied to Melbourne while the seat of government is in that city, or that, when the Federal Parliament is established in its permanent home, we should place a ring fence around the capital and prevent the Governor-General from visiting the capitals of the various States.

Mr. POYNTOX.—Would the honorable member be in favour of maintaining six establishments—one in each of the capitals?

Mr. BROWN.—I am prepared to grant to His Excellency every facility for visiting the States, and if the Government of South Australia will place a residence at his disposal, I am willing that that State should be treated in exactly the same way as the others. The honorable member, for Tasmania,

Mr. O'Malley, has stated that there is no necessity for a Governor-General in a democracy, but that question should have been dealt with when the Constitution was being framed. It is all very well to talk about the appointment of a Governor-General being inimical to a true democracy, but if the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, will turn to the United States, he will see that the people there have been ground down by multi-millionaires to a far greater extent than have the people under our system of government. If the honorable member wishes to do away with those elements in the community that are detrimental to the best interests of democracy he will require to turn his attention first to the abolition of multi-millionaires and trusts. As a federation under the Crown we must have some one representing the Crown. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne denied that there was any question of federal feeling involved in this matter, and he stated that he would be loth to do anything that would convey the impression to the people of New South Wales that the opposition to the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney was due to the existence of an anti-federal spirit in Victoria. At the same time the honorable and learned member wishes to limit the operation of the motion to the period for which the Ministers have entered into an arrangement with the Government of New South Wales. I would point out, however, that if it is a good thing to ratify the arrangement entered into for that period it should be just as desirable to continue it until such time as the Federal Parliament is located in its permanent home.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does not the honorable member see that the motion provides for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney for all time?

Mr. BROWN.—I do not agree with the honorable member. It simply provides for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney during the period which must elapse before the federal capital is established. When the residence of the Governor-General has been established within federal territory, it will be open to this Parliament to decide whether the present arrangement in respect of Melbourne, and the proposed arrangement in respect of Sydney, or any of the other State capitals shall continue. Honorable members should recollect that in anticipation of that compact being honorably carried out, the Government of New South Wales, at considerable expense to themselves, have handed over the State Government-house for the accommodation of the Governor-General. They have arranged for the accommodation of the State Governor elsewhere. Are they now to be told that that arrangement was made upon their own initiative, and that the federal authorities are under no obligation in respect to it? That would be an unfair position to assume towards the Government or people of New South Wales. I intend to support the proposal which has been submitted by the Attorney-General, because I believe that it loyally carries out pre-federal arrangements. Instead of the people of New South Wales forcing this matter on by misrepresentation, it seems to me that if the compact is not carried out they will have every right to complain.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—In listening to this debate, I was very much surprised at the statement made by some honorable members from across the border that in New South Wales the Constitution was carried because it was understood that the Governor-General was to reside there for a few months in each of a few years. Without doubting the veracity of any honorable member, that statement appears to me to be almost incredible. There was no State in the Union in which the Constitution in all its bearings was so fully discussed as it was in New South Wales, and under those circumstances I can scarcely realize that such a comparatively unimportant matter as where the Crown's representatives should reside during a few of the earlier years of the federation carried so much weight. But leaving out of consideration what was the understanding, it seems to me that this is not a question of whether Victoria or New South Wales is to hold up the body of the Governor-General for a few years as the spoils of war. The question is whether we are to establish a good or bad precedent regarding the expenditure of moneys belonging to the public, who we know are insistent that this Parliament shall exercise economy in every possible direction.

Mr. WILKS.—Let us have a speedy settlement of the capital site.

Mr. McCAY.—I have not the slightest objection to the adoption of that course. I think it was a huge mistake to insert in the Constitution the provision relating to that matter, and to bar all the other State capitals from becoming the future federal capital. The 100-miles ring around Sydney is not nearly as big as is the ring around the other capitals. I should be perfectly willing to put the names of Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide in a hat, and to draw lots as to which should be the capital. But, after all, the determination of this question, or of the temporary residence of the Governor-General, is of small importance compared with the great matters at issue in connexion with the federation. I cannot assume that the people of New South Wales would believe that that State had been wronged if Parliament declined to vote an annual sum of £2,000 for the maintenance of the vice-regal establishment in Sydney. The real question at issue is, whether in expending this money, we are setting a good example in regard to economies which must be exercised by this Parliament in all sorts of directions for years to come, if the States are to be assisted in keeping down unnecessary expenditure. It has been said, and certainly the correspondence was laid upon the table to-day induces the belief, that we have entered into a sort of tenancy in respect of the Government-houses in Sydney and Melbourne. Granting that that is so, I cannot see why we should ask the people of the Commonwealth to continue that tenancy any longer than is necessary. In each case the contract expires at the end of 1903, and I do not see why it should continue one moment longer. In certain despatches it is even suggested that when the Federal capital is established a third residence should be provided for the Governor-General. Apparently we are to have one residence at the Federal capital, another at Melbourne, and a third at Sydney. When the Federal capital has been established within Commonwealth territory, I shall certainly refuse to vote for the maintenance of any vice-Regal residence, either in Melbourne or Sydney. I would not now vote for the upkeep of the Government-house in Melbourne, if Parliament were not sitting here. But where Parliament is in session, there the Governor-General must be located. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that the Governor-General should have an establishment in Melbourne. That is unavoidable in the carrying on of the Government of the country, and that is the reason why I distinguish between the two portions of this motion. I am satisfied that the possibility of having the Governor-General's presence in Melbourne for a few months each year did not induce the people of Victoria to accept the Federal Constitution. They accepted it——

Mr. WILKS.—Because they thought it was a good bargain.

Mr. McCAY.—I am sure that if they entertained that impression they are very much disappointed. But the fact is that they accepted it because they believed that Victoria, like the rest of Australia, would benefit by the union, and in spite of all that has been said, I think that most of us believe that this great machine, so soon as its bearings get into proper order, will work smoothly. There was bound to be trouble at the beginning, and that trouble has been accentuated by the great drought which has overtaken Australia. I do not think that New South Wales will consider that she has been grievously wronged if Government-house is not kept open for the occupation of the Governor-General during four or five months in each year. It is because I feel that the maintenance of two vice-Regal establishments constitutes an example of unnecessary expenditure in high places that I cannot support the proposal of the Government. In discussing matters of this kind, the people seize upon points here and there. They will be only too ready to say—“You have spent so many thousands of pounds in connexion with the Governor-General, and yet you refuse to expend a thousand pence to assist certain people who are in very much more need of it.” In spite of the moral effect which the presence of His Excellency might have upon Sydney, I think that its natural attractions are quite sufficient. I feel bound to abide by the bargain which I consider has been made, and which must continue for three years from the date of the inauguration of the Commonwealth, much as I disapprove of it. It would be quite useless, however, to continue that arrangement until just after the beginning of a Governor-General's term of office. I hold that the Government should not have made such an arrangement until it had ascertained the wishes of Parliament in this matter. Occasionally, however, the Government have assumed too much and have discovered that their ideas concerning the wishes of this House have been very much at fault. I feel bound to express my disapproval of the motion, and in the performance of what I conceive to be my duty, but in no spirit of hostility to my friends across the border, to vote against it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that something should be said by the representatives of New South Wales in regard to the proposal of the Government to expend £5,500 upon the up-keep of the Government-houses in Sydney and Melbourne, because honorable gentlemen opposite appear to have overlooked the fact that an agreement was entered into with the Government of New South Wales to lease the Government-house in Sydney for a period of three years, with the right of renewal for another two years. In view of that agreement, the Government of New South Wales spent £20,000 in adding to the building, and another £7,000 in providing a residence for the State Governor. Yet honorable gentlemen opposite tell us that they did not know of any such agreement.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Was not the expenditure to which the honorable member refers entered into before the agreement was made?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It was incurred in view of the possibility of Government-house being used by the Governor-General.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Federal Government had not committed themselves at the time.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I think there was an understanding that the Governor-General should reside in Sydney for a certain period of the year. If the honorable member is of the opinion that £20,000 was spent upon the building because it was in a state of disrepair, I would like to inform him that only a short time previously something like £7,000 was spent in renovating it for the reception of Lord Beauchamp, and that every year a large sum of money is voted for its maintenance. Had there been no agreement with the Federal Government it would not have been necessary to provide a residence for the State Governor, but as that has been done, and as the New South Wales Government have spent a large sum in adding to and improving the old Government-house, because of the agreement with the Federal Government, it is the duty of this Parliament to see that the agreement is honorably kept. There is no inclination on the part of the Government to withdraw from it, but some of their supporters seem to be unable to find a reason for supporting them on this occasion. I would point out to the representatives of Victoria that the agreement in regard to the Government-house, Melbourne, is no more binding than the agreement in regard to the Government-house, Sydney. That being so, why should they wish the Government to withdraw from one and to fulfil the other? The attitude of those honorable gentlemen is a display of that provincialism of which we have heard so much. There may be a feeling on their part that, if the Governor-General resides in Sydney, the occupancy of Government-house, Melbourne, may be on a less firm and lasting footing. I do not wish to see the Governor-General continue to reside in Melbourne, because another compact was entered into with New South Wales, and that was that the federal capital and the permanent residence of the Governor-General should be within the borders of that State; but until the federal capital is chosen I think the Governor-General should live part of the year in Sydney, and part of the year in Melbourne. Apparently provision has been made for the occupancy of the Sydney Government-house for four months in the year. The representatives of Victoria cannot find much to grumble at in that, seeing that he will reside eight months in Melbourne. New South Wales is being called upon to occupy a position second to that of South Australia in this matter, because Lord Tennyson, since he has been Acting Governor-General, has made several trips to Adelaide, while he has not been to Sydney at all, and we have no guarantee that that state of things will not continue.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why should there not be a Commonwealth Government-house in Adelaide?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have no objection to the Governor-General visiting Adelaide. In my opinion it is his duty to make himself seen and known in every State capital. When I was in Canada, I was informed that the Dufferin-mansion, at Quebec, is occupied for a period every year by the Governor-General of the Dominion, and the representatives of New South Wales ask that Government-house, Sydney, shall be similarly occupied by the Governor-General of Australia. Sydney is the most important city in the union.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Not in point of population!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In commerce and in wealth, while the State of New South Wales occupies the enviable position of containing one-third of the population of Australia. Is it not reasonable that the Governor-General should reside for part of the year in so important a State—the State which will be the home of all future Governors-General? The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne says that he has no desire to see the capital remain in Victoria, but I am inclined to think that among Victorian representatives he is very much alone in that opinion.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am glad to hear honorable gentlemen say “No.” It indicates a desire to do the correct thing, and the first step to be taken in that direction is to honorably keep the compact entered into in regard to the occupancy of the Sydney Government-house.

Mr. FOWLER. — If the Sydney people see as much of the Governor-General as the Melbourne people do, they may become satisfied, and not push forward the federal capital question.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I do not think there is any fear of that. Perhaps, individually, the people of New South Wales do not regard this matter as of much importance, but they wish to see the position of Governor-General properly maintained, and they consider that for the proper maintenance of the position it is necessary that he should reside for at least one-third of the year in Sydney. A great deal has been said about the expense of this arrangement, but it must not be forgotten that at least £1,000, or more than a third of the whole amount, will be provided by the people of New South Wales, and, as they have already spent so large a sum in providing for the accommodation of the Governor-General in Sydney, surely the people of the other States will not hesitate to make up the balance of the expenditure.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—When a somewhat similar question was before Parliament on a previous occasion honorable members took up an attitude in connexion with it which I think has met with the approval of the people outside. Our attitude then was that we desired to see the office of the Governor-General upheld with dignity, and were willing to provide a reasonable allowance to that end. But we wished it to be distinctly understood that the occupancy of the position should be in accordance with the ideals of the Commonwealth, which were ideals of simplicity and of economy. The proposal to expend £13,030 upon the upkeep of the Governor-General's establishment has now been reduced to £5,500, which shows that the Government are taking their lesson to heart.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does the honorable and learned member think that the amount now set down will cover the whole cost?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—We have been informed by the Acting Prime Minister that Commonwealth officials have inquired carefully into the whole matter, and think that the sum set down is sufficient. It is possible that there may be some increase, but the reduction already made is very great.

Mr. POYNTON.—Did not the Acting Prime Minister state as a reason why a Bill was not introduced that he was not sure that this sum would be found sufficient?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No. I understood the honorable gentleman to say that this proposal would be taken as a working basis, and that if it was afterwards found to require revision it could be revised. But it does not follow that the amount is going to be increased from £5,000 to £13,000. As the Commonwealth grows there is no doubt that our expenditure will increase; but I shall not be a party to any very great increase over and above the amount of £5,500 now proposed for this purpose. I intend to support the proposal to maintain both Government-houses. The matter has been stated in several ways. It has been argued that there should be but one establishment maintained for the Governor-General, and that until the federal site is formed, that establishment should be maintained in Melbourne. To my mind there are two possible sites for the Governor-General's residence, and if it is decided that we should have only one, the question arises whether there is to be a fair run between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. McDONALD. — Another point is, whether two residences are to be continued.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is another aspect of the question. Here we are asked to lay down the principle that there shall be two residences, and honorable members from States other than New South Wales, and particularly from Victoria, have said that there should be only one, and that that should be Melbourne. In my opinion, if the whole question is viewed fairly, we are bound to continue for some considerable time the two residences which have been selected. The honorable and learned member for Corinella seemed to say that if it were a question of the Commonwealth being legally bound to New South Wales, he would be inclined to accept the position. Then he said afterwards that he could not accept a half-way arrangement. He did not put his position very clearly, but the impression he left upon my mind was that, if he were satisfied that an agreement had been made between the Federal Government and the Government of New South Wales, he would be prepared to abide by that agreement. While honorable members have been speaking, I have gone carefully through the correspondence, and I have come to the conclusion, as regards the making of a contract, that if this were a contract between two private individuals, and brought before a court of equity, on the correspondence which has taken place, together with the acts of possession and ownership exercised over the property in New South Wales, the court would decree specific performance in the case of either party to the contract. The correspondence starts as early as 18th June, 1901, when the Prime Minister writes as follows to the Premier of New South Wales:—

I shall be glad if you will kindly take into your early consideration the question of the occupancy of Government-house, Sydney, by the Government of the Commonwealth, for the purpose of a residence for His Excellency the Governor-General. It will probably be necessary to arrange for the occupation of the buildings and grounds for a term of three or five years, and I shall be pleased to receive any proposals you may have to make upon the subject. The Commonwealth Government will, as a matter of course, maintain the house, offices, grounds, &c., and effect any repairs which may become necessary during the term of occupancy.

After that letter was written a similar letter was written to the Premier of Victoria, and the correspondence shows that the head of the Government, acting evidently upon Executive authority, entered into a contract with the Commonwealth through its Executive officers. We may disapprove of the conditions of a particular contract, but when it has been entered into by the persons whom we have placed in a position to make contracts on our behalf, the Commonwealth, as a whole, will feel itself bound by the act of its Executive officers. We can only act through agents, and we are bound by their acts, although we may disapprove of particular terms of a contract. It will be found that ultimately the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth wrote to the Premier of New South Wales asking whether the Government of New South Wales were prepared to lend Government-house in Sydney to the Commonwealth for the purpose of residence by the Governor-General, upon the same terms and conditions as Government-house in Victoria had been lent by the Government of that State. It will be seen from the correspondence that the Premier of New South Wales was agreeable to the occupancy of Government-house in Sydney upon the same terms. Throughout the correspondence it will be seen that definite terms are set out, and that a draft of a lease was before the two Cabinets. Then the Premier of New South Wales accepted it, and the Commonwealth Government accepted it. Not only did they do that, but the Commonwealth Government absolutely entered into possession of the building, and exercised effective ownership by appointing their own caretakers and making the repairs. On the other hand, the State Government of New South Wales ceased to exercise any control whatever over it, and became parties to another lease, making provision, at great expense, for a residence for the State Governor for a long term of years. If honorable members were, through an agent, parties to a contract with a private individual, established under the terms of the contract agreed to by the Federal Government, they would feel that they had bound themselves to take Government-house in Sydney for a definite term of years.

Mr. CROUCH.—The approval of Parliament is always a condition.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, it is not always a condition. A hundred and one contracts are made by administrative officers, and if the approval of Parliament were always a condition, it would be impossible for Ministers to carry on the work of their departments, involving, as they do, the making of numerous small contracts. It is true that Parliament may exercise its power by refusing to appropriate money for certain purposes, but Parliament will very rarely inflict a hardship upon persons who have entered into a contract with the Government. Looking at the question purely as a question of law, I am of opinion that as regards New South Wales and the Commonwealth, we have entered into a binding contract with the Government of New South Wales to occupy Government-house at Sydney for three years, and, whether the Governor-General resides there or not, we are under an obligation to maintain it, to look after the grounds, to keep the property in repair, and to keep it properly insured, or at all events to be responsible for it, and at the end of the term to hand it over in as good condition as when we entered it. That being so, I feel that it is necessary that we should vote for the amount set down in this proposed estimate. I put the matter now upon another ground, and I say that we owe a duty to New South Wales to carry out what may be really only an understanding. We know that these understandings cannot be enforced in a court of law. Honorable members from New South Wales do not ask for that, but they appeal to the court of honour, and ask honorable members of this House to agree to their request. What they ask is, to my mind, fair and just. They do not allege that this understanding induced New South Wales to enter the federation, but that the people of New South Wales believed that the Governor-General, as representing the sovereign power and authority underlying federation, and as the figure-head of the Commonwealth, would reside for a certain time in their capital city. If we deprive them of that which they would regard as an honour they will be aggrieved. They, in my opinion, have had reason to believe that the Governor-General would reside in their capital city during a certain portion of the year, and I think that the Commonwealth is in duty bound to carry out the understanding. I understand that the New South Wales members do not ask for this because of any provincial feeling, but because they think that in the first stages of the existence of the Commonwealth the people of the different States should live as a happy and united family, and that there should be a kindly and brotherly feeling pervading the Commonwealth.

Mr. CROUCH.—They say — “Give us what we want and we will be federal in spirit.”

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, they do not ask that we should give them what they want, but the people of New South Wales believed that this promise would be fulfilled, and they will feel aggrieved if it is not fulfilled: Though as free-traders and protectionists we may differ in this House, we know that the federal feeling exists amongst us, and I understand that it is upon this high ground that this matter is put by the honorable members from New South Wales.

Mr. McDONALD.—We shall have to get upon high ground in Queensland, and have an establishment in Brisbane.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—We may have to fight for the federal feeling, and I believe we shall have the assistance and sympathy of honorable members of this House if the contention is urged in a federal spirit, which I think is a spirit characteristic of honorable members from our State. I have looked through the correspondence also with respect to the second point—as to whether the people of New South Wales had any reasonable ground for believing that Sydney was to be a place of residence for the Governor-General even for a certain time. In my opinion, the correspondence shows that they had every reason to believe that. In the first place, we know that the proclamation was to be issued in Sydney, and on looking through the correspondence and cablegrams dealing with the matter, it would seem as if the Premiers of Australia some time prior to the 7th July, 1900, were consulted upon the matter. They, of course, had no legal power to bind their Parliaments, but they were looked to as persons who, from the positions they occupied, were competent to express the public opinion of their States.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—They deny that.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I do not care whether they deny it or not. I am pointing out that such facts as these would lead to the belief in the minds of the people of New South Wales that an agreement or understanding of some kind existed. On the 7th July, 1900, Earl Beauchamp, who was then Governor of New South Wales, sent the following telegram to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:—

Re your telegram of 6th July—My Prime Minister desires to introduce next week Bill dealing with the question of State Governors after federation. He is anxious to have your permission to state that you desired Barton to inquire where Governor-General should reside, and that in answer to your request Prime Ministers of federating colonies consulted and agreed to New South Wales.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is denied.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Assuming that it is denied, the question is whether the people of New South Wales had any reason for believing that an arrangement had been entered into, and I am showing that persons in very high positions in New South Wales entertained this idea.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then we should have their testimony upon the subject.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It is not a question of testimony. The point is whether the people of New South Wales had any reason to believe that a compact had been made, and I am pointing out that they had. I can rely only upon the evidence before us. It may be misleading, but it is vouched for by very high authorities, and must be accepted until we have some stronger written testimony to set against it. There are further telegrams on the same question in which expressions similar to those quoted by me will be found. We know that there was some communication with the Home Government when the Secretary of State for the Colonies issued a despatch dealing with the provision to be made for the residences of the Governor-General in New South Wales and Victoria, and prior to that despatch the Parliament of New South Wales, evidently acting upon some understanding, passed a Bill providing for a contribution by the State to the expenses of the Governor-General. The Parliament of New South Wales believed that the Governor-General was to reside in Sydney, and everything was directed to that end. Through every act that was performed by persons in authority—by the Parliament, by the State Governor, and by the Secretary of State for the Colonies—the people of New South Wales had held out to them the expectation that, for a certain time at least, the Governor-General would reside in Sydney.

Mr. ISAACS.—Solely in that State?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, for a certain time only.

Mr. McCAY.—But they had no such impression prior to the second referendum.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I do not know that the referendum has anything to do with this particular promise. The people accepted the Constitution because they thought that New South Wales was to have the federal capital located within her territory. The people of that State will feel that they have a substantial grievance if the arrangement which they believed to have been entered into is not carried out. They have spent large sums of money in fitting up Government-house as a residence for the Governor-General, and they will have just reason to complain if we do not keep faith with them. If it were open to me to decide from the beginning, I should be strongly opposed to the maintenance of two residences for His Excellency the Governor-General. I should much prefer one residence for His Excellency, and that adequate provision should be made for him to travel through the whole of the States. His occasional presence in the various cities would help materially to strengthen the federal feeling. The States which are more remote from the centres of federal activity do not receive many visits from those in authority and those who represent authority in the Commonwealth, and in this way federal influence is weakened. I regard the proposals of the Government generally as just and reasonable, and as economical to an extent which will meet with the approval of honorable members. I shall, therefore, cordially support them.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—The views expressed by the honorable member for Darling Downs would lead to the conclusion that for all time there must be a Governor-General's residence in Sydney. Nothing else will meet the logic of his arguments, because he has told us that in his view there has been a compact or agreement made—by whom we do not know, and when and where we are not told. The details of this agreement are delightfully vague and nebulous, and all that the honorable member can tell us is that it was made at some place by some one. Does any one believe that it was ever supposed that Sydney should be the sole place of residence for the Governor-General for all time? Yet this is the conclusion that my honorable and learned friend desires us to indorse. We are asked to believe that it was agreed that the residence of the Governor-General should be in New South Wales, and that is the bargain which my honorable and learned friend says could be enforced in a court of law.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No; I did not say that. The honorable and learned member is mixing up two entirely different questions.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should like to know if any court would compel the Governor-General to live in any particular State. This matter ought to be determined upon other grounds than those advanced here to-night. The Government have done right in asking for an expression of opinion from honorable members as to their desires with regard to the basis upon which the Governor-General's establishment shall be founded. We are asked under the terms of the motion to say that two Government-houses shall be maintained at an annual expenditure of £5,500. The Acting Prime Minister has very fairly, and very properly, put it to us that, until they obtain an expression of opinion from honorable members, the Government will not be in a position to inform the Home Government as to what the future Governor-General may expect, and therefore it is right that they should bring down their proposals at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am prepared to add to the motion words providing that it shall apply during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Mr. ISAACS.—That may be in perfect keeping with the view which the Acting Prime Minister has presented, but I do not agree with it. It goes further than I am disposed to follow, but it is a fair proposal to make to the House, and the Government are adopting a proper method of procedure. Speaking for myself, however, I am not disposed to go further than to ratify the bargain which has been actually made by the Government. Ministers ought to be supported to the extent to which they have committed the honour of the Commonwealth in the bargain made with the New South Wales Government up to the end of the year 1903. I am prepared to support them thus far, but beyond that I am not going, because I cannot see where we should be able to stop. If we adopt the suggestion of the Acting Prime Minister, and limit the operation of the motion to the term of office of the next Governor-General, we might reasonably be called upon afterwards to continue the arrangement for all time. Why should not the Governor-General following enjoy the same advantages as were conferred upon his immediate predecessor? Our friends from New South Wales have taken up a position which we scarcely expected them to adopt. If they had argued that the Governor-General could not perform his duties without a residence in Sydney, I could understand their point. I am not, however, disposed to agree with them that because

Sydney is said to be the greatest city in Australia, and more wealthy and important and more fortunate than any other, we should call upon the other less fortunate States to contribute to its still further aggrandizement. We should be careful to see that there is only one establishment for the Governor-General in Australia. I may not be here when the time comes to carry out that view, but I think that it would be distinctly improper to have a Governor-General's establishment in either Melbourne or Sydney, when the federal capital is established. I should be opposed to any such proposal. At the same time, I do not think that, even in view of the revilings Victoria has received at the hands of the honorable member for Dalley—who has done more to damage the cause of New South Wales than any other honorable member in this Chamber—we should depart from the strict path of duty by failing to support the Government in carrying out the compact into which they have entered with the Government of New South Wales. There would, however, be no justification for asking Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, and Queensland to help in maintaining an unnecessary establishment for the Governor-General in another State. The Governor-General has to visit other parts of the Commonwealth, and when he goes to Perth, or Brisbane, or Hobart he is able to make adequate arrangements for his comfort and for carrying out his duties. Surely similar provision can be made in Sydney for housing him as becomes his position. I can see no reason, therefore, for making any distinction in favour of either Sydney or Melbourne. Only one sound reason has been advanced for the maintenance of a second establishment for the Governor-General, and that is that a compact has been made with the New South Wales Government for a period of three years, ending in December, 1903. That is a valid ground for supporting the Government to that limit, but I must decline to carry the matter any further. Upon one side will be found some honorable members who take that view, and upon the other those who do not. Everything, however, will centre round this question—“What justification is there for expending Commonwealth money in the establishment and maintenance of a needless Governor-General's establishment?” I do not believe that New South Wales is very much concerned in the maintenance by the Commonwealth of the vice-regal residence in Sydney. I think that the people of that State are worthy of every proper consideration, and that they are above entertaining the petty considerations with which they have been credited.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I cannot support the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, because I do not agree with what has been said by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. The latter has, with his usual fairness, put the view that if the Ministry enter into a compact we are bound to abide by it. But I would point out that there are limits to compacts imposed by the Constitution. It is not for us to ratify agreements made outside of the provisions of that Constitution. If the Ministry had entered into compacts with the Government of New South Wales, and with the Governments of the other States, to provide a residence for the Governor-General in each of them, surely the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs would not argue that we should be bound to abide by them. They are not prescribed by the Constitution. Whilst I should be prepared to support any action of the Ministry, which, upon a fair construction, is in accordance with the constitutional powers that they ought to administer, I will not be bound by every foolish compact into which they may enter. I decline to have my judgment forestalled by any executive act. The Ministry ought not to have entered into the arrangement revealed. In addition to that, the Government of New South Wales ought to have known what the Constitution prescribed. For that additional reason, we are under no moral obligation to support this compact. It must have been known that it was purely provisional, and the Government of New South Wales were very foolish to attempt to forestall our judgment by an expenditure of £20,000, because they must have known that to extend the residences of the Governor-General was not one of the powers regularly arising under the Constitution. Surely the essence of the prescription in the Constitution is that the seat of Government shall be where Parliament is sitting. I am aware that it is not expressly declared that Parliament must sit at the seat of Government. All that is set out is that until it meets at the seat of Government, Parliament shall sit in Melbourne. But, although it is not expressly stated, we know that it is implied that the moment we have a permanent seat of Government the Parliament and the Executive must be located there. It might suit the convenience of Ministers to have a second seat of the Executive in Sydney for five or six months during the year. It might suit the Prime Minister, who comes from New South Wales, to remain there for several months each year, and have the Governor at his elbow. But we are not bound to bring about such conditions for the convenience of Ministers. If we agree to the principle laid down in this motion, we may have one set of Ministers in Victoria, and another in New South Wales. Was that ever intended? In the very resolutions adopted by the Premiers' conference, the words "seat of Government" were not used. The word "capital" was used to indicate the seat of the Executive and of Parliament. Where is the capital now? Undoubtedly it is in Melbourne, and the Executive ought to be here. All Ministers should be here. They must accept the temporary inconvenience which attaches to their positions. We should be placing ourselves in an exceedingly false position if we allowed the Treasurer and the Attorney-General to administer their departments in Melbourne, two other members of the Government to perform their duties in Sydney, and the Postmaster-General to control his department from Brisbane. We should have to get an ambulatory Governor-General, put him in a balloon, and members provide him with gas. There is another aspect of this question, namely, "Should we be quite considerate to the Governor-General himself under the proposal of the Government?" The sum of £2,000 is a very small one to vote for the upkeep of the Sydney Government-house. It almost approaches to parsimony. I do not begrudge the expenditure of that amount, but if we compel His Excellency to reside in Sydney during five or six months of the year, we shall increase the sum which he will be required to pay out of his salary of £10,000. If he has to reside for a certain period in Sydney, he will certainly have to reciprocate the courtesies extended to him, and thus we shall increase, if we do not duplicate, the number of entertainments which he will be called upon to provide. What will follow? Simply added prestige to New South Wales. Surely the prestige for what it is worth ought to belong to the Commonwealth. Under the Government proposal, it is true that a few more social coteries would be entertained, but that will mean a considerable increase in the private expenditure of the Governor-General. He cannot remove his necessary attendants without incurring an outlay above that which he would be called upon to bear if he resided in only one Government-house. Considering that we have cut down the allowances of the Governor-General almost to the border of niggardliness, we ought not to add to his expenditure. For that reason I cannot support the duplication of the Vice-Regal establishment. I admit that any obligations imposed upon the Commonwealth by the Premiers' conference should be carried out as speedily as possible. Personally, I regret that the Federal capital cannot be established in Sydney. In regard to that matter I entertain so very little feeling, that if a proposition were made to-morrow to amend the Constitution by cancelling the 100 miles limit provision, I should support it. It was an exceedingly bad condition to impose, and originated only in the petty rival jealousies of two of the States. The Constitution has been somewhat marred by that provision, which emanated from the narrow parochialism of certain persons in Victoria and New South Wales—a parochialism which is shared by politicians more than by the people. I object to the duplication of the Vice-Regal establishments, not because of the expenditure involved, but because it is unnecessary and inexpedient, and is not an obligation cast upon us by any compact which we ought to respect.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—In listening to this debate, the one point which has struck me is that those who support the Government proposal urge that as it does not constitute a very great lapse from the path of economy, we might very well sanction it, especially as we have the assurance that the mistake will not be repeated. I cannot accept any such excuse for a departure from what, to my mind, involves a very important principle, namely, that the Governor-General's residence shall be established at the seat of Government. I do not concede that any other arrangement was ever intended by the people of Australia when they expressed themselves as willing to join the

Commonwealth. As far as Western Australia is concerned, it comes with a great deal of surprise to myself and others to discover that proposals were made of such a definite nature as those which have been placed before Parliament in regard to the establishment of the Governor-General in Sydney. I have to ask myself only one or two simple questions in order to arrive at a decision upon this matter. The first is, "Do the people of New South Wales as a whole really demand that His Excellency should spend a portion of his time in their capital?" I cannot find any evidence that they do. Neither can I discover that the people of Sydney, as a whole, are anxious that that course should be followed. Then I have to ask myself whether, if the question were put to him, any Governor-General would prefer to remain in any one city during a portion of the year, and to spend the balance of his time in another? I can understand that he would be naturally anxious to visit different parts of the Commonwealth, but I feel certain that he would emphatically declare that he would be better circumstanced if he were required to maintain only one Vice-Regal establishment. Therefore, I fail to discover that any useful purpose will be served by the adoption of the Government proposal. We have heard a great deal about the maintenance of a federal spirit requiring the proposed arrangement. But would not the maintenance of that spirit cover similar proposals with regard to the other States? If we are to provide two residences for the Governor-General, why should we not provide six? No reason has been alleged why we should be restricted to two. Of course we are told that Sydney and Melbourne are the two populous cities of the Commonwealth. If the claim of a State to have the Governor-General residing there is to depend upon its population, surely all the States are entitled, in greater or lesser degree, to that privilege, though, perhaps, in the case of a sparsely populated State, like Western Australia, we might have to be content with having the Governor-General's court dress sent over to us now and again. We hope that the Governor-General will visit us occasionally, and that the members of this Parliament will come, too. But we shall not worry very much if no special expenditure is voted to provide for his or their accommodation, and if they come they will experience no inconvenience because of that fact. I

Federal Government will have a home of its own.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I should like to say, with regard to the proposal to limit the operation of the resolution, that it seems to me that we should be true to ourselves as a business Chamber. If the proposal of the Government is anything at all, it is a proposal to enable them to communicate with the Home authorities as to the actual financial position regarding the establishment of future Governors-General. It seems to me to be a very reasonable and sensible proposal. If we carry out the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and confine the operation of the resolution to a period of three years, can we expect that a Governor-General will come here under conditions which may be altered during his term of office? I think it would be far better to deal with the matter on the good faith of the Government. They have decided that this is to be taken as an interim provision, subject to alteration in the light of further experience. There are many things which we are doing in this Commonwealth in connexion with which it is impossible for any one to know all the conditions and expenses involved. It would certainly be more business-like to have a proposal which will undergo no change during the term of office of a Governor-General. I am sure that, for the sake of the honour of this House and the credit of its business capacity, honorable members will not consent to a proposal limiting the operation of this resolution to a period of three years, when a Governor-General may be in the middle of his term of office.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—One of the matters which should be considered in dealing with this question is the extent to which the State and people of New South Wales were induced to look to the Commonwealth Government for some arrangement of this character. I know it has been denied that there was anything in the nature of an agreement between the State of New South Wales and the Commonwealth, or between the State of New South Wales and the State of Victoria, regarding this matter. Whilst it is probable that there is nothing in the Federal Constitution relating to the matter, and that there may be nothing in the nature of a formal agreement between the States bearing upon it, I still think there was a certain understanding anterior to federation between the people and Government of New South Wales and the peoples and Governments of the other States, and particularly of Victoria, who were engaged in negotiations which finally led up to the acceptance of the Constitution by the people of New South Wales.

Mr. POYNTON.—Sir George Turner, as Premier of Victoria at the time, has denied it.

Mr. BROWN.—I have not heard his denial, and I should like to be sure that he denies that there was any understanding of that character.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He does deny it.

Mr. BROWN.—I have it now from the Acting Prime Minister that Sir George Turner does deny it, and that being so, I am bound to say that the people of New South Wales were under a misapprehension in regard to the matter. When the Constitution was defeated on the first referendum, there were negotiations between the Premiers of the States which led up to what was known in New South Wales as "the secret conference," a conference of the Premiers representing the different States in which certain agreements were arrived at. How they were arrived at is kept secret, because the meetings were not open to the press, and the press and the public were only informed that certain conclusions had been arrived at. These were embodied as alterations in the Constitution, which was then submitted to a referendum vote, not only of the people of New South Wales, but of the peoples of the other States who had approved of the original Constitution, with the difference, of course, that on the second occasion Queensland was induced to come in. That State took no part in the first referendum, and at that stage appeared to have made up her mind to stand outside of the federal movement for the time being. It was represented to the people of New South Wales that, as the result of the Premiers' conference, certain arrangements were to be made, and, amongst others, that the federal capital should be located in New South Wales, subject to certain limitations, and that in the meantime the Federal Parliament should meet in Melbourne. What the people of New South Wales were led to believe, and what many of them now believe, was that the understanding arrived at by the conference was that, whilst the Commonwealth Parliament should meet in Melbourne, it should be necessary for the Governor-General to reside in that city, and it was therefore necessary that the State of Victoria should make provision for his residence. It was also understood that during the recess, when honorable members had returned to their respective States, the Governor-General, if he chose, should reside in the chief city of New South Wales. That was one position placed before the people of New South Wales prior to the taking of the referendum.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member say that any federal leader in New South Wales asserted that that was an understanding?

Mr. BROWN.—I am not prepared now to name any federal leader who asserted that, but I think I can be borne out in the statement that that impression was prevalent in New South Wales. So far as I am personally concerned, that consideration had no weight with me, because when the question of remitting the decision as to the seat of the Federal Government to the Premiers' conference was proposed in the State Parliament of New South Wales, I was one of the few who voted against it. I considered that there were other issues, of far greater importance, which should receive attention. But in battling against the acceptance of the Constitution on the second referendum, I was met with this argument at nearly every meeting I addressed: It was contended that there would be no injustice done to New South Wales under the arrangement that the Governor-General should divide his residence in the Commonwealth between that State and Victoria during the time preceding the allocation of the federal territory. This was an important consideration in the minds of the people of New South Wales, and was urged very strongly as an inducement to them to adopt the Constitution. There were indications of some general understanding, because the Government of New South Wales initiated legislation making provision for a contribution by that State towards the expenses of the Governor-General's establishment. The Premier of Victoria introduced similar legislation into the Parliament of that State, and if he had been sufficiently supported, Victoria would have stood committed to a contribution of £3,000 per annum. Now we are told that this action was taken quite apart from any understanding arrived at by the Premiers of the States. I am bound to accept the assurance of the Acting Prime Minister that there was no understanding, but it is difficult to conceive how such a strong impression could have been created in the minds of the legislators and the people generally of New South Wales in the absence of some compact such as has been referred to. The Premier of Victoria, at least, thought at one time that an arrangement of this kind should be entered into, and there must have been some common inspiration for his action, and that taken by the Premiers in other States. We were not informed in New South Wales that the course adopted by the Government of New South Wales was the result of despatches received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, but we were led to believe that it was due to an understanding arrived at between the Premiers at the conference held by them some little time before. The matter has now reached such a stage that this Parliament is in duty bound to adopt the Government proposals. If the people of New South Wales were misled, their misapprehension should have been corrected before this, as it is rather late in the day to disillusionise them. It will be difficult to induce them to believe that there was no understanding, and any attempt to vary the arrangements for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney will be regarded by them as a manifestation of an anti-federal spirit. I do not see that there is any great objection to the Governor-General visiting the capitals of the Commonwealth. It is not desirable that the Governor-General should be tied to Melbourne while the seat of government is in that city, or that, when the Federal Parliament is established in its permanent home, we should place a ring fence around the capital and prevent the Governor-General from visiting the capitals of the various States.

Mr. POYNTON.—Would the honorable member be in favour of maintaining six establishments—one in each of the capitals?

Mr. BROWN.—I am prepared to grant to His Excellency every facility for visiting the States, and if the Government of South Australia will place a residence at his disposal, I am willing that that State should be treated in exactly the same way as the others. The honorable member for Tasmania,

Mr. O'Malley, has stated that there is no necessity for a Governor-General in a democracy, but that question should have been dealt with when the Constitution was being framed. It is all very well to talk about the appointment of a Governor-General being inimical to a true democracy, but if the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, will turn to the United States, he will see that the people there have been ground down by multi-millionaires to a far greater extent than have the people under our system of government. If the honorable member wishes to do away with those elements in the community that are detrimental to the best interests of democracy he will require to turn his attention first to the abolition of multi-millionaires and trusts. As a federation under the Crown we must have some one representing the Crown. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne denied that there was any question of federal feeling involved in this matter, and he stated that he would be loth to do anything that would convey the impression to the people of New South Wales that the opposition to the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney was due to the existence of an anti-federal spirit in Victoria. At the same time the honorable and learned member wishes to limit the operation of the motion to the period for which the Ministers have entered into an arrangement with the Government of New South Wales. I would point out, however, that if it is a good thing to ratify the arrangement entered into for that period it should be just as desirable to continue it until such time as the Federal Parliament is located in its permanent home.

Mr. POYNTER.—Does not the honorable member see that the motion provides for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney for all time?

Mr. BROWN.—I do not agree with the honorable member. It simply provides for the residence of the Governor-General in Sydney during the period which must elapse before the federal capital is established. When the residence of the Governor-General has been established within federal territory, it will be open to this Parliament to decide whether the present arrangement in respect of Melbourne, and the proposed arrangement in respect of Sydney, or any of the other State capitals shall continue. Honorable members should recollect that in anticipation of that compact being honorably carried out, the Government of New South Wales, at considerable expense to themselves, have handed over the State Government-house for the accommodation of the Governor-General. They have arranged for the accommodation of the State Governor elsewhere. Are they now to be told that that arrangement was made upon their own initiative, and that the federal authorities are under no obligation in respect to it? That would be an unfair position to assume towards the Government or people of New South Wales. I intend to support the proposal which has been submitted by the Attorney-General, because I believe that it loyally carries out pre-federal arrangements. Instead of the people of New South Wales forcing this matter on by misrepresentation, it seems to me that if the compact is not carried out they will have every right to complain.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—In listening to this debate, I was very much surprised at the statement made by some honorable members from across the border that in New South Wales the Constitution was carried because it was understood that the Governor-General was to reside there for a few months in each of a few years. Without doubting the veracity of any honorable member, that statement appears to me to be almost incredible. There was no State in the Union in which the Constitution in all its bearings was so fully discussed as it was in New South Wales, and under those circumstances I can scarcely realize that such a comparatively unimportant matter as where the Crown's representatives should reside during a few of the earlier years of the federation carried so much weight. But leaving out of consideration what was the understanding, it seems to me that this is not a question of whether Victoria or New South Wales is to hold up the body of the Governor-General for a few years as the spoils of war. The question is whether we are to establish a good or bad precedent regarding the expenditure of moneys belonging to the public, who we know are insistent that this Parliament shall exercise economy in every possible direction.

Mr. WILKS.—Let us have a speedy settlement of the capital site.

Mr. McCAY.—I have not the slightest objection to the adoption of that course. I think it was a huge mistake to insert in the Constitution the provision relating to that matter, and to bar all the other State capitals from becoming the future federal capital. The 100-miles ring around Sydney is not nearly as big as is the ring around the other capitals. I should be perfectly willing to put the names of Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide in a hat, and to draw lots as to which should be the capital. But, after all, the determination of this question, or of the temporary residence of the Governor-General, is of small importance compared with the great matters at issue in connexion with the federation. I cannot assume that the people of New South Wales would believe that that State had been wronged if Parliament declined to vote an annual sum of £2,000 for the maintenance of the vice-regal establishment in Sydney. The real question at issue is, whether in expending this money, we are setting a good example in regard to economies which must be exercised by this Parliament in all sorts of directions for years to come, if the States are to be assisted in keeping down unnecessary expenditure. It has been said, and certainly the correspondence was laid upon the table to-day induces the belief, that we have entered into a sort of tenancy in respect of the Government-houses in Sydney and Melbourne. Granting that that is so, I cannot see why we should ask the people of the Commonwealth to continue that tenancy any longer than is necessary. In each case the contract expires at the end of 1903, and I do not see why it should continue one moment longer. In certain despatches it is even suggested that when the Federal capital is established a third residence should be provided for the Governor-General. Apparently we are to have one residence at the Federal capital, another at Melbourne, and a third at Sydney. When the Federal capital has been established within Commonwealth territory, I shall certainly refuse to vote for the maintenance of any vice-Regal residence, either in Melbourne or Sydney. I would not now vote for the upkeep of the Government-house in Melbourne, if Parliament were not sitting here. But where Parliament is in session, there the Governor-General must be located. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that the Governor-General should have an establishment in Melbourne. That is unavoidable in the carrying on of the Government of the country, and that is the reason why I distinguish between the two portions of this motion. I am satisfied that the possibility of having the Governor-General's presence in Melbourne for a few months each year did not induce the people of Victoria to accept the Federal Constitution. They accepted it——

Mr. WILKS.—Because they thought it was a good bargain.

Mr. McCAY.—I am sure that if they entertained that impression they are very much disappointed. But the fact is that they accepted it because they believed that Victoria, like the rest of Australia, would benefit by the union, and in spite of all that has been said, I think that most of us believe that this great machine, so soon as its bearings get into proper order, will work smoothly. There was bound to be trouble at the beginning, and that trouble has been accentuated by the great drought which has overtaken Australia. I do not think that New South Wales will consider that she has been grievously wronged if Government-house is not kept open for the occupation of the Governor-General during four or five months in each year. It is because I feel that the maintenance of two vice-Regal establishments constitutes an example of unnecessary expenditure in high places that I cannot support the proposal of the Government. In discussing matters of this kind, the people seize upon points here and there. They will be only too ready to say—“You have spent so many thousands of pounds in connexion with the Governor-General, and yet you refuse to expend a thousand pence to assist certain people who are in very much more need of it.” In spite of the moral effect which the presence of His Excellency might have upon Sydney, I think that its natural attractions are quite sufficient. I feel bound to abide by the bargain which I consider has been made, and which must continue for three years from the date of the inauguration of the Commonwealth, much as I disapprove of it. It would be quite useless, however, to continue that arrangement until just after the beginning of a Governor-General's term of office. I hold that the Government should not have made such an arrangement until it had ascertained the wishes of Parliament in this matter. Occasionally, however, the Government have assumed too much and have discovered that their ideas concerning the wishes of this House have been very much at fault. I feel bound to express my disapproval of the motion, and in the performance of what I conceive to be my duty, but in no spirit of hostility to my friends across the border, to vote against it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I think that something should be said by the representatives of New South Wales in regard to the proposal of the Government to expend £5,500 upon the up-keep of the Government-houses in Sydney and Melbourne, because honorable gentlemen opposite appear to have overlooked the fact that an agreement was entered into with the Government of New South Wales to lease the Government-house in Sydney for a period of three years, with the right of renewal for another two years. In view of that agreement, the Government of New South Wales spent £20,000 in adding to the building, and another £7,000 in providing a residence for the State Governor. Yet honorable gentlemen opposite tell us that they did not know of any such agreement.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Was not the expenditure to which the honorable member refers entered into before the agreement was made?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It was incurred in view of the possibility of Government-house being used by the Governor-General.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Federal Government had not committed themselves at the time.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I think there was an understanding that the Governor-General should reside in Sydney for a certain period of the year. If the honorable member is of the opinion that £20,000 was spent upon the building because it was in a state of disrepair, I would like to inform him that only a short time previously something like £7,000 was spent in renovating it for the reception of Lord Beauchamp, and that every year a large sum of money is voted for its maintenance. Had there been no agreement with the Federal Government it would not have been necessary to provide a residence for the State Governor, but as that has been done, and as the New South Wales Government have spent a large sum in adding to and improving the old Government-house, because of the agreement with the Federal Government, it is the duty of this Parliament to see that the agreement is honorably kept. There is no inclination on the part of the Government to withdraw from it, but some of their supporters seem to be unable to find a reason for supporting them on this occasion. I would point out to the representatives of Victoria that the agreement in regard to the Government-house, Melbourne, is no more binding than the agreement in regard to the Government-house, Sydney. That being so, why should they wish the Government to withdraw from one and to fulfil the other? The attitude of those honorable gentlemen is a display of that provincialism of which we have heard so much. There may be a feeling on their part that, if the Governor-General resides in Sydney, the occupancy of Government-house, Melbourne, may be on a less firm and lasting footing. I do not wish to see the Governor-General continue to reside in Melbourne, because another compact was entered into with New South Wales, and that was that the federal capital and the permanent residence of the Governor-General should be within the borders of that State; but until the federal capital is chosen I think the Governor-General should live part of the year in Sydney, and part of the year in Melbourne. Apparently provision has been made for the occupancy of the Sydney Government-house for four months in the year. The representatives of Victoria cannot find much to grumble at in that, seeing that he will reside eight months in Melbourne. New South Wales is being called upon to occupy a position second to that of South Australia in this matter, because Lord Tennyson, since he has been Acting Governor-General, has made several trips to Adelaide, while he has not been to Sydney at all, and we have no guarantee that that state of things will not continue.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why should there not be a Commonwealth Government-house in Adelaide?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have no objection to the Governor-General visiting Adelaide. In my opinion it is his duty to make himself seen and known in every State capital. When I was in Canada, I was informed that the Dufferin-mansion, at Quebec, is occupied for a period every year by the Governor-General of the Dominion, and the representatives of New South Wales ask that Government-house, Sydney, shall be similarly occupied by the Governor-General of Australia. Sydney is the most important city in the union.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Not in point of population!

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In commerce and in wealth, while the State of New South Wales occupies the enviable position of containing one-third of the population of Australia. Is it not reasonable that the Governor-General should reside for part of the year in so important a State—the State which will be the home of all future Governors-General? The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne says that he has no desire to see the capital remain in Victoria, but I am inclined to think that among Victorian representatives he is very much alone in that opinion.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I am glad to hear honorable gentlemen say “No.” It indicates a desire to do the correct thing, and the first step to be taken in that direction is to honorably keep the compact entered into in regard to the occupancy of the Sydney Government-house.

Mr. FOWLER. — If the Sydney people see as much of the Governor-General as the Melbourne people do, they may become satisfied, and not push forward the federal capital question.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I do not think there is any fear of that. Perhaps, individually, the people of New South Wales do not regard this matter as of much importance, but they wish to see the position of Governor-General properly maintained, and they consider that for the proper maintenance of the position it is necessary that he should reside for at least one-third of the year in Sydney. A great deal has been said about the expense of this arrangement, but it must not be forgotten that at least £1,000, or more than a third of the whole amount, will be provided by the people of New South Wales, and, as they have already spent so large a sum in providing for the accommodation of the Governor-General in Sydney, surely the people of the other States will not hesitate to make up the balance of the expenditure.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—When a somewhat similar question was before Parliament on a previous occasion honorable members took up an attitude in connexion with it which I think has met with the approval of the people outside. Our attitude then was that we desired to see the office of the Governor-General upheld with dignity, and were willing to provide a reasonable allowance to that end. But we wished it to be distinctly understood that the occupancy of the position should be in accordance with the ideals of the Commonwealth, which were ideals of simplicity and of economy. The proposal to expend £13,030 upon the upkeep of the Governor-General's establishment has now been reduced to £5,500, which shows that the Government are taking their lesson to heart.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does the honorable and learned member think that the amount now set down will cover the whole cost?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—We have been informed by the Acting Prime Minister that Commonwealth officials have inquired carefully into the whole matter, and think that the sum set down is sufficient. It is possible that there may be some increase, but the reduction already made is very great.

Mr. POYNTON. — Did not the Acting Prime Minister state as a reason why a Bill was not introduced that he was not sure that this sum would be found sufficient?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No. I understood the honorable gentleman to say that this proposal would be taken as a working basis, and that if it was afterwards found to require revision it could be revised. But it does not follow that the amount is going to be increased from £5,000 to £13,000. As the Commonwealth grows there is no doubt that our expenditure will increase; but I shall not be a party to any very great increase over and above the amount of £5,500 now proposed for this purpose. I intend to support the proposal to maintain both Government-houses. The matter has been stated in several ways. It has been argued that there should be but one establishment maintained for the Governor-General, and that until the federal site is formed, that establishment should be maintained in Melbourne. To my mind there are two possible sites for the Governor-General's residence, and if it is decided that we should have only one, the question arises whether there is to be a fair run between Sydney and Melbourne.

Mr. McDONALD. — Another point is, whether two residences are to be continued.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is another aspect of the question. Here we are asked to lay down the principle that there shall be two residences, and honorable members from States other than New South Wales, and particularly from Victoria, have said that there should be only one, and that that should be Melbourne. In my opinion, if the whole question is viewed fairly, we are bound to continue for some considerable time the two residences which have been selected. The honorable and learned member for Corinella seemed to say that if it were a question of the Commonwealth being legally bound to New South Wales, he would be inclined to accept the position. Then he said afterwards that he could not accept a half-way arrangement. He did not put his position very clearly, but the impression he left upon my mind was that, if he were satisfied that an agreement had been made between the Federal Government and the Government of New South Wales, he would be prepared to abide by that agreement. While honorable members have been speaking, I have gone carefully through the correspondence, and I have come to the conclusion, as regards the making of a contract, that if this were a contract between two private individuals, and brought before a court of equity, on the correspondence which has taken place, together with the acts of possession and ownership exercised over the property in New South Wales, the court would decree specific performance in the case of either party to the contract. The correspondence starts as early as 18th June, 1901, when the Prime Minister writes as follows to the Premier of New South Wales:—

I shall be glad if you will kindly take into your early consideration the question of the occupancy of Government-house, Sydney, by the Government of the Commonwealth, for the purpose of a residence for His Excellency the Governor-General. It will probably be necessary to arrange for the occupation of the buildings and grounds for a term of three or five years, and I shall be pleased to receive any proposals you may have to make upon the subject. The Commonwealth Government will, as a matter of course, maintain the house, offices, grounds, &c., and effect any repairs which may become necessary during the term of occupancy.

After that letter was written a similar letter was written to the Premier of Victoria, and the correspondence shows that the head of the Government, acting evidently upon Executive authority, entered into a contract with the Commonwealth through its Executive officers. We may disapprove of the conditions of a particular contract, but when it has been entered into by the persons whom we have placed in a position to make contracts on our behalf, the Commonwealth, as a whole, will feel itself bound by the act of its Executive officers. We can only act through agents, and we are bound by their acts, although we may disapprove of particular terms of a contract. It will be found that ultimately the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth wrote to the Premier of New South Wales asking whether the Government of New South Wales were prepared to lend Government-house in Sydney to the Commonwealth for the purpose of residence by the Governor-General, upon the same terms and conditions as Government-house in Victoria had been lent by the Government of that State. It will be seen from the correspondence that the Premier of New South Wales was agreeable to the occupancy of Government-house in Sydney upon the same terms. Throughout the correspondence it will be seen that definite terms are set out, and that a draft of a lease was before the two Cabinets. Then the Premier of New South Wales accepted it, and the Commonwealth Government accepted it. Not only did they do that, but the Commonwealth Government absolutely entered into possession of the building, and exercised effective ownership by appointing their own caretakers and making the repairs. On the other hand, the State Government of New South Wales ceased to exercise any control whatever over it, and became parties to another lease, making provision, at great expense, for a residence for the State Governor for a long term of years. If honorable members were, through an agent, parties to a contract with a private individual, established under the terms of the contract agreed to by the Federal Government, they would feel that they had bound themselves to take Government-house in Sydney for a definite term of years.

Mr. CROUCH.—The approval of Parliament is always a condition.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, it is not always a condition. A hundred and one contracts are made by administrative officers, and if the approval of Parliament were always a condition, it would be impossible for Ministers to carry on the work of their departments, involving, as they do, the making of numerous small contracts. It is true that Parliament may exercise its power by refusing to appropriate money for certain purposes, but Parliament will very rarely inflict a hardship upon persons who have entered into a contract with the Government. Looking at the question purely as a question of law, I am of opinion that as regards New South Wales and the Commonwealth, we have entered into a binding contract with the Government of New South Wales to occupy Government-house at Sydney for three years, and, whether the Governor-General resides there or not, we are under an obligation to maintain it, to look after the grounds, to keep the property in repair, and to keep it properly insured, or at all events to be responsible for it, and at the end of the term to hand it over in as good condition as when we entered it. That being so, I feel that it is necessary that we should vote for the amount set down in this proposed estimate. I put the matter now upon another ground, and I say that we owe a duty to New South Wales to carry out what may be really only an understanding. We know that these understandings cannot be enforced in a court of law. Honorable members from New South Wales do not ask for that, but they appeal to the court of honour, and ask honorable members of this House to agree to their request. What they ask is, to my mind, fair and just. They do not allege that this understanding induced New South Wales to enter the federation, but that the people of New South Wales believed that the Governor-General, as representing the sovereign power and authority underlying federation, and as the figure-head of the Commonwealth, would reside for a certain time in their capital city. If we deprive them of that which they would regard as an honour they will be aggrieved. They, in my opinion, have had reason to believe that the Governor-General would reside in their capital city during a certain portion of the year, and I think that the Commonwealth is in duty bound to carry out the understanding. I understand that the New South Wales members do not ask for this because of any provincial feeling, but because they think that in the first stages of the existence of the Commonwealth the people of the different States should live as a happy and united family, and that there should be a kindly and brotherly feeling pervading the Commonwealth.

Mr. CROUCH.—They say — “Give us what we want and we will be federal in spirit.”

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, they do not ask that we should give them what they want, but the people of New South Wales believed that this promise would be fulfilled, and they will feel aggrieved if it is not fulfilled. Though as free-traders and protectionists we may differ in this House, we know that the federal feeling exists amongst us, and I understand that it is upon this high ground that this matter is put by the honorable members from New South Wales.

Mr. McDONALD.—We shall have to get upon high ground in Queensland, and have an establishment in Brisbane.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—We may have to fight for the federal feeling, and I believe we shall have the assistance and sympathy of honorable members of this House if the contention is urged in a federal spirit, which I think is a spirit characteristic of honorable members from our State. I have looked through the correspondence also with respect to the second point—as to whether the people of New South Wales had any reasonable ground for believing that Sydney was to be a place of residence for the Governor-General even for a certain time. In my opinion, the correspondence shows that they had every reason to believe that. In the first place, we know that the proclamation was to be issued in Sydney, and on looking through the correspondence and cablegrams dealing with the matter, it would seem as if the Premiers of Australia some time prior to the 7th July, 1900, were consulted upon the matter. They, of course, had no legal power to bind their Parliaments, but they were looked to as persons who, from the positions they occupied, were competent to express the public opinion of their States.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—They deny that.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I do not care whether they deny it or not. I am pointing out that such facts as these would lead to the belief in the minds of the people of New South Wales that an agreement or understanding of some kind existed. On the 7th July, 1900, Earl Beauchamp, who was then Governor of New South Wales, sent the following telegram to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:—

Re your telegram of 6th July—My Prime Minister desires to introduce next week Bill dealing with the question of State Governors after federation. He is anxious to have your permission to state that you desired Barton to inquire where Governor-General should reside, and that in answer to your request Prime Ministers of federating colonies consulted and agreed to New South Wales.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is denied.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Assuming that it is denied, the question is whether the people of New South Wales had any reason for believing that an arrangement had been entered into, and I am showing that persons in very high positions in New South Wales entertained this idea.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then we should have their testimony upon the subject.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It is not a question of testimony. The point is whether the people of New South Wales had any reason to believe that a compact had been made, and I am pointing out that they had. I can rely only upon the evidence before us. It may be misleading, but it is vouched for by very high authorities, and must be accepted until we have some stronger written testimony to set against it. There are further telegrams on the same question in which expressions similar to those quoted by me will be found. We know that there was some communication with the Home Government when the Secretary of State for the Colonies issued a despatch dealing with the provision to be made for the residences of the Governor-General in New South Wales and Victoria, and prior to that despatch the Parliament of New South Wales, evidently acting upon some understanding, passed a Bill providing for a contribution by the State to the expenses of the Governor-General. The Parliament of New South Wales believed that the Governor-General was to reside in Sydney, and everything was directed to that end. Through every act that was performed by persons in authority—by the Parliament, by the State Governor, and by the Secretary of State for the Colonies—the people of New South Wales had held out to them the expectation that, for a certain time at least, the Governor-General would reside in Sydney.

Mr. ISAACS.—Solely in that State?

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No, for a certain time only.

Mr. McCAY.—But they had no such impression prior to the second referendum.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I do not know that the referendum has anything to do with this particular promise. The people accepted the Constitution because they thought that New South Wales was to have the federal capital located within her territory. The people of that State will feel that they have a substantial grievance if the arrangement which they believed to have been entered into is not carried out. They have spent large sums of money in fitting up Government-house as a residence for the Governor-General, and they will have just reason to complain if we do not keep faith with them. If it were open to me to decide from the beginning, I should be strongly opposed to the maintenance of two residences for His Excellency the Governor-General. I should much prefer one residence for His Excellency, and that adequate provision should be made for him to travel through the whole of the States. His occasional presence in the various cities would help materially to strengthen the federal feeling. The States which are more remote from the centres of federal activity do not receive many visits from those in authority and those who represent authority in the Commonwealth, and in this way federal influence is weakened. I regard the proposals of the Government generally as just and reasonable, and as economical to an extent which will meet with the approval of honorable members. I shall, therefore, cordially support them.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—The views expressed by the honorable member for Darling Downs would lead to the conclusion that for all time there must be a Governor-General's residence in Sydney. Nothing else will meet the logic of his arguments, because he has told us that in his view there has been a compact or agreement made—by whom we do not know, and when and where we are not told. The details of this agreement are delightfully vague and nebulous, and all that the honorable member can tell us is that it was made at some place by some one. Does any one believe that it was ever supposed that Sydney should be the sole place of residence for the Governor-General for all time? Yet this is the conclusion that my honorable and learned friend desires us to indorse. We are asked to believe that it was agreed that the residence of the Governor-General should be in New South Wales, and that is the bargain which my honorable and learned friend says could be enforced in a court of law.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No; I did not say that. The honorable and learned member is mixing up two entirely different questions.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should like to know if any court would compel the Governor-General to live in any particular State. This matter ought to be determined upon other grounds than those advanced here to-night. The Government have done right in asking for an expression of opinion from honorable members as to their desires with regard to the basis upon which the Governor-General's establishment shall be founded. We are asked under the terms of the motion to say that two Government-houses shall be maintained at an annual expenditure of £5,500. The Acting Prime Minister has very fairly, and very properly, put it to us that, until they obtain an expression of opinion from honorable members, the Government will not be in a position to inform the Home Government as to what the future Governor-General may expect, and therefore it is right that they should bring down their proposals at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am prepared to add to the motion words providing that it shall apply during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Mr. ISAACS.—That may be in perfect keeping with the view which the Acting Prime Minister has presented, but I do not agree with it. It goes further than I am disposed to follow, but it is a fair proposal to make to the House, and the Government are adopting a proper method of procedure. Speaking for myself, however, I am not disposed to go further than to ratify the bargain which has been actually made by the Government. Ministers ought to be supported to the extent to which they have committed the honour of the Commonwealth in the bargain made with the New South Wales Government up to the end of the year 1903. I am prepared to support them thus far, but beyond that I am not going, because I cannot see where we should be able to stop. If we adopt the suggestion of the Acting Prime Minister, and limit the operation of the motion to the term of office of the next Governor-General, we might reasonably be called upon afterwards to continue the arrangement for all time. Why should not the Governor-General following enjoy the same advantages as were conferred upon his immediate predecessor? Our friends from New South Wales have taken up a position which we scarcely expected them to adopt. If they had argued that the Governor-General could not perform his duties without a residence in Sydney, I could understand their point. I am not, however, disposed to agree with them that because

Sydney is said to be the greatest city in Australia, and more wealthy and important and more fortunate than any other, we should call upon the other less fortunate States to contribute to its still further aggrandizement. We should be careful to see that there is only one establishment for the Governor-General in Australia. I may not be here when the time comes to carry out that view, but I think that it would be distinctly improper to have a Governor-General's establishment in either Melbourne or Sydney, when the federal capital is established. I should be opposed to any such proposal. At the same time, I do not think that, even in view of the revilings Victoria has received at the hands of the honorable member for Dalley—who has done more to damage the cause of New South Wales than any other honorable member in this Chamber—we should depart from the strict path of duty by failing to support the Government in carrying out the compact into which they have entered with the Government of New South Wales. There would, however, be no justification for asking Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, and Queensland to help in maintaining an unnecessary establishment for the Governor-General in another State. The Governor-General has to visit other parts of the Commonwealth, and when he goes to Perth, or Brisbane, or Hobart he is able to make adequate arrangements for his comfort and for carrying out his duties. Surely similar provision can be made in Sydney for housing him as becomes his position. I can see no reason, therefore, for making any distinction in favour of either Sydney or Melbourne. Only one sound reason has been advanced for the maintenance of a second establishment for the Governor-General, and that is that a compact has been made with the New South Wales Government for a period of three years, ending in December, 1903. That is a valid ground for supporting the Government to that limit, but I must decline to carry the matter any further. Upon one side will be found some honorable members who take that view, and upon the other those who do not. Everything, however, will centre round this question—“What justification is there for expending Commonwealth money in the establishment and maintenance of a needless Governor-General's establishment?” I do not believe that New South Wales is very much concerned in the maintenance by the Commonwealth of the vice-regal residence in Sydney. I think that the people of that State are worthy of every proper consideration, and that they are above entertaining the petty considerations with which they have been credited.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I cannot support the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, because I do not agree with what has been said by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. The latter has, with his usual fairness, put the view that if the Ministry enter into a compact we are bound to abide by it. But I would point out that there are limits to compacts imposed by the Constitution. It is not for us to ratify agreements made outside of the provisions of that Constitution. If the Ministry had entered into compacts with the Government of New South Wales, and with the Governments of the other States, to provide a residence for the Governor-General in each of them, surely the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs would not argue that we should be bound to abide by them. They are not prescribed by the Constitution. Whilst I should be prepared to support any action of the Ministry, which, upon a fair construction, is in accordance with the constitutional powers that they ought to administer, I will not be bound by every foolish compact into which they may enter. I decline to have my judgment forestalled by any executive act. The Ministry ought not to have entered into the arrangement revealed. In addition to that, the Government of New South Wales ought to have known what the Constitution prescribed. For that additional reason, we are under no moral obligation to support this compact. It must have been known that it was purely provisional, and the Government of New South Wales were very foolish to attempt to forestall our judgment by an expenditure of £20,000, because they must have known that to extend the residences of the Governor-General was not one of the powers regularly arising under the Constitution. Surely the essence of the prescription in the Constitution is that the seat of Government shall be where Parliament is sitting. I am aware that it is not expressly declared that Parliament must sit at the seat of Government. All that is set out is that until it meets at the seat of Government, Parliament shall sit in Melbourne. But, although it is not expressly stated, we know that it is implied that the moment we have a permanent seat of Government the Parliament and the Executive must be located there. It might suit the convenience of Ministers to have a second seat of the Executive in Sydney for five or six months during the year. It might suit the Prime Minister, who comes from New South Wales, to remain there for several months each year, and have the Governor at his elbow. But we are not bound to bring about such conditions for the convenience of Ministers. If we agree to the principle laid down in this motion, we may have one set of Ministers in Victoria, and another in New South Wales. Was that ever intended? In the very resolutions adopted by the Premiers' conference, the words "seat of Government" were not used. The word "capital" was used to indicate the seat of the Executive and of Parliament. Where is the capital now? Undoubtedly it is in Melbourne, and the Executive ought to be here. All Ministers should be here. They must accept the temporary inconvenience which attaches to their positions. We should be placing ourselves in an exceedingly false position if we allowed the Treasurer and the Attorney-General to administer their departments in Melbourne, two other members of the Government to perform their duties in Sydney, and the Postmaster-General to control his department from Brisbane. We should have to get an ambulatory Governor-General, put him in a balloon, and members provide him with gas. There is another aspect of this question, namely, "Should we be quite considerate to the Governor-General himself under the proposal of the Government?" The sum of £2,000 is a very small one to vote for the upkeep of the Sydney Government-house. It almost approaches to parsimony. I do not begrudge the expenditure of that amount, but if we compel His Excellency to reside in Sydney during five or six months of the year, we shall increase the sum which he will be required to pay out of his salary of £10,000. If he has to reside for a certain period in Sydney, he will certainly have to reciprocate the courtesies extended to him, and thus we shall increase, if we do not duplicate, the number of entertainments which he will be called upon

to provide. What will follow? Simply added prestige to New South Wales. Surely the prestige for what it is worth ought to belong to the Commonwealth. Under the Government proposal, it is true that a few more social coteries would be entertained, but that will mean a considerable increase in the private expenditure of the Governor-General. He cannot remove his necessary attendants without incurring an outlay above that which he would be called upon to bear if he resided in only one Government-house. Considering that we have cut down the allowances of the Governor-General almost to the border of niggardliness, we ought not to add to his expenditure. For that reason I cannot support the duplication of the Vice-Regal establishment. I admit that any obligations imposed upon the Commonwealth by the Premiers' conference should be carried out as speedily as possible. Personally, I regret that the Federal capital cannot be established in Sydney. In regard to that matter I entertain so very little feeling, that if a proposition were made to-morrow to amend the Constitution by cancelling the 100 miles limit provision, I should support it. It was an exceedingly bad condition to impose, and originated only in the petty rival jealousies of two of the States. The Constitution has been somewhat marred by that provision, which emanated from the narrow parochialism of certain persons in Victoria and New South Wales—a parochialism which is shared by politicians more than by the people. I object to the duplication of the Vice-Regal establishments, not because of the expenditure involved, but because it is unnecessary and inexpedient, and is not an obligation cast upon us by any compact which we ought to respect.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—In listening to this debate, the one point which has struck me is that those who support the Government proposal urge that as it does not constitute a very great lapse from the path of economy, we might very well sanction it, especially as we have the assurance that the mistake will not be repeated. I cannot accept any such excuse for a departure from what, to my mind, involves a very important principle, namely, that the Governor-General's residence shall be established at the seat of Government. I do not concede that any other arrangement was ever intended by the people of Australia when they expressed themselves as willing to join the Commonwealth. As far as Western Australia is concerned, it comes with a great deal of surprise to myself and others to discover that proposals were made of such a definite nature as those which have been placed before Parliament in regard to the establishment of the Governor-General in Sydney. I have to ask myself only one or two simple questions in order to arrive at a decision upon this matter. The first is, "Do the people of New South Wales as a whole really demand that His Excellency should spend a portion of his time in their capital?" I cannot find any evidence that they do. Neither can I discover that the people of Sydney, as a whole, are anxious that that course should be followed. Then I have to ask myself whether, if the question were put to him, any Governor-General would prefer to remain in any one city during a portion of the year, and to spend the balance of his time in another? I can understand that he would be naturally anxious to visit different parts of the Commonwealth, but I feel certain that he would emphatically declare that he would be better circumstanced if he were required to maintain only one Vice-Regal establishment. Therefore, I fail to discover that any useful purpose will be served by the adoption of the Government proposal. We have heard a great deal about the maintenance of a federal spirit requiring the proposed arrangement. But would not the maintenance of that spirit cover similar proposals with regard to the other States? If we are to provide two residences for the Governor-General, why should we not provide six? No reason has been alleged why we should be restricted to two. Of course we are told that Sydney and Melbourne are the two populous cities of the Commonwealth. If the claim of a State to have the Governor-General residing there is to depend upon its population, surely all the States are entitled, in greater or lesser degree, to that privilege, though, perhaps, in the case of a sparsely populated State, like Western Australia, we might have to be content with having the Governor-General's court dress sent over to us now and again. We hope that the Governor-General will visit us occasionally, and that the members of this Parliament will come, too. But we shall not worry very much if no special expenditure is voted to provide for his or their accommodation, and if they come they will experience no inconvenience because of that fact. I do not see my way to support the proposal of the Government, because I have heard no good reasons for voting against that economical administration which it is claimed is part of the federal policy, and which, I am sorry to say, has not been so much in evidence since this Parliament met as I think it should have been.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—The honorable member for Perth says that no good reasons have been advanced why a residence for the Governor-General should be provided in Sydney. To my mind very strong reasons have been urged why he should be provided with a residence there, but the trouble is that those reasons apply with almost equal force to all the other cities of Australia. It has been said, for instance, that Sydney is a very nice place to live in, and has a very fine climate; but there are many hundreds of thousands of square miles of country in Australia which enjoy just as good a climate. I suppose it may be assumed that Parliament will sit in Melbourne during the winter, and be in recess during the summer, and that the Governor-General will, during the session, reside in Melbourne. But would it be humane to freeze him in Melbourne during the winter, and to boil him in Sydney in the summer? It has also been urged by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs and others that the Governor-General should reside in Sydney because of the strong anti-federal spirit there.

Mr. McCAY. — As a sort of soothing syrup?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes. But is there not a much greater need for the administration of such a syrup in other parts of the Commonwealth—for instance, in Brisbane, where no very violent Federal spirit is being exhibited at the present time? The honorable member for Dalley has pointed out that many acts of the Commonwealth Government have created great irritation in Sydney, and that the presence of the Governor-General there would allay that irritation. But I point out that there is a similar irritation in all the States, and that his argument applies to Adelaide and Brisbane quite as much as to Sydney. Another reason advanced is that there are more people in Sydney than in any other city in Australia; but it would be more reasonable to send the Governor-General and his family to Adelaide or to Perth, where the population is not so large, and their presence would be more noticeable.

Mr. FOWLER.—And the person selected as Governor-General should have a good big family.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes; from that point of view. Then, again, Sydney is said to be wealthier and more important than the other cities. But if, as appears to be the case, she is suffering from an embarrassment of riches, that seems a good reason for expending this money in other parts of the Commonwealth which are not so well off. I would remind the representatives of New South Wales that the President of the United States resides only at the White-house in Washington, and that no claim has been made by the people of New York, or by the people of Chicago, to have official residences established there because of their wealth and greater population. Lastly, we are told that the Government are committed to this expenditure. But it is Parliament that has to decide what money shall be expended in providing for the Governor-General's accommodation, and I do not think we should recognise any compacts which have been entered into without our consent. What the people of New South Wales were chiefly concerned about was that the Governor-General should land first at Sydney, and that the inauguration of the Commonwealth should be proclaimed there. They got that, and Sydney had her great day of glorification. All Australia journeyed there to help her make holiday, and was treated right royally. But the proposal to keep up a residence for the Governor-General in Sydney is merely an attempt to feed parochial vanity. It has been said that if the people of New South Wales had known that they would not get this concession, they would not have joined the Union; but I cannot believe that. Surely they do not grudge Victoria the presence of the Governor-General in Melbourne for the few years during which Parliament must continue to sit here, until the Federal capital is built. The Constitution provides that the federal capital shall be in New South Wales, and no one has objected to that provision. The other States might have claimed the privilege, but they did not trouble to do so. I shall vote for the maintenance of only one Government-house. I am glad that the Government have decided to deal with this matter, because it was unfair that a certain sum should be set down as the salary of the Governor-General, when that amount was not absolutely at his disposal. If the salary provided is too big, it should be cut down; but whatever is given should be a clear salary.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—At this late hour I do not intend to take up the time of the committee at any length; but I feel that it is a pity that the matter has occupied the attention of honorable members at all. It will be seen from the correspondence which was laid on the table of the House to-day by the Acting Prime Minister, that the Minister for Home Affairs, when Premier of New South Wales, suggested to the Colonial-office that, as the Federal Parliament would meet in Melbourne, it was desirable to determine that the official residence of the Governor-General should be in Sydney when Parliament was not sitting. Mr. Chamberlain, in reply to that representation, said that he had no objection to the arrangement if the federating States agreed to it, if the Federal Government when it came into existence approved of it, and if the necessary provision were made to carry it out. As a matter of fact, however, the federating States did not agree to it, and the Federal Government, in failing to act on the suggestion of Mr. Chamberlain to obtain the opinion of Parliament on the subject at the earliest moment, have caused all the trouble which has occurred in the past, and the discussion which has taken place to-day. Personally, I feel rather in a difficulty. I in no way object to the amount the Government are asking for in this resolution. I think the sum proposed is very reasonable indeed; nor do I object that that money should be expended both in Sydney and in Melbourne. But I feel that we as a Parliament should be very careful to do nothing by which it might seem to be incumbent upon the Governor-General to maintain two establishments. With the greatest possible readiness I shall be prepared to give the amount of money asked for in this resolution, in addition to the £10,000 provided in the Constitution as the salary of the Governor-General, but I desire that there should be the clearest understanding that the Governor-General is expected to have only one establishment, and that he can reside elsewhere as may be convenient to himself. Of course, I realize that in practice the Governor General will reside in Melbourne when Parliament is in session, and that he will reside in Sydney for the most part when Parliament is not sitting, but I think honorable members should be very careful indeed not to affirm that there should be two Government residences, because if any affirmation of that kind is made, we may depend upon it that the amount asked for to-night will be only a part of the amount which will be asked for in future years.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy). — Any one who has followed the debate to-night must have thought that the people of New South Wales are simply yearning to have the Governor-General amongst them, and that as a matter of fact they came into the Federation only on the understanding that he should reside in that State for a certain time.

Mr. THOMSON.—They may yearn that an undertaking should be carried out.

Mr. McDONALD.—I think that the position taken up by the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, is the correct one, and the committee should take it seriously into consideration. The whole desire seems to be that, because certain members of the Government are residents of New South Wales, the location of the executive authority should be divided between New South Wales and Victoria, merely to suit the convenience of those Ministers. It appears to me that honorable members of this committee, as well as Ministers, should be considered. Some honorable members, owing to the peculiar position in which they are placed, have been forced practically to abandon their homes and reside in Melbourne. If the executive authority is to be divided, and some Ministers are to reside in Sydney, while others reside in Melbourne, and probably one in Brisbane, honorable members in conducting the business of their constituents may have to be chasing Ministers all over the Commonwealth. That is not a desirable state of affairs. When we have the federal capital established, I presume that it will be regarded as the place of residence of the Governor-General and the seat of government. But until the federal capital is established Melbourne should be accepted as the capital for the time being, and the Governor-General should reside here and nowhere else. On these grounds I intend to vote against any proposal for the establishment of a second residence for the Governor-General. I shall do so, though I would personally prefer that Parliament should sit in Sydney. Though a native of Victoria, I prefer New South Wales to this State. Apart from these considerations I am against this increase of £5,500. I think that the £10,000 a year should be sufficient to cover the whole expense. We are told that it was never expected that the Governor-General should meet all expenses out of the £10,000 a year salary. But I am of opinion that the general impression was—at all events it was so in Queensland—that the £10,000 a year was to cover all expenses in connexion with the Governor-General's establishment, just in the same way that it was generally expected that £400 a year was to cover the expenses of honorable members in attending this Parliament. If the salary of £10,000 is not sufficient for the Governor-General, and it is proper that the Government should make further provision, it would be right on just the same grounds that they should meet the expense of house rent, fuel, and light incurred by members of the Federal Parliament. I do not say that I believe that that should be done, but that it would be a logical thing to do if it is right that it should be done for the Governor-General. I protest that all through these proceedings the Government have attempted to keep something back. The whole matter is kept practically in the dark for eighteen months, and then we are informed that certain compacts have been entered into. I think that is wrong, and hope a similar state of affairs will not occur again. Nearly every honorable member who has spoken to-day has complained on this account, but not one seems to be prepared to take any further action. These matters, though small in themselves, may lead to the House being asked to approve transactions of a much more important character, simply because the Government have given promises in some secret way.

Mr. WINTER COOKE (Wannon).—I feel impelled to vote with the Government upon this matter, notwithstanding the very weighty speeches we have heard in opposition, and especially from the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. Both those honorable and learned members appear to have ignored the true position. It is clear that the Executive of the Commonwealth has entered into a distinct bargain with the State of New South Wales. We cannot ignore that fact. I fully admit that the Government have been to blame. They possibly should have told honorable members much earlier what they were doing. But upon that point I would remind honorable members that they are constantly asking questions upon paragraphs appearing in the press. If I may be permitted to say so, I think that this practice is too generally adopted. No sooner do honorable members see a paragraph in a newspaper affecting some portion of their States than they immediately come forward with a question. It has been well known for some time that the Government-house in Sydney was prepared for the Governor-General, and that a separate building was provided by that State for the State Governor, and yet no question upon the subject has been asked in this House, and no pressure has been brought to bear upon the Government in the matter. Honorable members are now complaining of secrecy, and that the Government have not taken the House into their confidence. I might ask why the honorable member for Kennedy did not come forward with questions upon the subject night after night, as he would have done if the matter affected the kanaka question, the question of the pearl-shelling industry in Torres Straits, or the number of Italians introduced into his State. If the honorable member felt this to be such a burning question, why did he not bring it before the House night after night in order that the hand of the Government might be forced? I think it would be a very serious thing for the committee to ignore a distinct compact made by our Executive authority with the Executive of New South Wales. Undoubtedly the Commonwealth is passing through troubled waters. There has been a great deal of friction, and if we now ignore the action of our Executive from some fear of constituting a precedent, deciding whether the Governor-General shall live hereafter in one or more States, we shall emphasize the feeling of irritation which I fear already exists in New South Wales. In answer to the honorable member for Perth, I would remind him that the people of New South Wales did vote money through their State Parliament, the only voice with which they can speak, in order that the Governor-General might live in Sydney during a portion of the year.

Mr. FOWLER.—That vote was disapproved of in many quarters.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—That may be said with regard to the decisions of any Parliament. The New South Wales Parliament was the only voice through which the opinions of the electors could be expressed at that time, and they voted money for the maintenance of the Governor-General's establishment in Sydney. As the acting leader of the Opposition has stated, it would be humiliating for this Parliament, and for the Governor-General, if New South Wales, upon finding that this Parliament refused to supply the necessary money, were to undertake to maintain at their own cost an establishment for the Governor-General in Sydney. I ask honorable members to consider the question from that aspect. I listened very carefully to the arguments adduced by honorable members, and I was very much influenced by the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, but we have staring us in the face the fact that if we do not agree to support the Government in this matter we shall be accused of a breach of faith.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I desire to propose an amendment omitting from the motion the words "and upon the Federal Executive Council of £1,925 a year." I do not see any necessary relation between the Governor-General's establishment and the Federal Executive Council, and there is no more reason why we should express our approval of this proposed expenditure than that we should sanction expenditure in the department of Home Affairs.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I have a prior amendment. I move—

That the motion be amended by the omission of the figures "£5,500," with a view to insert in lieu thereof the figures "£3,101."

My object is to omit from the motion the provision for the maintenance of a second establishment for the Governor-General in Sydney.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I desire to say a word or two with regard to the general motion before the committee, and particularly in reference to the remarks of the honorable member for Parramatta. Honorable members will understand that the amendment of the honorable member for Kennedy would not only omit the provision for the maintenance of Government-house in Sydney, but would also prevent us from keeping the engagement into which we have entered with the Government of New South Wales up to the end of next year. I trust that whatever views honorable members may entertain as to the expediency of continuing the occupation of Government-house in Sydney, they will at no time be willing to throw upon the hands of the Government of New South Wales, who have treated us so generously, the building which they have placed at our disposal, and for which they have provided an expensive substitute as a residence for the State Governor. I propose to add to the motion the words, "during the term of office of the next Governor-General." The Governor-General is appointed practically for five years, and the object of bringing this matter before the committee at present is to enable the Secretary of State for the Colonies to communicate to the gentleman to whom the position of Governor-General may be offered the conditions which will attach to his occupancy of the office. The honorable member for Parramatta will see that it is for this reason that the alteration proposed to be made in the provision for the Executive Council is here introduced. Hitherto we have been content to pay a nominal sum to the officer who has discharged the duties of Clerk of the Executive Council. The work attaching to that office is of the most responsible character, although comparatively simple. It includes the safe custody of the records, and attendance at the meetings of the executive, and precision in the entries is the chief requirement. In addition to that, it has been the practice to rely upon some member or members of the Governor-General's staff to carry out a number of transactions of the utmost importance to the Commonwealth. Every communication from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Commonwealth Government, or from the Government to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or through him to any of his colleagues, or to the representatives of any foreign power, or the other great dependencies of the Empire, requires to be intrusted to some member of His Excellency's staff. The Governor-General chooses his staff for his own reasons, sometimes on account of relationship, and in other instances because of his desire to have about him gentlemen with whom he has already established friendly relations. I have no desire to criticise the Governor-General's choice, but it is undesirable, and on some occasions very unsatisfactory, that the business of the Commonwealth should be intrusted to those who are attached to His Excellency's staff. We may be compelled to rely for the safe despatch, and for the coding and decoding of important telegrams relating to the Commonwealth, upon some young gentleman who, whilst being actuated by the best intentions in the world, has his mind occupied by social engagements. In Canada it has been found desirable to separate these functions from those which more properly belong to the members of His Excellency's staff, and intrust them to an officer directly employed by the Government. We therefore propose that the office shall be altered from that of Clerk to the Executive Council to that of Secretary of the Executive Council. In the custody of this officer will be placed the whole of the despatches, confidential and general, which pass between this Government and any other governments, and he will be held responsible for their despatch and for their coding and decoding where necessary.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Why should this provision be made here?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because it is necessary that the future Governor-General should know that he will not be required to make provision on his staff for one or other of the aides-de-camp by whom these duties have hitherto been discharged. For obvious reasons it is difficult to discuss this matter in detail, but I have already told honorable members that on one occasion a loss of some thousands of pounds was caused by an unintentional error on the part of an amiable young gentleman who was called upon as aide-de-camp to a Governor to deal with an important despatch. Other instances might be cited in support of the change proposed.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Will this officer be on the staff of His Excellency the Governor-General?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not in this capacity; he will be an officer of the Commonwealth, although he will be associated with His Excellency in a most confidential manner.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it not a fact that the Government will provide in this way for the private secretary to His Excellency the Governor-General?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; His Excellency will have his own private secretary, who will be a member of his personal staff.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Could it not be explained to His Excellency that the members of his staff would have nothing to do with the work of the Executive Council?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is necessary for us to provide for the payment of this responsible officer, who, although he will be on the most confidential terms with His Excellency, will be in this position entirely independent of the Governor-General's staff, and directly responsible to us.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Cannot the Governor-General be informed of that without our being called upon to pass this motion?

Mr. DEAKIN.—One of the matters to which attention was called in the original despatches from the Secretary of State for the Colonies was that in Canada an arrangement similar to that now proposed had been made, and had been found advantageous both to the Governor-General and to the Government. It is necessary to inform the new Governor-General of the change now proposed, so that he can make his own arrangements.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the £325 provided for?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is for the payment of the officer whom we have at present. It is his duty to perform all kinds of clerical work, including typewriting, the making of duplicates of telegrams and various other documents.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He must have a mighty lot to do.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He is very well occupied. I had much the same impression as the honorable member, but on inquiry found that this officer's time was amply occupied. I think that the criticism of the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, was an excellent one, and beg to assure him that there is no desire on the part of the Government to imply that the Governor-General is required to undertake anything more in connexion with his establishments than his own good judgment may induce him to think necessary. We do not desire to convey any impression that we wish to involve the Governor-General in any additional expense. He will be informed that, in addition to the Government-house at Melbourne, there will be another residence available for him in Sydney, which is rent free, and for which we find the necessary maintenance money, so that when he thinks it necessary to go to Sydney he may have a fitting house at his disposal. I agree with the honorable member for South Australia that there should be nothing that would imply any obligation.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Will the Governor-General appoint this officer?

MR. DEAKIN.—Certainly not.

MR. O'MALLEY.—Is Captain Wallington to be selected?

MR. DEAKIN.—So far as I am personally concerned, I should very strongly favour the appointment of Captain Wallington, because he has a greater knowledge of Australia, of the duties of the office, the functions of our Governors, and of our constitutional practice, than any one else of whom I know.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—Hear, hear—an excellent man.

MR. DEAKIN.—Personally, I shall be prepared to justify the selection of Captain Wallington for the position, but at present we are making provision for the office, and not for the man. I trust that what I have stated will induce the honorable member for Parramatta not to press his amendment, and that the honorable member for Kennedy, will also withdraw his proposal. I shall be prepared as soon as possible to move the amendment indicated. This will limit the operation of the motion, and doubtless at the end of the term specified, or perhaps before then, the whole question will be reconsidered in view of the early establishment of the federal capital.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I think that the honorable member for Parramatta has taken the right course. We are not dealing with the schedule submitted by the Government, which I understand to have been presented solely for our information. We are called upon to vote the amount proposed in a lump sum, and I do not see any objection to that. We understand, of course, that when we discuss the items we may reduce one amount and correspondingly increase another if we think they need adjustment. It would be difficult at this stage to say how much should be voted upon each item for the Governor-General's establishment. We are in a different position, however, in dealing with the proposed votes for the Federal Executive Council. That matter should be treated in detail, and each item should be discussed on the Estimates.

MR. DEAKIN.—So they will be.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Yes; but if we pass this vote now we shall practically sanction the expenditure and leave it to the Government to carry out the details. The argument of the Minister is weak, because if we separate the expenditure upon the Executive Council from the allowances to be made to His Excellency for the maintenance of his establishments, there can be no necessity for incorporating the former items in this motion. It would be very easy for the Government to say to the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the Governor-General is not expected to pay for any of the duties performed in connexion with the work of the Executive Council. Mr. Chamberlain could easily be informed that a secretary to the Executive would be appointed, and that the whole of the expenditure connected with the Governor-General's establishment is contained in the other items. Accordingly, I shall support the honorable member for Parramatta should he persevere with the amendment which he has indicated. I am extremely sorry that the honorable member for Kennedy intends to divide the committee upon this question. I think that less feeling would be excited, and that it would be more conducive to the dignity and magnanimity of this Chamber if we allowed a matter in which another State is interested, and concerning which the weight of argument is in favour of carrying out the distinct compact made by the Government, to pass upon the voices.

MR. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—After the speech of the Attorney-General, I am more determined than ever to press my proposal. The honorable gentleman succeeded in showing the absolute folly of appointing a highly salaried officer as secretary to the Executive Council, because when I asked him what were the duties of the subordinate officer who is to receive a salary of £325 a year, he replied that the latter would have to do the work.

MR. DEAKIN.—He will have to do the copying and typewriting.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I submit that the secretary of the Department for External Affairs should be able to do all the additional work that is required to be done. Surely he is the man who should undertake the confidential work. He should have charge of the strictly confidential documents which have been referred to, just as the under-secretaries have in all the States at the present time.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In New South Wales there is a secretary to the Executive Council who receives the same salary.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes; but he has not a clerk to do the work for him, as the Attorney-General proposes. I am not quarrelling with the appointment, but I do say that it ought not to be mixed up with the Governor-General's establishment. With regard to the confidential work, I repeat that it could well be undertaken by the private secretary to the Governor-General, in conjunction with Mr. Atlee Hunt. If those officers cannot manage it we must surely be hard up both for ability and trustworthiness. Apart from that consideration, however, I submit that the item in question is an ordinary one which is connected with ordinary expenditure, and should therefore be discussed upon the Estimates.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania). — I am amazed that the honorable member for Parramatta should take exception to an officer who is to receive £600 a year having a clerk in receipt of an annual salary of £325 to do the work for him. Officers in receipt of more than £600 a year usually have a subordinate to do their work. They are merely engaged to do the "bossing."

Question—That the figures proposed to be omitted stand part of the question—put. The committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Mr. JOSEPH COOK) proposed—

That the words—"And upon the Federal Executive Council of £1,925 a year," be omitted.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In any case this matter will come before the committee again, when the Estimates are under consideration. Therefore, I do not intend to discuss it, beyond saying that it is a matter upon which the future Governor-General ought to be informed before he accepts office. He ought to know that he would not be expected to take upon his staff a person to discharge functions which, in the interests of the Commonwealth, should be discharged by a Commonwealth officer.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wish to say in reply to the Attorney-General that he himself has told us that this secretary to the Executive Council will be directly under the control of the Government, and that the Governor-General will neither appoint him nor have anything to do with his appointment, nor have any responsibility whatever with regard to him—that it will be an ordinary executive appointment. As such it should be left over for consideration on the Estimates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will be dealt with on the Estimates.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie). — I am surprised to see this item included on the schedule. I suggest that it is desirable that it should come before us on the Estimates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will come before the committee on the Estimates.

Mr. SALMON.—Then why place it here ?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because it is part of the information we wish to supply to the future Governor-General.

Mr. SALMON. — Will he require to know that an officer will be appointed for this purpose ?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes ; and that he need not include on his staff any person to perform these duties.

Mr. SALMON.—That is a matter of information which can be afforded to the Governor-General without any resolution at this time. I hope that the Acting Prime Minister will reconsider the matter. The committee has dealt very generously with the proposals of the Government as a whole, and we are not asking too much when we request that this matter shall be eliminated from the resolution and dealt with as part of the ordinary estimates. I feel sure that if the Government are convinced that it is absolutely necessary that an officer shall be appointed for this work, Parliament will have no objection to voting an adequate sum of money.

Mr. WATSON.—Why cannot we decide now as well as later on ?

Mr. SALMON.—This is not the time when this committee should decide about making new appointments, and additions to the public service. We have been preaching economy, and endeavouring to cut down the expenditure of the Government, and surely it is not a fair thing that we should have an absolutely new appointment inaugurated upon a resolution, the object of which is quite distinct from what is now proposed. The object of the resolution is ostensibly for the settlement of the Governor-General's establishment, and not for the appointment of a new officer, who is to be no part of the Governor-General's establishment, but is to be an executive officer under the Crown, who is to be amenable to Parliament, and under the control and direction of Parliament, although for the purpose of convenience I presume that he will be lent to the Governor-General to perform certain duties which will come within the purview of the Crown's representative. We are told that this officer is to be the Secretary to the Executive Council, because it is considered desirable that certain communications which have to pass between the Government of the Commonwealth and the Imperial Government should not be in the hands of an irresponsible and uncontrollable person, but that the officer who will have charge of them should be a Commonwealth officer. If that be so, it is not necessary that the officer should be especially mentioned as a member of the staff of the Governor-General, and provided for on his establishment. He should be provided for as part of the staff of the Executive Council. We have already provided means whereby officers can be paid who have work to do in connexion with the Executive Council, and I hope that the Government in order to preserve that somewhat over-lauded uniformity of which we hear so much, will follow the usual course and have this officer's salary placed upon the ordinary Estimates, and eliminate it from this resolution.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I should like to say to the Acting Prime Minister that we are now asked to decide what is really a very different matter from the one that has been under discussion. We are obviously asked to provide an officer whose duty it will be to act as secretary to the Executive Council, instead of our pursuing the existing practice of making an allowance to an officer already in the service for performing those duties. It may be that it may be found necessary to have a new officer. I shall regret it if it is so, because the Executive Council as a whole does not take up very much of the time of an officer, and whoever discharges these functions will have a clerk at £325 a year to assist him. It may be, however, that this separate officer will be necessary if the Federal Executive is going to start upon a peripatetic career throughout the Commonwealth. But, at any rate, we are asked to determine whether an officer whose duties at present are discharged by some one in the service, shall be appointed to perform those duties. I urge that that question is not involved in the question whether Parliament will provide funds for the carrying out of the duties of clerk to the Executive Council. That is taken for granted, but the question here is as to an alteration of the mode of carrying out the duties, and the consequent increase in the expenditure of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SALMON. — The question really is whether we are to pay for a private secretary to the Governor-General.

Mr. McCAY.—If the officer is to be a private secretary to the Governor-General he is wrongly described in these particulars. From whatever point of view we look at it we are not now settling the question whether the Commonwealth shall pay this man, or what amount the Commonwealth will pay him. Those are very different matters indeed.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—There seems to be some difference of opinion as to what the exact duties of this proposed new officer will be. I was under the impression that the officer proposed to be appointed would have a certain amount of work of a confidential nature to do in regard to the establishment of the Governor-General, between the Government and the Governor-General. If that be so, I take it that the officer would be distinct from a mere clerk to the Executive Council, whose sole functions would be the registering of decisions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is correct.

Mr. WATSON.—If that is so, it is of no use arguing that the officer will be one who will carry out the duties which the clerk of the Executive Council has previously had to do. He will be a distinct individual.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it of any use arguing whether he could very well be done without?

Mr. WATSON.—That may or may not be so, but it is of no use confusing the position. I cannot say whether such an officer can or cannot be done without. Never having been a member of any Executive Council, I cannot say what necessity there is for having such an official. But I do say that, if the Ministry assure us that it is necessary, for the efficient working of the service, to have some such officer—and I am assuming that to be correct, and can only take the word of Ministers in that regard—we have no right to sacrifice that efficiency to any false economy, so far as concerns £600 a year, or even £6,000 a year.

Mr. SALMON.—Does the honorable member think that such an officer should be part of the Governor-General's establishment?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not understand that he is to be so altogether. The position that this officer will occupy is somewhat complicated, and for that reason it is hard to define whether he will be a portion of the Governor-General's establishment, or an ordinary member of the civil service.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Attorney-General says that the Governor-General will have nothing to do with him.

Mr. WATSON.—That is, I understand, as to his direction and control, but I understood the Acting Prime Minister some weeks ago, when laying this schedule upon the table, to say that the officer will have a great deal to do with the Governor-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Some honorable members have obviously made up their minds to vote against this proposal without a sufficient appreciation of the interests involved. I understand that the honorable member for Parramatta, who has moved the amendment, safeguarded himself by saying that he would be quite prepared to consider the question upon its merits when the Estimates were being dealt with. His contention is that the expenditure should not be provided for here. My reply is that it should be here, not because it concerns the Governor-General's establishment, but because it is a matter of which future Governors-General should be informed. As I do not wish to prejudice the case by forcing it to a premature decision, I am willing to consent to the omission of the words "and upon the Federal Executive Council of £1,925."

Amendment agreed to.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the following words be added—"during the term of office of the next Governor-General."

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—In order that I may have an opportunity of voting upon this question, without being placed in the position of voting to leave the arrangement one made for an indefinite period, I move—

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the words—"of office of the next Governor-General" with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "ending 31st December, 1903."

That covers the term for which the arrangement has been made between the Federal Government and the States Governments.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—Do the Government consent to this amendment of the amendment?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Honorable members appear to be anxious to save themselves from having to give a vote against the Government, although they have disapproved of what the Government have done. They are, therefore, willing to ratify the agreement which has been made, up to the last minute for which the Government is pledged, but no further. This, I suppose, is an exhibition of what would be termed by honorable members opposite a fine federal spirit, though I can see only the most intense provincialism in such a pettifogging action. The agreement was made in good faith, and it ought to be kept. At the end of 1903, we shall be in the same difficulty as we are in now, though two years later we might be in a very different position. There will, however, probably be more bitterness imported into the discussion of the matter a year hence than we have had to-night, and more bitterness will probably be felt outside about the decision arrived at. Since the Government are committed to this arrangement, why seek to bring it to a conclusion perhaps a year before it can come to an end in the ordinary course of events?

Question—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the amendment—put. The committee divided.

Resolved—That an expenditure upon Government-house of £5,500 a year, as submitted in the statement ordered to be printed on the 7th instant, is approved during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Resolution reported and adopted.

PAPER.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE laid upon the table—

Report by the General Officer Commanding, in reference to the appointment of drill instructors in South Australia.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

In submitting the motion, I beg to inform honorable members that after the disposal of the formal stages of the Royal Commission Bill to-morrow the business will probably be the Bonus Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Senate.Wednesday, 27 August, 1902.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

SUGAR INDUSTRY: KANAKAS.

Senator HIGGS asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Is it true that when northern cane farmers of New South Wales decided to register under the new federal conditions and work their farms with the aid of white men, a number of kanakas went from New South Wales to Queensland, and were engaged by Messrs. Young Bros., of Fairy-mead Plantation, Bundaberg district, for a period of three years, the rate of pay for the first year being 8s. per week and rations; second year, 10s. per week and rations; third year, 12s. per week and rations?

2. Is it true that these kanakas from New South Wales were at once set to work clearing land leased by Messrs. Young Bros., and cutting timber into firewood?

3. Is clearing land and cutting firewood work which may legitimately be considered to come under the heading of tropical or semi-tropical agriculture?

4. Did not Dr. Maxwell, the Queensland sugar expert, say that white men can do all the work necessary in connexion with the production of sugarcane in the Bundaberg district?

5. Is it not true that there is plenty of white labour in the Bundaberg district available for clearing land and cutting firewood?

6. Is it true that after Messrs. Young Bros. engaged the kanakas from New South Wales they cancelled the agreements of about 100 kanakas not long since arrived from the islands; if so, who permitted the cancellation of the agreements?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. No; but they engaged a large number of kanakas locally at the rates named.

2. No.

3. The work of clearing land for the bond fide cultivation is allowable. It is immaterial whether the timber is stacked or burnt, or stacked and preserved. If the latter, it must be handled by white labour thenceforward.

4. Dr. Maxwell, speaking to farmers' deputation in Bundaberg, said, "Abolition of kanaka labour would paralyze to death industry in North Queensland. Bundaberg might make attempt to carry on without it, but only on condition that, besides rebate, very large proportion of benefits federal protection would reach grower."

5. There is plenty of white labour in Bundaberg.

6. Youngs engaged no kanakas from New South Wales, but they cancelled agreements of sickly men recently arrived, by advice of medical officer, and returned them to their islands by permission of the Polynesian department.

LIEUTENANT KIRKLAND.

Senator HIGGS asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. By whom was Lieutenant G. K. Kirkland, the Acting Adjutant of the 7th New South Wales Infantry Regiment, appointed to the position?

2. What is the establishment of the company which, until recently, was commanded by the officer in question?

3. What has been the average attendance of the company at parades held during the last twelve months?

4. Is it a fact that many of the men of the company formerly commanded by Lieutenant Kirkland refused to drill under him, and that it was contemplated to disband the company?

5. Is it contemplated to appoint Lieutenant Kirkland to the position of permanent adjutant of the regiment?

6. If so, what salary will be attached to the position?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. Lieutenant Kirkland has not been appointed to the position, but his name has been submitted for consideration for appointment as adjutant on the partially-paid establishment, at a salary of 5s. per diem.

2. One hundred.

3. Fifty-two.

4. No.

5 and 6. These are answered by the reply to No. 1.

DEFENCE FORCES.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What was the strength of the military defence force in each State respectively at the date of taking over of same by the Commonwealth?

2. What is the present strength of the military defence force in each State respectively?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. Strength of military forces at date of taking over same by the Commonwealth—

New South Wales	9,772
Victoria	7,011
Queensland	4,310
South Australia	2,956
Western Australia	2,283
Tasmania	2,554

Total ... 28,886

2. Strength on 1st August, 1902—

New South Wales	9,350
Victoria	6,771
Queensland	3,199
South Australia	2,214
Western Australia	1,845
Tasmania	2,199

The above figures do not include rifle clubs or junior cadets.

From the point of view of either protection or revenue, a duty of 2d. per lb. is ample. Senator O'Connor has mentioned the amount of the collections for a period of six months. So far as the printed records show, there is no discrimination in the line fruits and vegetables, which in the Tariff are subdivided into a large number of articles. I do not know exactly whether the revenue of £20,000 was derived from the duty on raisins, or from the duties on the articles included under the head of fruits and vegetables, in item 21.

Senator O'CONNOR.—From dried fruits and vegetables.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I thought so. The request of the Senate is limited to one article—raisins. Item 21 is a very long and comprehensive one. I do not intend to differ with Senator O'Connor when we come directly to deal with certain articles. The item to which I refer is a much more lucrative source of revenue than is this item, because the great bulk of the commoner sorts of raisins which are consumed are those which are produced at Renmark and Mildura. It is not the duty which has benefited these people, but they have been selling their raisins in London, where they have found a good market for them. Therefore, we are putting on a duty which increases the price of the commodity consumed here. No one can say that raisins are not a necessity. We are trying to raise the standard of living among our households, and must recognise that raisins, in common with many other commodities which are consumed, must be included in the category of necessities. The duty of 2d. was the Tasmanian rate. It was imposed in that State as a revenue duty. Surely 60 or 70 per cent. protection ought to be enough from the grower's point of view. It has been contended that the duty is not prohibitive because revenue is derived from it. If it is not prohibitive, where is the protection? From my point of view it is not prohibitive, because there is a large importation, and it is for that reason that a large revenue is derived from it.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia). —Senator Symon has said that this duty amounts to about from 75 to 100 per cent. in some cases, and that he wants to lower it. Let me ask him how it is that he and his party do not follow out that principle in other cases? There was a duty of 80 per cent. on an article of such general consumption as salt, but his party quietly allowed that to pass without objection. Salt, however, is far more largely consumed than raisins and currants. It goes into every household in every part of Australia, and is also largely used for purposes of manufacture, and in the preserving of food for the people. Yet no objection was taken to it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Because that was a compromise made in the House of Representatives by express agreement. I said so here.

Senator PLAYFORD. — There was a compromise in regard to cement, but the honorable and learned senator did not mind interfering in that case. If the party opposite lay down general principles they ought to be prepared to apply them all round. I do not know why the people who cultivate the soil should be sought to be specially injured in this manner, or why they should not have such benefits as are conferred upon others who manufacture certain goods. In this case, Senator Symon is endeavouring to interfere with the horticultural industry, which he should do all he can to promote. The more that can be done to put people on the soil, and employ them in outdoor occupations, the better it will be for the community at large. We should endeavour to promote cultivation rather than encourage people to crowd into the towns to find work in factories. The duty proposed is necessary for that purpose. Raisins can hardly be looked upon as articles of absolute necessity, although they are articles of general consumption. They are certainly not as necessary as salt. I trust that we shall give way in regard to the matter.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—It is all very well for Senator Playford to tell us that by imposing protective duties we shall encourage people to settle in the country. If he stuck to that principle we could understand his attitude.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have to consider other people as well.

Senator CLEMONS. — The honorable senator who now talks about encouraging people to settle in the country is just as vehement in his support of the imposition of duties of 30 per cent. on hats, boots, and other items, the tendency of which is to induce people to settle in the cities. That sort of clap-trap argument convinces no one, and is unworthy of the honorable senator who has used it. I admit that it is difficult to deal fairly with this item, for the are very few uses to which the lands of Australia can be put so universally as that of dairying. There are probably more persons interested in this industry than in almost any other. I do hope that, looking at the matter even from the point of view from which it has been dealt with, the committee will see no reason for pressing the request. There is another element which must be considered, and that is the necessity for coming to a final agreement on the item on a question of this kind. In the other House it was discussed, with other items, for months. In the Senate it has been discussed, and the view of the majority has been established; but we have now to come to an agreement. Unless there is some very strong and good reason why the request should be pressed it is one of those cases in which the committee might very well recede from the position it has taken up. I find from the records of the other House that there was a majority of six in favour of the rejection of the request of the Senate. There appears to be no reason either from the point of view of the consumer or from the revenue aspect why the request should be adhered to. On the other hand, there is a very strong reason from the point of view of protection, which operated on the other House, and which has operated on a large number of honorable senators, why the duty proposed by the House of Representatives should be adopted. Under all the circumstances, it would really be in the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole if the Senate did not press its request.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I hope that the committee will adhere to the request of the Senate in regard to butter and cheese. I quite appreciate what my honorable and learned friend, Senator O'Connor, has said on the points to which he has directed the attention of honorable senators. He has said that the majority shown by the records of the House of Representatives against accepting the request of the Senate was six. May I remind him that the majority in favour of the request in the Senate was four, in a House half as numerous as the House of Representatives. This majority of four represented at least 25 per cent. more than the majority in the other place, which has asked us to reconsider the requested reduction. Senator O'Connor has directed attention very properly to the Tariffs of the States prior to federation. In all the States, with the exception of Queensland and New South Wales, the duty on butter was 2d. That was one of the reasons which influenced the majority in the Senate to adopt the 2d. rate. In New South Wales butter was free. I have no desire to under-rate the attention which we ought to give to the feeling of the House of Representatives. We ought to be as solicitous to meet their views as they have been in their attitude with regard to the requests made by the Senate. I would also point out that, whilst with regard to butter there was a majority of four in the Senate, in regard to cheese there was a majority of six. The reason for that is obvious. We cannot frame a Tariff free from all difficulties and anomalies, but there is no doubt that a duty of 2d. on cheese is infinitely higher than the same duty on butter. The next point taken by Senator O'Connor was that this is a protective duty. The view we took previously was that a duty equal to that which operated in Victoria before federation is ample for protective purposes. It is urged that it is only in exceptional cases, owing to the operation of drought and so on, that this duty would increase the price of the articles to the consumer. But those are just the times when we ought to be careful not to increase the price. I do not know whether butter is regarded as a luxury, but it is an article of such universal consumption that we may very fairly take it to be a necessary. In our improved conditions of life, butter should be regarded from that point of view. We should like to see everybody able to take a little butter with his bread, and we ought to avoid the danger of increasing the price, even in times of extremity. These are reasons why it seems to me that the committee ought not to depart from the request it has already made, and which has been supported by such a large majority proportionately. We cannot get rid of the protection of 2d. per lb., because that has been assented to; but we should not agree to increasing the duty.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I should like shortly to state the reason why I shall vote for the Government proposition, because those reasons will influence me in giving a similar vote on all or nearly all of the items in Division IV. of the Tariff. The first reason I give is this—that we ought to be prepared to meet the House o

Representatives in the same manner as we expect that House to meet us. If every member of either House were always to adhere to the vote which he originally gave on an item of the Tariff or a clause in a Bill, we should never be able to pass any measures at all; we could not have passed any Bills this session except, perhaps, a few Supply Bills. It is absolutely necessary that at some stage we must arrive at compromises; and I think that these items in Division IV. are essentially items on which the Senate might give way. Secondly, I have come to this conclusion because I think this duty is illusory; that it really does not matter from the practical point of view—that it does not make much difference—whether the duty on butter is 1s. per lb., or 1d. per lb., because we produce enough butter to supply all the people of Australia, under normal conditions at all events; and we must legislate for normal conditions. If we are led away by the consideration that under certain exceptional circumstances certain consequences will happen we shall not be doing our duty, because I repeat that we ought to legislate for normal conditions. Then again I say that, wherever possible, we ought to help the dwellers in the country. It must be recollected that this Tariff is to some extent a protective Tariff, and that the people who live in the country have to pay for the benefit of the people who live in the town. Now, if any occasion arises where they can have some compensation we ought to give it to them. There is no tendency which is more deprecated by statesmen all over the world than that of people to flock into the towns and leave the country; and we ought not, by our legislation, to do anything to help that tendency. We ought to do everything we can to prevent it; and if, under certain circumstances, the dwellers in the country—the agricultural population—can derive some compensating advantages by means of this Tariff, we ought to give those advantages to them. I do not think we shall, speaking generally, give any such advantage to them by means of this duty, because it will have no effect, except under the special circumstances to which I have referred. Therefore I say it is a matter of such small consequence that we may well give way with regard to it. Further, the House of Representatives have, according to the admission of every one, given way on a great many matters of minor importance. This, also, is a matter of minor importance.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nothing of the kind.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Well, that is my opinion. I am entitled to my opinion as much as Senator Symon is entitled to his; and in my opinion this is a matter of minor importance. My last reason is that my State—the State of South Australia—wants all the revenue she can get. I do not think she is likely to get much revenue from this item. She will get very little indeed—we admit that. But if under a certain set of circumstances some revenue is to be derived from the item she ought to get it. We want it all; we can not do without any of it. I admit that this is a minor reason. I am prepared to uphold the position taken up by the Senate in matters of great importance.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable and learned senator mention one or two?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I will mention them when we come to them. But I am prepared to give way in regard to this matter, because I think it is of minor importance; and the reasons I have given in reference to this item will also operate in regard to a number of items of a similar description.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I agree rather with the leader of the Opposition, when he says that this is a matter of some consequence, than with Senator Baker who seems to consider that it is a matter of very minor moment. This is a duty which I consider has been passed in the interests of our agriculturists—in the interests of our primary producers, whom the members of the Opposition always profess to be so anxious to encourage. Honorable senators tell us that this duty is inoperative in good seasons. Every one admits that. We are all glad to know that under a protective policy, Australia has developed a very important butter industry. But there come times in the history of Australia, when even an industry like the butter industry is brought to a dead stop. They are times of drought. Senator Symon says that they are the very times when this duty ought not to be collected, because then people are in poor circumstances and are unable to pay. That is one aspect of the question, but there is another aspect of it which appeals much more forcibly to me. We want to stimulate our people to overcome the effects of drought. We want to hold out some inducement to them to discover some means of obviating droughts—to circumvent them so to speak. This duty of 3d. per lb. on butter proposed by the House of Representatives is held out as a premium to our agriculturists for that purpose. Senator Symon would destroy that incentive. He would say to the agriculturists—"The moment you can produce enough butter to supply the Australian market, we will bring you into competition with the rest of the world. Does the honorable senator imagine that would stimulate an industry? Would it not have the effect of damping the energies of our people?"

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We want to benefit them by giving them cheap butter.

Senator STEWART.—I desire to benefit them by giving them an additional industry—by discovering if we can how the evil effects of the drought are to be avoided. We know that the various inducements which have been held out to different industries have had the effect of stimulating the people to make inventions and discoveries, which have neutralized in a great measure many of the disadvantages under which Australia labours. Are we going to abandon that policy? Are we going to cease to hold out inducements to people to exert themselves in order to discover ways and means of doing away with many of the evils of climate and soil and other things in Australia? The very object of this duty is to encourage our agriculturists to produce butter even in the worst of seasons, so as to make us independent, not only of the producer outside, but of the drought within. Is that not a result for which every Australian ought to strive? Would that not be a much higher position in which to place the people, than that of being brought to a standstill when confronted by a particular set of natural circumstances? I ask the leader of the Opposition and those who follow him to consider this aspect of the question. It is that principle which, at all events, will govern me in giving my vote upon this question.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not know whether to be entirely pleased or surprised by the concluding remark made by Senator Baker. I refer to the statement that, in the present circumstances, he was not going to support the Senate in regard to this request. Looking at that remark from one point of view, I confess at once that I derive a certain amount of encouragement from it, because I take it as a fair indication that the honorable and learned senator may be prepared at some time during the present discussion to vote in a direction opposite to that in which he originally recorded his vote. So far as the present item is concerned, Senator Baker is not making any concession. He proposes to repeat the vote which he gave when the question was previously before us. As to the other arguments advanced by him, I would point out—and I wish to deal with this matter earnestly and seriously—that he stated we produced enough butter for all our necessities. With that I entirely concur. Although I shall not go so far as to say that I am with him as to the unimportance of making the duty in this case either £1 or 1d. per lb., I can conceive that in regard to certain items of a somewhat similar nature I could go with him and say that we might allow them to go free, or impose a duty of £1 a bushel on them. Personally I do not think that butter ought to be taxed, but I recognise that we ought to meet the existing circumstances, and to give way because of present necessities, although we do not surrender our principles. For that reason I would point out to Senator Baker that the one State which is pre-eminent in the production of butter is Victoria, where the output is far larger than in any other part of the Commonwealth. I would also mention the well-known fact that of all the States of the Commonwealth which showed a desire for protection Victoria was again pre-eminent. The duty under the Victorian Tariff, however, was only 2d. per lb., and if it is argued that we must concede something to the desire of the other side to assist an industry, what better example could we have as to the concession which it is a fair thing for us to make than that of Victoria. It is a preeminently protectionist State, and I will grant this argument, for the moment, to the other side—although I do not believe in it—that the effect of protection in that State was such that a duty of 2d. per lb. on butter created an enormous industry, and enhanced the value of land in many cases up to £30 and £40 per acre. In these circumstances, assuming that we are at one with the protectionists of the Senate, can there be any reason why we should say that a duty of 3d. per lb. is more desirable than one of 2d. per lb.? Surely it stands to reason that, if we desire to join our honorable friends on the other side in attempting to assist an industry by a protective duty, we should fix that duty which has been proved—and I am again adopting an argument which honorable senators opposite might use—to be eminently successful? That duty is 2d. per lb. Another State, which has not produced butter so largely as Victoria has done, although having regard to its size, it has produced it in considerable quantities—I refer to Tasmania—had a duty of 2d. per lb. I do not say that it was a protective one. As we have heard to-day, there is practically no State which has a higher duty than 2d. per lb. Why, then, should the committee give way? Adopting an argument that appeals to protectionists, why do not the protectionist members of the Senate say to the protectionist members of another place—“You are making a mistake in the rate of the duty which you propose. According to protectionist precedents, 2d. per lb. is the right duty.” Another argument used by Senator Baker—and I was sorry to hear him use it, for I do not think he fully realized its effect at the present time—was that South Australia wanted revenue. He started by saying that he desired to help the dwellers in the country. I presume he meant that he wished to give them real assistance. He knows that we have always contended that no real assistance is conferred by this duty, and I do not believe that he wants to join with any one in fooling the farmers. Then the honorable and learned senator stated that South Australia wanted revenue. I leave him to look after the revenue interests of that State.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He admits with all this solicitude that the duty will practically not give South Australia a penny.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am coming to that. I will assume that South Australia wants revenue. In ordinary normal times, however, South Australia will not obtain a farthing from this duty.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I said so.

Senator CLEMONS.—If an occasion does really occur when South Australia will obtain revenue under this item, it can only be an occasion of stress and adversity, when no man would really desire to increase the troubles of the people. The benefit which those engaged in this industry desire to obtain from it is not the benefit derived from the sheer necessities of others, but that obtained by sending their butter to foreign markets, where people can buy it who are able to pay for it. Even the protectionists would not be bold enough to say that they want the butter industry to flourish out of the necessities and miseries of our own people. If we get a farthing of revenue from this item, it will be because of the abject miseries of the people. I would not take revenue in that way. I should prefer to see the State do without it. As Senator Baker has addressed the committee on the revenue aspect of the question, I wish to point out that abundant opportunity has been offered to him to obtain revenue for South Australia. I might instance many cases. For example, he could have gained it by voting for the request that the duty on boots be reduced. Apart from that, which is a controversial item, there was another obvious occasion when Senator Baker failed in his duty, and that was in regard to the request to increase the excise on tobacco.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable and learned senator in order in discussing the way in which honorable senators voted on other occasions?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Senator DOBSON).—References to other items have been allowed by way of illustration, and I hardly feel called upon to stop the honorable and learned senator. But I think he has gone far enough.

Senator CLEMONS.—I agree with you, sir, because I have gone exactly the distance which I wished to go. I have pointed out what is the real value of the revenue cry; that there are other and better means to obtain revenue; and I think I have discharged my duty by showing how revenue may be derived in other directions without calling on anybody to pay for their miseries. I think the committee should adhere to its request. Our hands are abundantly strengthened by the simple fact that from the point of view of protectionists 2d. per lb. is the proper duty to impose. That is their argument, not ours, and the protectionist members of another place should be asked to reconsider this request on that ground. Armed with that argument, which is unassailable, the committee, out of respect for the majority of its members, should adhere to its request.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Save for a few showers of eloquence which fell from one or two of us, there was a political drought in the Senate a few days ago, but the drought is now broken up. Certain honorable senators have returned, the flood-gates have been opened, and we are to be deluged for the next two or three weeks I suppose with torrents of words. I do not wish to repeat myself, but—

Senator EWING.—What about the revenue aspect of the question?

Senator HIGGS. — Honorable senators who propose that we should adhere to this request are prepared to sacrifice £20,000 a year in revenue.

Senator CLEMONS. — Make it £200,000 ; that would be just as likely.

Senator HIGGS.—My imagination is not so expansive as is that of honorable senators who speak very frequently of millions when we can only discover thousands. I find that according to the return of the Customs and Excise revenue from the 9th October, 1901, to the 30th June last, the collections in respect to butter and cheese were as follows :—New South Wales, £15,087 ; Victoria, £12,747 ; Queensland, £3,983 ; South Australia, £2,067 ; Western Australia (uniform Tariff), £22,592, special Tariff, £14,551 ; Tasmania, £1,499. Total, £57,975. These were the collections under the duty of 3d. per lb., and honorable senators who wish to reduce the duty are prepared to sacrifice one-third of the revenue. What becomes of Senator Clemons' £200,000 ? Honorable senators who think that the request should be adhered to, are not interested in butter ; they really have their eyes upon cheese. They want to get into this country the very fine cheeses, such as the Roquefort, the Camembert, the Swiss Gruyere, the Gloucester, and the Cheddar.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not the cheese!

Senator HIGGS.—That is the cheese which pays the duty. If this cheese is made dutiable at 3d. per lb., it will be a little more expensive to the gentlemen who use it. Senator Clemons has spoken of the miseries of the poor, but it is the misery of the gentlemen who use this high-class cheese that the honorable and learned senator really has in his mind. I hope that some honorable senator will secure the actual figures, but I venture to say that the greater portion of this revenue of £57,975 has been collected upon cheese. The miseries of the poor ! There is not a solitary poor family in the Commonwealth that consumes Roquefort, Camembert, or Cheddar cheese. As a matter of illustration, I suppose honorable senators were also influenced by "the miseries of the poor" in dealing with the duties upon cigars and bottled beer. They seem to think of nothing but their stomachs. They must have all these delicacies, and then they must be able to get a cheap cigar to aid the process of digestion. Senator Clemons is most anxious that we should follow the Victorian Tariff in this case, but will the honorable and learned senator advocate that course in dealing with the whole of the Tariff ? We know that he will not. He knows very well that the Victorian scientific protectionist Tariff meant only a 10 per cent. duty upon all items, owing to the fact that so many were included in the free-list in the interests of the people who really were subject to miseries. Because it suits the honorable and learned senator's immediate purpose, he now recommends that we should adopt the Victorian duty of 2d. per lb. upon butter. I am in favour of the Queensland duty of 3d. per lb., and surely that State should be considered sometimes. This is one of the items which honorable senators should allow to go. We are told that the proposed duty will not matter a fig to the producer, but in spite of that some honorable senators are prepared to run the risk of delaying the passing of this Tariff for some months, if not for a year. I do not think that is a statesman-like view to take. I do not know how the majority to which Senator Symon has referred is made up. The view I take is that in case of an ultimate fight between the two Houses and a dissolution, there will be a re-election and the two Houses will be very much the same as at present. Then in a joint meeting where shall we be ?

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator think that we shall come back ?

Senator HIGGS.—These questions are much too pointed, and I shall not attempt to answer them. I hope that better counsels will prevail, and that the gentlemen who have it in their power to stop this deluge of talk will exercise their power.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Senator Higgs has just stated that he believes in the Queensland Tariff of 3d. per lb., and that he considers that Queensland is entitled to consideration. To follow the honorable senator's expression, I am in favour of the New South Wales Tariff, which was nothing per lb., and I think that State is entitled to consideration. If under the circumstances I am willing, and other senators from New South Wales are willing, to vote for a duty of 2d. per lb., Senator Higgs can well afford to give way to the extent of 1d.

Senator HIGGS.—Honorable senators gave up free-trade for New South Wales on account of federation.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Somebody may have given it up, but honorable senators on this side did not. If it was taken from us that is another matter. Reference has been made by Senator Clemons to the development of the butter industry in Victoria under the existence of a duty of 2d. per lb., but I point out that without bonuses, which were given in Victoria, and without a protective duty of 2d. per lb., the position of New South Wales in the matter of butter production is not an insignificant one. If, in addition to butter production in New South Wales, we also consider the production of cheese in that State, it will be found that it is very much ahead in volume of the cheese production of Victoria. I think it will be found that dairying development in New South Wales, without either bonus or duty compares much more than favorably with its development in Victoria, where the industry has had the advantage of more regular seasons, more frequent rainfalls, and the advantage supposed to accrue from very liberal fiscal support. Though I regret, as I should, any delay in the passing of the Tariff, I am under all circumstances prepared to stand by the previous decision of the Senate and vote for a duty of 2d. per lb.

Item 21. Fruits and vegetables, viz. :—
Raisins and other, including peel and ginger, preserved, not in liquid, per lb., 3d.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 2d. per lb.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

I wish to state very shortly the salient points of the issue between the Houses. From the revenue point of view, a certain sum is, and always will be, derived from this item, no matter what the local production is. The amount which is coming in is certainly worth consideration. The revenue collected on dried fruits from 1st January to 30th June was £20,106. Making all allowances for differences of seasons and exceptional conditions, it represents a sum of £40,000 per annum. The contributions to the different States is a matter of some importance. The contributions were as follow :—To New South Wales, £4,460 ; to Victoria, £7,896 ; to Queensland, £1,947 ; to South Australia, £1,076 ; to Tasmania, £1,188 ; and to Western Australia, £3,539. It is obvious, then, that if the duty were reduced by 1d. per lb., it would lead to a loss of revenue. The revenue could only be recouped by importing 50 per cent. more of the articles, and that would undoubtedly affect very seriously the fruit-growing industry. At Renmark, in South Australia, and Mildura, in Victoria, a very large amount of capital is invested, and a large number of persons are engaged in this industry. The result has been, not only to give employment to a large number of persons, and to establish a profitable and prosperous industry, but to cheapen the cost of raisins to the consumer. We are getting all this benefit not to the detriment of the community protection which is afforded in steadying and securing the market under all circumstances in regard to wheat. It is only fair that we should treat the man who has to till the soil with a certain amount of consideration when the benefits of protection are being distributed. If we leave him out of consideration altogether, we disturb the fairness and the balance of the Tariff. Whatever may have been the free-trade proclivities of some honorable senators, the net result is that the Tariff is protective. It has given protection to a great number of industries and occupations. Care should be taken that that protection is given fairly to all classes of the community, and the farmers who have embarked in the business of growing wheat should have the same amount of regard shown for their interests as has been shown for the interests of those growing other kinds of grain. I ask the committee to remember also that the competition in regard to wheat must be regarded very seriously. A large amount of wheat is imported from New Zealand. If wheat is made free of duty, New Zealand will probably be a much larger competitor. Two things have to be remembered. In the first place, the wheat yield in New Zealand generally is exceedingly large as compared with the wheat yield of Australia. For ten years ending 1899 the wheat yield, per acre, in New Zealand, was 24·61 bushels—an enormous yield. The average yield in Australia for that period was only 7·31 bushels. That is to say, the wheat yield in New Zealand is about three times what it is in Australia. In other words, with practically the same amount of labour—there may be a little extra labour in gathering—three times as much wheat per acre is grown in New Zealand as is grown in Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—But what about the value?

Senator O'CONNOR.—There is a great difference in the value of the wheat grown in different parts of Australia. The best flour is made from mixtures of wheat, and there has always been a good market here for New Zealand wheat. It therefore has to be remembered how easy it is for the wheat market of Australia to be flooded at any time when there is a heavy harvest in different parts of the world. I mention New Zealand as an illustration, but wheat also comes from California and Argentine. Ought we to put the men who in different parts of Australia have to struggle with drought and difficulty during the greater part of the year in the position of having to compete with wheat-growers in those other places when the time comes that there is a good price to be obtained for wheat? There is another, and very important consideration. That is the comparison between land freight and water freight. If honorable senators take the average freight from New Zealand to Australia, and compare it with the land freight from the mallee country of Victoria to Melbourne, they will find that it does not cost any more to bring wheat from New Zealand and land it here than it costs to bring wheat from the mallee to Melbourne.

Senator PULSFORD.—From what part of New Zealand? Wheat does not grow on the wharf. There is a long inland carriage as well.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Senator Pulsford knows that there is no comparison between the long journeys that have to be made in bringing wheat from the inland parts of Australia to the seaboard, and the journeys from the most inland parts of New Zealand. Wheat is grown in portions of Riverina. Let it be remembered what a long journey that wheat has to be brought to the seaboard, or to the capital of a State, and it will be found that the freight from these different places will probably be something like the same as the freight for the carriage of wheat from New Zealand to Sydney, or to Melbourne. In view of these circumstances, I urge that we are bound to place the wheat-grower of Australia in a fair position, and that we cannot put him in a fair position under the general scheme of this Tariff, without giving him a protection which will be operative in preserving the market for him under all circumstances. We ought to put him in such a position that after paying freight, cultivating his land, and preparing his harvest, he will have the certainty that his profit cannot be taken away from him by sudden importations from other parts of the world where there happen to be a surplus in the wheat supply. Under these circumstances, I think the committee will see that this duty ought to be restored, and that the request should not be pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think it may be convenient if I recall to the memory of honorable senators what took place in regard to this item, as to which the request was made that wheat should be duty free. At first a request was moved that the whole item, grain and pulse, should be made free. There was a very long debate. So far as debate was concerned, this was indeed one of the most important items dealt with when the Tariff was originally before the Senate. A great number of honorable senators took part in it. After the debate had proceeded a considerable length, it was moved by a supporter of the Government—my honorable friend, Senator O'Keefe—that the item should be divided, barley, oats, maize, and so on being left in one category, and wheat taken out of the general list and placed upon the free list. A division took place, and his proposal was carried by a majority of six. There were sixteen votes for Senator O'Keefe's proposal and ten against it. We supported that proposal, and then the remaining articles in connexion with the item were allowed to go. We agreed to adopt that course, and from my point of view that was a compromise. That being the position, I think that an appeal for compromise does not have the slightest force in connexion with this item. The House of Representatives might very fairly have met us, seeing that we have left the duty on barley, oats, maize, beans, peas, and other commodities in the item. As they have not met us I am not disposed to go further in the way of concessions. There are good reasons why wheat is placed in a different category from other grain and pulse. Those reasons were given clearly in the debate that took place upon the amendment of Senator O'Keefe. It was pointed out that now that the barriers of Inter-State protection are levelled, wheat grown in any part of Australia can be sent from one State to another without being subject to any duty. The duty is a perfect absurdity. No wheat is imported into Australia. Senator Fraser gave some most valuable figures in the course of the previous debate, showing that in 1901-2—almost up to the very time at which the debate was proceeding, and during the period when the drought was beginning to be felt in its intensity—an immense export of wheat from Victoria had been taking place. The honorable senator gave the figures from May, 1901, up to May of this year, but I shall give only the first and the last sets. In May, 1901, Victoria exported 284,344 bags of wheat, in February of this yearshe exported 293,837 bags, in March she exported 152,994 bags, and in April last she exported 20,419 bags. That was at the very close of the season. What does it mean? It means that even in anticipation of distress, the price of wheat, looking at the whole of the market throughout Australia, was not so high as to pay the middleman to keep it here. It is really the middleman who is affected by the duty, because the farmer cannot get any benefit from it under any circumstances. It pays him better to export it to Europe than to keep it in Australia in anticipation of better prices. The total export of wheat from Victoria for the twelve months in question was 2,079,669 bags; yet we have it suggested by my honorable and learned friend that there is a possibility of wheat being imported from the Argentine, from New Zealand, California, and other places. Of course there is no such possibility.

Senator STYLES.—Then what is the honorable senator's objection to the duty?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is inoperative. I shall not call the duty a dodge, because I do not wish to refer to it in terms which would be offensive. But it is intended to delude the farmers into the belief that there is something in relation to wheat in the Tariff which will benefit them.

Senator STYLES.—They are not to be easily deluded.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think they are. But this duty is intended to delude them by leading them to believe that they are obtaining a splendid advantage under the Tariff, so far as their wheat is concerned, and that when they are asked to pay a duty of 30 per cent. on boots and shoes they cannot complain. Senator O'Connor admitted before, and does not question it now, that the effect of the duty will be to increase prices in times of scarcity. He could not do less than make that admission. The result of the duty must be that when the price of wheat reaches a level at which it would pay to import it, 10d. a bushel will be clapped on. That increase will be made in the price of wheat from which flour is manufactured, and from which, in turn, bread is made for the people of the country. Is that just? Why should we impose a duty which is only to become operative in times of scarcity and famine? It is childish. It is unworthy of the Parliament of this country to do such a thing.

but rather to its benefit. There is a consensus of opinion that the quality of the local fruits is equal to, if not better, than that of any imported fruits. Under these circumstances, why should we insist upon a reduction of the duty? Surely there must be some reason for the insistence. Is it done because it is desired to benefit the consumer? He is already benefited, and will be more benefited the more prosperous the industry is made. The more prosperous it is made the larger will be the production, and the price, if it is affected at all, must go down in the local market. On the other hand, if the industry is stifled or hampered, we are placed more or less in the hands of the foreign producer. From the point of view of the consumer, all the reasons are in favour of the preservation of the duty of 3d. per lb. Can it be said that the duty shuts out the foreign article? It certainly is not prohibitive, because there are classes of raisins and other dried fruits which will come in whatever the duty may be. The persons who will benefit by a reduction of the duty are not the general body of the consumers, if any one is benefited, but those who buy the better class of articles and who will be able to get them more cheaply. In order to give some idea of how the duty of 3d. per lb. has operated, I may mention that when the Tariff was brought down, the revenue under this head was estimated at £25,313 per annum. The collections for six months have been very nearly equal to that amount, showing that, so far from the duty having been prohibitive or shutting out goods, it has led to a very much larger importation than was ever anticipated. We want every farthing of revenue we can get. I appeal to honorable senators representing Queensland, where £1,947 has been collected; South Australia, where £1,076 has been collected; and Tasmania, where £1,188 has been collected, whether we can afford to give up that revenue? On what principle can we be asked to give it up? It cannot be for the benefit of the consumer, or for the benefit of the revenue. Surely we are not going to disagree with the other House over a matter of this sort merely for the purpose of upholding a free-trade principle. At this stage we have not to consider the cries and shibboleths of a particular party, but we have in the interests of Australia to come to finality.

Senator O'Connor

This question should be looked at from that point of view, and unless the committee sees some very strong reason indeed—some reason founded on an actual benefit to some class in the community, or some benefit to the Commonwealth—it should not insist upon its request for the mere purpose of upholding some principle. There must be some giving way on one side or the other. On the one hand it is necessary for the purpose of protecting these industries that this duty should be maintained, because otherwise the fruit-growers will always be subject to uncertain, and it may be very large, importations coming in at different times, which must really deprive them of their markets, and cut down the price to such an extent that it would not pay them to go on growing the fruits. If they can be protected from that result by a standing duty like this without any detriment to the consumer, and with benefit to the revenue, why should it not be imposed? The protectionist has some real reason for giving this benefit—it can be given without any detriment to the consumer, and with benefit to the revenue. Under these circumstances, considering that we must come to an agreement, this is certainly one of the occasions on which the committee ought to give way.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I trust that the committee will adhere to the request for some of the reasons which Senator O'Connor has stated. In the first place, he said that we should not adhere to the request merely for the purpose of upholding a free-trade principle. If on no other ground than that it was a beneficial assertion of a free-trade principle for the benefit of the people of this country I should urge the committee to adhere to the request.

Senator O'KEEFE.—What becomes of your principle of conciliation?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Such an argument as that might very well be addressed to those who opposed the reduction of the duty before. It was shown that a duty of 3d. per lb. was equivalent to a protection of from 75 to 100 per cent., and because the committee felt that from 60 to 70 per cent. was absolute protection, it arrived at what I call a very generous compromise when it requested that the duty should be reduced to 2d. I do not propose to re-discuss all the matters which were fully gone into on a former occasion.

From the point of view of either protection or revenue, a duty of 2d. per lb. is ample. Senator O'Connor has mentioned the amount of the collections for a period of six months. So far as the printed records show, there is no discrimination in the line fruits and vegetables, which in the Tariff are subdivided into a large number of articles. I do not know exactly whether the revenue of £20,000 was derived from the duty on raisins, or from the duties on the articles included under the head of fruits and vegetables, in item 21.

Senator O'CONNOR.—From dried fruits and vegetables.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I thought so. The request of the Senate is limited to one article—raisins. Item 21 is a very long and comprehensive one. I do not intend to differ with Senator O'Connor when we come directly to deal with certain articles. The item to which I refer is a much more lucrative source of revenue than is this item, because the great bulk of the commoner sorts of raisins which are consumed are those which are produced at Renmark and Mildura. It is not the duty which has benefited these people, but they have been selling their raisins in London, where they have found a good market for them. Therefore, we are putting on a duty which increases the price of the commodity consumed here. No one can say that raisins are not a necessity. We are trying to raise the standard of living among our households, and must recognise that raisins, in common with many other commodities which are consumed, must be included in the category of necessities. The duty of 2d. was the Tasmanian rate. It was imposed in that State as a revenue duty. Surely 60 or 70 per cent. protection ought to be enough from the grower's point of view. It has been contended that the duty is not prohibitive because revenue is derived from it. If it is not prohibitive, where is the protection? From my point of view it is not prohibitive, because there is a large importation, and it is for that reason that a large revenue is derived from it.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia). —Senator Symon has said that this duty amounts to about from 75 to 100 per cent. in some cases, and that he wants to lower it. Let me ask him how it is that he and his party do not follow out that principle in other cases? There was a duty of 80 per cent. on an article of such general consumption as salt, but his party quietly allowed that to pass without objection. Salt, however, is far more largely consumed than raisins and currants. It goes into every household in every part of Australia, and is also largely used for purposes of manufacture, and in the preserving of food for the people. Yet no objection was taken to it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Because that was a compromise made in the House of Representatives by express agreement. I said so here.

Senator PLAYFORD. — There was a compromise in regard to cement, but the honorable and learned senator did not mind interfering in that case. If the party opposite lay down general principles they ought to be prepared to apply them all round. I do not know why the people who cultivate the soil should be sought to be specially injured in this manner, or why they should not have such benefits as are conferred upon others who manufacture certain goods. In this case, Senator Symon is endeavouring to interfere with the horticultural industry, which he should do all he can to promote. The more that can be done to put people on the soil, and employ them in outdoor occupations, the better it will be for the community at large. We should endeavour to promote cultivation rather than encourage people to crowd into the towns to find work in factories. The duty proposed is necessary for that purpose. Raisins can hardly be looked upon as articles of absolute necessity, although they are articles of general consumption. They are certainly not as necessary as salt. I trust that we shall give way in regard to the matter.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—It is all very well for Senator Playford to tell us that by imposing protective duties we shall encourage people to settle in the country. If he stuck to that principle we could understand his attitude.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have to consider other people as well.

Senator CLEMONS. — The honorable senator who now talks about encouraging people to settle in the country is just as vehement in his support of the imposition of duties of 30 per cent. on hats, boots, and other items, the tendency of which is to induce people to settle in the cities. That sort of clap-trap argument convinces no one, and is unworthy of the honorable senator who has used it. I admit that it is difficult to deal fairly with this item, for the reason that, unfortunately, it is both absurdly protective in one aspect, and possibly scarcely sufficient from a revenue point of view, in another. From the point of view of the producers of currants and raisins in Mildura and elsewhere, the duty is hugely protective. The cost of production is about 4d. or 5d. per lb. But in regard to fancy muscatels, which cost 1s. and 1s. 3d. per lb., the duty proposed is not excessive. I should like to tax luxuries, but the difficulty is that in order to do so in this case we have to impose a ridiculously high protective duty on the major part of the articles affected. With regard to the effect of the duty on the consumers, I would point out that in Tasmania the duty on raisins was 2d. per lb. But then we got 2d. on every lb. of raisins imported into the State, no matter whence they came. Under this high protective duty, however, we should lose every farthing of revenue, because we should shut out foreign imports in favour of raisins grown at Mildura or elsewhere within the Commonwealth.

Senator O'CONNOR.—How can the honorable and learned senator say that imports are shut out, seeing that for six months the duty in Tasmania was £1,188?

Senator CLEMONS.—But those six month's collections are, to a certain extent, fallacious.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Those figures are not for the first six months, but for the period from January to June this year, when things had settled down.

Senator CLEMONS.—I regard all the figures up to date as being to a certain extent misleading owing to the loading up which has taken place. This particular duty must kill the Tasmanian revenue. I am not considering the matter from the point of view of revenue exclusively, but I am stating the facts, and it is a fact that where you put a protective duty on commodities manufactured or grown in the Commonwealth, you must necessarily take from the revenue of the smaller States. That is a sufficient answer to the arguments of the Vice-President of the Executive Council.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I think that Senator Playford struck home in his last speech, judging from the heat imported into the remarks of Senator Clemons, who, like most free-traders, has shown himself to be delightfully inconsistent. Just now he was telling us that the Victorian duty on butter, 2d. per lb., ought to be adopted. The Victorian duty on raisins was 3d. per lb. Why go back on that? Senator Clemons has charged Senator Playford with being inconsistent because he wants to impose a duty on raisins and other forms of produce in order to keep people on the soil of the country.

Senator CLEMONS.—And he wants to impose a duty on other articles for the purpose of bringing them into the towns.

Senator STYLES.—It is impossible to send people who are growing raisins to make boots in a city factory, because they could not do it, nor could you send a bootmaker to grow raisins at Mildura. The two occupations require different classes of men. A protectionist like Senator Playford wants to find labour for all the people. All the people cannot be employed upon the land, because they could not exist there; not because there is not plenty of land to go to, but because there are classes of people who could not earn a living in agricultural occupations. You could not take a man who had been brought up in a jeweller's shop, and put him on the land, any more than you could take a man from a farm, and expect him to earn a livelihood in a silk warehouse.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—Senator Clemons evidently approaches the discussion of this subject from the point of view of a Tasmanian property owner. He is desirous, above all things, of saving that individual from further taxation. Tasmania does not grow raisins. Therefore, she must import them; and Senator Clemons, being a patriotic Australian, would rather import his raisins from Spain, Portugal, Italy, or Greece than have them grown in Australia. That is the honorable senator's position. He prefers to import them from foreign countries because Tasmania can obtain a certain amount of revenue from them when they are introduced in that way. When they come from continental Australia, poor Tasmania cannot tax them. He is very sorry that Tasmania will lose revenue under this item. I would suggest to the people of Tasmania that the landlords of that State should be taxed. That would be a very good alternative to taxing raisins which are used in the puddings of the poor. Senator Clemons can himself be a protectionist occasionally. We know perfectly well that every honorable senator from Tasmania wishes to have the free run of the Australian market for anything that Tasmania produces. We know that each one of those honorable senators would oppose to the very utmost any attempt to place any outside communities on a level with Tasmania.

Senator CLEMONS.—I should not. I do not want protection for a single thing made or grown in Tasmania.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator voted for a duty on hops.

Senator CLEMONS.—I cannot have my own way in all things.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable and learned senator appears to me to be acting in his usual rôle of "fat man" advocate. He desires above all things to save the capitalist, the land-owner, and the moneyed man from taxation. He says, in effect: "Levy your taxations upon the poor; do not tax the big estates in Tasmania. Do not tax invested wealth. Tax the pudding which the poor man puts upon his table. Save the rich man at all hazards! Do not encourage any industry on continental Australia. Do not encourage people to settle upon the soil."

Senator CLEMONS.—We propose a duty of 2d. per lb. in this case.

Senator STEWART.—We want something more than a duty of 2d. per lb.—something which will be a real encouragement to settlers on the soil. The honorable and learned senator twitted protectionists with having a policy which would drive all the people into the towns. I should like to know where the people would be driven to under a revenue tariffist policy? The revenue tariffist does not attack the land-owner. He does not establish industries either in the town or country. He favours land monopoly, and monopoly of every kind, so that if his policy were carried out we should find ourselves in this beautiful position: that our lands, and other natural resources, would be in the hands of monopolists, while our workers were exposed to the competition of the cheap labour countries of the world. The immediate and only result which could flow from such a policy would be that our work people would be reduced to a level with those of the low-paid countries of the world. I have another ambition for Australia. I do not wish to see those conditions established here.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator is afraid of America, where the rates of wages are the highest in the world.

Senator STEWART.—I am afraid of nothing! If Australia is protected at once against the foreign manufacturer, and against the local land-grabber and usurer, she need fear nothing. If we have a policy of scientific protection we need not be afraid of any country or of any people, but if we proceed on free-trade principles—if we hug to our bosoms these magnificent delusions—where shall we find ourselves? We shall find ourselves without people, without industries—mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to more ambitious and more progressive communities. I can assure my honorable friends that from me, at any rate, they will get no assistance to bring about such a state of affairs. I want to have as many industries in Australia as possible. I want to have the soil of Australia as free as possible to the people. I want to have all our resources thrown open as freely as possible to the people. That will not happen under this free-trade policy. But I shall not call it "free-trade," because it is not. If it were, I could understand it. It is the thing called "revenue tariffism," which is neither free-trade nor protection, which does not establish a single industry, and which takes all its taxation and the cost of government out of the pockets of the very poorest. No policy which I can think of presses with such severity upon the work people as the policy of revenue tariffism. It exposes them to the fiercest of competition.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—I think the honorable senator is going beyond illustration.

Senator STEWART.—Perhaps I did not mention raisins with sufficient frequency. In any case, I am going to stand out for the higher duty.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I think we shall do well to notice how very high these rates of duty are. I see that in Canada a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. is levied on raisins.

Senator STYLES.—They do not grow them there. That is the reason for it.

Senator PULSFORD.—I am not discussing what they are growing; I am discussing their Tariff. The duty on currants in Canada is 1d. per lb., while in New Zealand the duty is 2d. per lb. on both currants and raisins. In every one of the six States the duty on raisins and currants has always been the same, with the exception of South Australia, and now that the duty on currants has been reduced to 2d., it is reasonable that the duty on raisins should also be reduced to the same level. An impost of 2d. per lb. amounts to more than £18 per ton, while a duty of 3d. per lb. represents £28 per ton. That is an intolerable rate of taxation upon an article like raisins, which is required in all households. In the United Kingdom currants are subject to a duty of something like ½d. per lb. The idea of a duty of £28 per ton on raisins would drive statesmen in any ordinary country into a lunatic asylum.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Threepence per lb. has been the rate of duty in four out of the six States.

Senator PULSFORD.—I know that in all the States the duty has been excessive. One of the failures of Australian statesmanship has been the levying of undue taxation on dried fruits. As the Commonwealth proposes to impose a duty of 2d. per lb. on currants, the present is a favorable time to reduce the duty on raisins to the same extent. I trust that the committee will adhere to its request.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—In the course of his remarks, Senator Clemons said that he would not mind taxing luxuries. He admitted that muscatels come within that category, but he said that he desired to lower the duty on the other articles which are comprised in this line. These raisins were specially signalled out by Senator Symon in his attempt to get the duties lowered. Currants take the place of plums in so-called plum puddings, which are largely used in the households of the poor, and they pay a duty of 2d. per lb.

Senator DRAKE.—Dates are also used in that way.

Senator HIGGS.—So also are Mildura figs. But the raisins which Senator Symon and Senator Clemons have in view are the muscatels which are never used in the tents of the pioneer prospector. Just imagine a poor prospector asking for a pound of the muscatels which are bound up nicely with red and blue silk ribbon. After they have had their ten or twelve course banquet, these honorable senators want muscatels to complete their repast. If honorable senators pick up one of those delicately tinted menu cards, which are to be seen at all high-class banquets, they will find that a variety of commodities mentioned in them are comprised in this particular division which has been attacked with such force by Senator Symon and Senator Clemons.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why does not the honorable senator vote for an ad valorem duty on these things? As it is, he is proposing to tax the poor man's raisins just as much as muscatels.

Senator HIGGS.—The poor man uses raisins which are grown at Mildura, and of which several varieties were recently produced here by Senator Glassey. If we adhere to the duty as proposed by the House of Representatives, we shall lighten the burden of taxation upon the poor householder who has to use local raisins. Muscatels are required for after dinner purposes, but, unlike the raisins used in the households of the poor, they do not constitute the chief item in the course. Honorable senators are willing to tie up the Commonwealth and clog the wheels of the industrial machine, as they will do, on a question of after-dinner muscatels. They propose to have a fight over this question, and we know they will fight to the last when they begin speaking of the miseries of the poor. I desire to back up Senator Playford in one respect. If that honorable senator took the trouble, he could have administered a very sharp rebuke to Senator Clemons. I suppose that he takes a comprehensive view of the interests of Australia as a whole. He desires to see a complex civilization here, and he knows that we cannot have men settled upon the land without a large settled population in the towns to consume the products of their farms.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I made a few quiet remarks in perfect good faith, pointing out how careless our free-trade friends had been in looking through the Tariff, and in not settling upon certain items for alterations, according to the principles of their leader, and I have been astonished to find that in doing so, I hurt the feelings of my honorable and learned friend, Senator Clemons. I am quite sure the honorable and learned senator, in that blessed caucus, must have contended for a reconsideration of the item, salt. The honorable and learned senator was very cross, but I think he was not so cross with me as with honorable senators constituting the party of which he is a member. He appeared to think that I should not be allowed to score in this matter, and that he must back up his leader, and he backed up his leader by abusing me. However, he did not say a word about salt, and did not show that I was wrong in my statements, but, as lawyers frequently do, the honorable and learned senator drew a red herring across the track, and started off in another direction. I referred to the advantage of getting people to go upon the land in preference to a policy of confining them all to the cities and towns, and because I said that, Senator Clemons informed me that I was utterly mistaken, and that I was not carrying out my principles. As a protectionist, I think it desirable to give protection all round. I desire to assist every industry, and I care not whether it is a town or a country industry. Senator Clemons alluded to hats and boots, and, by way of illustration, I may be allowed to answer his remarks. I believe in a self-contained community, and I think the people ought to make their own hats and boots. If they do not do it, I am in favour of trying to make them do it by a little dose of protection, which will be advantageous to the community as a whole.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This "self-contained people" is a magnificent sentiment, but honorable senators propose to have a wall 1,000 feet high put up around Australia. They will not admit any body here, and if we can not make things for ourselves we must do without them.

Senator PEARCE.—How are we to get our wheat and wool over the wall?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is nothing. We can use the surplus wheat and wool as a manure for the lands occupied by the agriculturist who is to be protected by a duty of 2d. per lb. on raisins. I will not go into the subject at large, and I rose for a much more congenial purpose. We have been appealed to over and over again—and it is really the only argument I have heard that has any bearing upon the question—to make some concessions to the other House. I have acted throughout upon the principle of making a great many concessions. I consider that when the Tariff was previously before the committee of the Senate all the divisions in which the voting was equal were concessions to the other Chamber.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Why? They were decided under the Constitution, and honorable senators opposite get the benefit of the principle now.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; but the honorable and learned senator will not allow us to get the benefit of it, as he is continually denouncing us if we propose to adhere to our requests. On this occasion I am prepared to yield to the appeals which have been made; and simply as a concession to the views of the other Chamber, I shall not press my objection to the motion. I think the proposed duty is protective in every sense. Sixty or 70 per cent. of protection should be ample, even from the point of view of Senator Playford, and from the point of view of revenue, also, it is ample. Without repeating them, I desire to reiterate all the reasons previously urged against the Government proposal, but I recognise that in some of these cases we should not press our objection unduly. Upon that ground, as we have been appealed to by several honorable senators, I yield, and I shall not press the matter to a division.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Senator Symon possesses the wisdom of the serpent and the gentleness of the dove. Honorable senators in opposition have counted heads. They know they are beaten, and they now are going to make a virtue of necessity and withdraw with a splendid grace. The honorable and learned senator says that this duty is unduly protective, and we know that if he could secure a majority just now he would not be prepared to withdraw.

Motion agreed to.

Item 21.—Fruits and vegetables, viz., . . .
Vegetables, dried or concentrated, ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Senate's Request.—Add to special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

Honorable senators will recollect that, in this case, the duty originally proposed in the Tariff was 20 per cent., and, as the Tariff came to the Senate, the duty proposed was 15 per cent. The Senate requested that the item should be added to the list of special exemptions. I hope that honorable senators will agree that the Senate ought not to insist upon the request made. The industry is one which really deserves encouragement, as it offers a good outlet for vegetables produced in the country, while the operation of the duty will not increase the cost to the consumer. I think this is one of the cases in which the Senate might very well give way.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—When this item was debated upon a previous occasion I was under the impression, and I said so at the time, that no attempt had been made to open up an industry of this description so far as I was aware. I think it is only fair to say that a gentleman in South Australia has communicated with me, and I find that there has been a beginning made. I hope the industry will be a satisfactory one some day. I do not propose that we should press our request in this instance, not only upon that ground, but also upon the ground that this is a concession which we might fairly make to the other Chamber.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am very glad, indeed, that that gentleman in South Australia communicated with Senator Symon. If the producers and manufacturers throughout the Commonwealth will only take the hint, we shall probably get along a great deal better. This great free-trader of ours has admitted that when this item was previously before the committee he opposed the duty, because he did not know that there was an industry of this description established within the Commonwealth. Having discovered now that there is a rising industry—a South Australian industry—which he hopes will grow to some dimensions, he is prepared to withdraw his opposition to what he considers a protective duty. In a great many instances it has been shown that where the States represented by free-traders are specially concerned, they are prepared to vote for protection or anything else in the interests of their constituents. We have had the Tasmanian hop man, the wine producer, the salt man, and now we have the supporter of the dried-vegetable industry. They are now letting us see their true character. If we could only arrange to have the various industries which are to be protected established in South Australia and Tasmania, there would be no trouble here.

Motion agreed to.

Item 21.—Fruits and vegetables, n.e.i. (preserved in liquid, or partly preserved, or pulped)—

Half-pints and smaller sizes, 9d. per dozen.

Pints and over half-pints, 1s. 6d. per dozen.

Quarts and over pints, 3s. per dozen.

Exceeding a quart, 1s. per gallon.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be 15 per cent. ad valorem.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales).—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

There seems to be an inconsistency between this item and item 44, under which pickles are charged specific duties, according to the size of the bottles in which they are packed. There is no reason why there should be such an inconsistency. A stronger reason for not pressing our request is that the adoption of a 15 per cent. ad valorem duty would mean far too large a reduction of the protection which was originally intended. There is one point which I do not think was emphasized quite enough on a previous occasion, and that is that a large quantity of sugar is employed in the manufacture of these different kinds of preserves. There is a very great difference between the price of sugar in America or England and the price of sugar in Australia. Supposing that the local price is taken at £18 per ton: in Europe it is not more than £7 per ton—a difference of nearly 1½d. per lb. in the cost of the sugar used. I have a calculation which shows that out of the 15 per cent. duty which the committee desired to be charged, 10 per cent. would be absorbed in getting over this difference of price in the sugar used, so that the net amount of protection would not be more than 5 per cent. When we consider the large quantity of our produce which is being used in this way, and the number of persons who are interested in the natural productions of the soil, and in the preservation of a certain amount of protection here, I think it will be recognised by even free-traders that unless there is some very good reason given this request ought not to be pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that this is a fair subject on which a concession may be made to the other House. Besides the broader ground which might be stated, I think that all the points which Senator O'Connor has mentioned should influence us in that direction. Under item 44, pickles in bottles are left subject to fixed duties. My own feeling is that if at the time it had been known that a corresponding item was being subjected to an ad valorem duty, it might have influenced the votes of some honorable senators. There is a very considerable amount of revenue produced from this item, and that fact was recognised in the previous discussion. I do not assent to make this concession on the ground put by my honorable and learned friend—that is, to make the duty largely protective, because, irrespective of protection, there are a great many elements which will have to be introduced before our fruits will compete with those imported from Canada and other places. Those fruits are packed under a system that secures a quality which, I believe, is practically the despair of our producers. I hope that the difficulty will be overcome, and at the present time I am quite willing that this duty should stand.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I do not see my way clear to deliver an attack similar to that which I endeavoured to deliver on a previous item. There is something tangible about the concession which is given here. I congratulate Senator Symon on his action, because I believe that it augurs well for an early settlement of our troubles. Certainly, if he pursues this course, I shall not be found taking up very much time.

Motion agreed to.

Item 22. Grain and pulse, n.e.i., per cental, 1s. 6d.

Senate's Request.—That wheat be added to the special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

It is an extraordinary anomaly to put wheat in a different position from maize, barley, oats, and other grains. Why should the grower of wheat be put in a different position from the grower of oats or barley? It certainly cannot be that the geographical conditions make any difference, because wheat is grown everywhere in the Commonwealth, except in Tasmania, where a large quantity is not produced. In the tropical parts of Australia, none is grown. In some parts of Queensland it can be grown very well. In parts of Western Australia it can be grown. In at least some part of each State it is grown, and grown in a very profitable way. The wheat-growing industry affects the farmers in every part of Australia. Is there any justification for putting the wheat-grower in a different position from the man who grows maize, barley, oats, or any of the other products which are included under the head of grain and pulse? There is none. The proposed exception will merely have the effect of unfairly prejudicing growers of wheat, and at the same time very largely affecting the revenue which is derived from flour. We have to take the articles, wheat and flour, together. If the Tariff remained as it was, there would be a difference of 1s. per cental between the duty on flour and the duty on wheat. The Customs officials report that if we allow wheat to come in free, a large quantity of flour which now comes in will be imported in its original form, and the only persons who will be benefited will be the millers, whereas the farmers, from whom the wheat would otherwise be bought, would be very largely affected. There is no doubt that in plentiful years Australia is an exporter of wheat. She does not grow very much more than is necessary to meet local requirements, but still, under certain circumstances, she has been an importer. With the enormous extent of wheat-growing land in the Commonwealth, there is no reason why in time to come—and in a very few years, indeed—Australia should not only grow enough wheat for local requirements in all circumstances, but should have a very large surplus to export in almost any season. If we had arrived at that stage it might be that the duty would not be operative, but the necessity for its imposition is to provide against the time when imports take place. The whole thing is regulated by the local production. When it fills the home market and there is enough to export, it does not pay to import except under very special circumstances. But when the local demand is not met, then we have very large importations from California and other places which seriously affect the market. Is there any reason why the farmer who grows wheat should not have the benefit of the steadying of his market which we have given to the grower of oats, maize, and the other products I have mentioned? There is no reason in the world why that should not be so. If it could be shown that the consumer would be affected, and that the price of wheat and bread would be increased by a duty of this kind, there might be something to be said. But that has not been proved. There is really no reason why the same amount of protection should not be given to the grower of wheat as to the grower of other grains. And after all, when we have given the benefits of protection to a large number of trades and industries which exist in the cities, we ought to be very careful not to take away the protection which is afforded in steadying and securing the market under all circumstances in regard to wheat. It is only fair that we should treat the man who has to till the soil with a certain amount of consideration when the benefits of protection are being distributed. If we leave him out of consideration altogether, we disturb the fairness and the balance of the Tariff. Whatever may have been the free-trade propensities of some honorable senators, the net result is that the Tariff is protective. It has given protection to a great number of industries and occupations. Care should be taken that that protection is given fairly to all classes of the community, and the farmers who have embarked in the business of growing wheat should have the same amount of regard shown for their interests as has been shown for the interests of those growing other kinds of grain. I ask the committee to remember also that the competition in regard to wheat must be regarded very seriously. A large amount of wheat is imported from New Zealand. If wheat is made free of duty, New Zealand will probably be a much larger competitor. Two things have to be remembered. In the first place, the wheat yield in New Zealand generally is exceedingly large as compared with the wheat yield of Australia. For ten years ending 1899 the wheat yield, per acre, in New Zealand, was 24·61 bushels—an enormous yield. The average yield in Australia for that period was only 7·31 bushels. That is to say, the wheat yield in New Zealand is about three times what it is in Australia. In other words, with practically the same amount of labour—there may be a little extra labour in gathering—three times as much wheat per acre is grown in New Zealand as is grown in Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—But what about the value?

Senator O'CONNOR.—There is a great difference in the value of the wheat grown in different parts of Australia. The best flour is made from mixtures of wheat, and there has always been a good market here for New Zealand wheat. It therefore has to be remembered how easy it is for the wheat market of Australia to be flooded at any time when there is a heavy harvest in different parts of the world. I mention New Zealand as an illustration, but wheat also comes from California and Argentine. Ought we to put the men who in different parts of Australia have to struggle with drought and difficulty during the greater part of the year in the position of having to compete with wheat-growers in those other places when the time comes that there is a good price to be obtained for wheat? There is another, and very important consideration. That is the comparison between land freight and water freight. If honorable senators take the average freight from New Zealand to Australia, and compare it with the land freight from the mallee country of Victoria to Melbourne, they will find that it does not cost any more to bring wheat from New Zealand and land it here than it costs to bring wheat from the mallee to Melbourne.

Senator PULSFORD.—From what part of New Zealand? Wheat does not grow on the wharf. There is a long inland carriage as well.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Senator Pulsford knows that there is no comparison between the long journeys that have to be made in bringing wheat from the inland parts of Australia to the seaboard, and the journeys from the most inland parts of New Zealand. Wheat is grown in portions of Riverina. Let it be remembered what a long journey that wheat has to be brought to the seaboard, or to the capital of a State, and it will be found that the freight from these different places will probably be something like the same as the freight for the carriage of wheat from New Zealand to Sydney, or to Melbourne. In view of these circumstances, I urge that we are bound to place the wheat-grower of Australia in a fair position, and that we cannot put him in a fair position under the general scheme of this Tariff, without giving him a protection which will be operative in preserving the market for him under all circumstances. We ought to put him in such a position that after paying freight, cultivating his land, and preparing his harvest, he will have the certainty that his profit cannot be taken away from him by sudden importations from other parts of the world where there happen to be a surplus in the wheat supply. Under these circumstances, I think the committee will see that this duty ought to be restored, and that the request should not be pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think it may be convenient if I recall to the memory of honorable senators what took place in regard to this item, as to which the request was made that wheat should be duty free. At first a request was moved that the whole item, grain and pulse, should be made free. There was a very long debate. So far as debate was concerned, this was indeed one of the most important items dealt with when the Tariff was originally before the Senate. A great number of honorable senators took part in it. After the debate had proceeded a considerable length, it was moved by a supporter of the Government—my honorable friend, Senator O’Keefe—that the item should be divided, barley, oats, maize, and so on being left in one category, and wheat taken out of the general list and placed upon the free list. A division took place, and his proposal was carried by a majority of six. There were sixteen votes for Senator O’Keefe’s proposal and ten against it. We supported that proposal, and then the remaining articles in connexion with the item were allowed to go. We agreed to adopt that course, and from my point of view that was a compromise. That being the position, I think that an appeal for compromise does not have the slightest force in connexion with this item. The House of Representatives might very fairly have met us, seeing that we have left the duty on barley, oats, maize, beans, peas, and other commodities in the item. As they have not met us I am not disposed to go further in the way of concessions. There are good reasons why wheat is placed in a different category from other grain and pulse. Those reasons were given clearly in the debate that took place upon the amendment of Senator O’Keefe. It was pointed out that now that the barriers of Inter-State protection are levelled, wheat grown in any part of Australia can be sent from one State to another without being subject to any duty. The duty is a perfect absurdity. No wheat is imported into Australia. Senator Fraser gave some most valuable figures in the course of the previous debate, showing that in 1901-2—almost up to the very time at which the debate was proceeding, and during the period when the drought was beginning to be felt in its intensity—an immense export of wheat from Victoria had been taking place. The honorable senator gave the figures from May, 1901, up to May of this year, but I shall give only the first and the last sets. In May, 1901, Victoria exported 284,344 bags of wheat, in February of this yearshe exported 293,837 bags, in March she exported 152,994 bags, and in April last she exported 20,419 bags. That was at the very close of the season. What does it mean? It means that even in anticipation of distress, the price of wheat, looking at the whole of the market throughout Australia, was not so high as to pay the middleman to keep it here. It is really the middleman who is affected by the duty, because the farmer cannot get any benefit from it under any circumstances. It pays him better to export it to Europe than to keep it in Australia in anticipation of better prices. The total export of wheat from Victoria for the twelve months in question was 2,079,669 bags; yet we have it suggested by my honorable and learned friend that there is a possibility of wheat being imported from the Argentine, from New Zealand, California, and other places. Of course there is no such possibility.

Senator STYLES.—Then what is the honorable senator’s objection to the duty?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is inoperative. I shall not call the duty a dodge, because I do not wish to refer to it in terms which would be offensive. But it is intended to delude the farmers into the belief that there is something in relation to wheat in the Tariff which will benefit them.

Senator STYLES.—They are not to be easily deluded.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think they are. But this duty is intended to delude them by leading them to believe that they are obtaining a splendid advantage under the Tariff, so far as their wheat is concerned, and that when they are asked to pay a duty of 30 per cent. on boots and shoes they cannot complain. Senator O’Connor admitted before, and does not question it now, that the effect of the duty will be to increase prices in times of scarcity. He could not do less than make that admission. The result of the duty must be that when the price of wheat reaches a level at which it would pay to import it, 10d. a bushel will be clapped on. That increase will be made in the price of wheat from which flour is manufactured, and from which, in turn, bread is made for the people of the country. Is that just? Why should we impose a duty which is only to become operative in times of scarcity and famine? It is childish. It is unworthy of the Parliament of this country to do such a thing.

I am as ready as is any one to put these things upon a proper footing. The reasons given for eliminating barley and maize from this request was that Australia does not produce, even in normal times, sufficient of those cereals for her own consumption, and that she might be flooded with importations from New Zealand, which is far more of a barley and oat-producing country than a wheat-producing country. It was also said that oats and barley which come from New Zealand compete with our own producers. That was the argument used. I do not assent to it, but it prevailed with some honorable senators, and induced them to make this discrimination. It is a plausible argument, even if it is not a convincing one. My honorable and learned friend says that this duty is for the benefit of the farmer. I say again that, generally, the farmer will not get a cent. of benefit from the duty.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It will never benefit the farmers, but it may sometimes benefit the merchants.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Or the mill-owners.

Senator STYLES.—It certainly benefits the farmers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure my honorable friend entertains that opinion, and I do not question the sincerity of it. But I know that in Adelaide, which has been called the "farinaceous village," and in South Australia generally—which is a great wheat producing country—almost the whole of the wheat passes immediately after the harvest into the hands of the miller, the wheat buyer or the exporting merchant at the best prices that can then be obtained. Occasionally there are men who are strong enough to be able to hold their wheat—who do not require their debit balances wiped off at the close of the season. That, however, is only the condition of an absolute minority. Speaking for the State which has sent me here, and for the farmers who voted for all the honorable senators who come from South Australia, I assert that the great majority of them will not reap one farthing of benefit from this duty in times of scarcity. In the majority of cases the speculator, and sometimes the mill-owner will derive the benefit; and, therefore, from that point of view, it should not be consented to even for a moment. If the duty will be operative only in times of distress, it must increase the price of food to the people. Most people have admitted, whether they are protectionists or not, that when the corn laws of England were abolished they were justly swept away. Are we to shut our eyes to the fact that the very same results which followed the imposition of those duties will happen from the imposition of such a duty as this? We are asked to impose a duty which can be operative only in times of distress, and we are to exact it from people who are suffering from distress.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It might encourage grain trusts.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes. We cannot blame these men for combining to obtain a monopoly of the wheat, to hold it against a rise in prices, and then to dole it out to the millers—if they have not already secured supplies—for the purpose of grinding it into flour to be sold at an enhanced price to the people. It is human nature. But the more this item is investigated the more indefensible it seems to be. I trust that the committee will adhere to their request, which is in the interests of the people.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I was hopeful that Senator Symon would have continued upon a reasonable course, and that he would not have pressed this request. Certainly it does appear to most people to be very strange that wheat should be singled out in this way. The fact that it had been singled out, was, in my opinion, one of the reasons why the House of Representatives did not propose a modification in their anxiety to arrive at a settlement. We can produce a great deal of wheat, and honorable senators who urge that the request should be adhered to admit that the duty will be inoperative. Do they know that we have some millions of acres in the central parts of Queensland which are looked upon as likely to become the granary of the Commonwealth, provided that we have a uniform Tariff to protect our farmers and do not allow wheat to come in free of duty. In spite of the duty which prevailed prior to federation a great quantity of wheat was imported into Queensland. Perhaps we shall be told that that was due to the fact that flour made wholly from Queensland wheat does not produce a good quality of bread, and that it has to be mixed with South Australian flour. I am aware that it is mixed to some extent in that way, but the Agricultural department in Queensland is successfully cultivating varieties of wheat which will produce a flour equal to the South Australian article. I have it on the authority of Mr. McLean, who is an agricultural expert, occupying the position of under secretary in the Queensland department of Agriculture, that it will not be very long before large areas of land behind Rockhampton and in the Long Reach district will be used for the cultivation of wheat. He declares that the conditions there are as good as those prevailing in America, which is a great wheat-producing country. I hope that honorable senators of the Opposition, especially as they think that the duty will be inoperative, will allow it to remain.

Senator CLEMONS.—In its fairly inoperative now.

Senator HIGGS.—There happens to be a drought at the present time, but whether there is a drought or not the general body of the working classes appear to be called upon to suffer. The constituents of some honorable senators are exporting large quantities of wheat, which is being sold at lower prices——

Senator FRASER.—They are not doing anything of the kind now. The honorable senator should consult the position of the State which he is supposed to represent.

Senator HIGGS.—Do not say "supposed." I represent Queensland, and I believe I represent her well. That State will undoubtedly be a great producer of wheat in time to come if we give her wheat-growers some little protection. But if we make wheat free, what hope will there be for them? What hope is there when the proposal to impose a duty is opposed by men like Senator Fraser, who owns considerable station properties in Queensland, and who probably before very long will be following the example of squatters in other parts of the Commonwealth, and leasing half of his land to wheat farmers on the Metayer system, under which the farmer will give him a bag of wheat as rent for every two bags he produces. The honorable senator doubtless knows that squatters in other parts of the Commonwealth are allowing their lands to be used on that system. The squatter lets his land to the farmer who does the work, and the squatter gets, as rent, a half-share of the produce of the land. I appeal to Senator Fraser, on these grounds, to vote for a duty upon wheat. Of course, there are many farmers in Queensland who are cultivating their own land. Though they are not farming in a large way, many of them derive a considerable income from the cultivation of wheat, and if we are to force them to throw their land out of cultivation, or to grow some other crop, we shall be adopting a very unwise policy. I hope that the committee will agree not to press the request.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I have listened to what I consider extraordinary statements, and I must confess that I have been greatly disappointed with the remarks made by the Vice-President of the Executive Council in speaking upon this proposed duty upon wheat. We are immense exporters of wheat. It is the growth and export of wheat, wool, and beef that sustain the whole of the body politic. But for our wheat, wool, and meat, we should be insolvent in a year.

Senator STYLES.—And butter.

Senator FRASER.—Yes, and butter. We should be insolvent in a year but for the production and export of these four commodities. I find that in the year 1901-1902 we exported no less than 2,379,000 bags of wheat, and in the same year we exported also 314,000 bags of flour. There has been for years past a stream of wheat running continuously, like a great river, from Australia to London. How can any one stop that huge export?

Senator STYLES.—No one desires to do so.

Senator FRASER.—Then what is the use of pretending to bolster up the farmer and to give him assistance by imposing a duty upon wheat? It is neither more nor less than throwing dust in the eyes of the farmer. We might just as reasonably propose to put a duty upon merino wool. It is only 100 years ago since McArthur imported three rams and six ewes into New South Wales, and now we are exporting millions of pounds of wool. Our wheat industry is only one of yesterday in the history of the nation, but it is a huge industry nevertheless. I do not suppose there is any country on the face of the earth that per head of population exports as great a quantity of wool, meat, and wheat, as Australia.

Senator HIGGS.—If the duty will be inoperative, why get so excited about it?

Senator FRASER.—It will be inoperative except at a time like the present, and such a time has never before been known in Australia. God knows what the result will yet be. I pray Almighty God that this drought may cease, because if it does not, I tell honorable senators, and I tell labouring men, that there will be no capital in this country to give employment to labour, or to do anything else, and we shall have the biggest collapse that has ever taken place in this unfortunate country. I have been buying wheat in Roma, in the central district of Queensland, for years past.

Senator DE LARGIE. — Will the drought take away from us the lands of Australia?

Senator FRASER.—The drought has reduced the value of the lands of Australia. Honorable senators have only to look at to-day's Argus, and they will see the way in which the land appraisement court has valued land at Hay. They will find that in the case of 53,000 acres the valuation has been reduced from £1 to 11s. per acre, because of the difficulties of selectors. I am speaking now, not of squatters, but of selectors. I am prepared to go as far as any man living in this country to put men upon the land. I shall always strenuously support anything and everything that will have the effect of putting men upon the land and keeping them there. But I ask honorable senators to look at the reports in the Argus of the appraisements by the land court at Hay, where there are thousands of selectors. That part of the country is supposed to be very rich and fertile, but the records of the Lands department of New South Wales have proven the contrary, and the land appraisement court has reduced the value of selections there from £1 to as low as 8s. and 9s. per acre. Fifty-three thousand acres in that district were dealt with last week, and that is only one instance amongst a number of re-appraisements that have taken place. We really do not know what is the state of the Commonwealth just now, and instead of trying to befool farmers, we should be trying to do something that will help to keep them on their farms. At the present moment stock are dying in tens of thousands. I know what I am talking about, and let me say that there has been a bit of a corner in wheat, because stock-owners are obliged to buy wheat, oats, maize, turnips, and anything that will keep their stock alive. I have a letter in my pocket from Mr. Delpratt, of Tambourine, to which I might refer. He is a gentleman who is well known on the Logan as an honorable man in every respect. Writing of the Logan district, where there are usually 40 inches of rain per annum or thereabouts, he says that the farmers who have taken up dairying in that district within the last two or three years are losing heavily, and their herds are dying by thousands. Strong young cattle are dying there in large numbers, and he informs me that he has had to buy chaff to feed them at £9 5s. per ton with carriage added. If there ever was a time to take off this duty it is the present time. If the Commonwealth Government rose to the occasion they would take the duty off everything that might be used to keep the starving stock alive.

Senator DAWSON.—They think this is just the time to put it on.

Senator FRASER.—I say that that is a most disgraceful statement to make in the face of the fact that stock are dying by millions, and the country is being devastated by this terrible, inconceivable drought. The Government would be doing a grand thing in taking the duty off all produce. I tell honorable senators that the day of reckoning will come, and some record will be kept of this time. Squatters and selectors are compelled to buy produce to keep their stock alive, and there has been a ring formed in some quarters to keep up the price. But for the rain which fell a few days ago in the Riverina district many of the wealthiest men in the district would not have been able to stand. If this drought continued, a man who had the Bank of England at his back would have to come down, because he would lose all his sheep. Like a captain who loses his ship, a squatter who loses the whole of his sheep cannot earn any money; he has large expenses going on, and if his income ceases, what must the result be? I am considered a strong man, and I say that no man can stand this drought for a year or two longer, because there will be no sheep left alive if it continues, and it will take years to recuperate. I recommend the Government, instead of imposing a duty upon these things and befooling the farmers, to remove duties from everything which will keep animals alive.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—This is one of the items upon which honorable senators opposite, with a good deal more of pleasantry than of accuracy, taunt honorable senators like Senator Dobson with being "geographical free-traders." Senator O'Connor displayed a degree of ignorance, to which I do not desire to direct too much attention, when he said that Tasmania was not a wheat-growing State. As a matter of fact, a great deal of wheat is grown in Tasmania, but though, in common with others, I have sometimes been called a local free-trader, I intend to insist as strongly as I can upon our request in the matter of this duty being renewed. It is a fact, the accuracy of which I can guarantee, that no wheat can be landed in the Commonwealth under 3s. 9d. per bushel. I make that statement upon the authority of some of the biggest millers and wheat-growers in Australia, and we can assume that it is correct. I can say without hesitation that there is no sane farmer in the Commonwealth who would not jump at the chance of selling the whole of his wheat crop for the next twenty years at 3s. 9d. per bushel, though the present price of wheat in Australia is from 4s. 9d. to 5s. per bushel. What, then, is the object of this duty which represents about 1s. per bushel? At the present time I suppose it is operative, as I believe that but for the duty the present price of wheat would not be as high as it is. The result of the imposition of the duty is simply that whereas every farmer would gladly have taken 3s. 9d. per bushel, he is getting 4s. 9d. if he has any left. I do not believe that a single farmer in Australia, who deserves our respect, would say that, while in ordinary times he takes with pleasure 3s. per bushel, he is anxious to get 4s. 9d. per bushel in times of stress and necessity. I do not think that there is a farmer who would knowingly put himself in that position. For these reasons, and with a full knowledge—in spite of what Senator O'Connor has said—that it is grown very largely in Tasmania, I shall willingly vote as I did before to make wheat free.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Senator Clemons has spoken of the farmers getting 3s. per bushel for their wheat. The unfortunate farmers do not get that price at any time.

Senator CLEMONS.—What are they getting now if they have any wheat?

Senator HIGGS.—It was sold at 2s. 9d. per bushel to those persons who held on to it until the people had to pay 5s. per bushel. It is not altogether the drought which has kept up the price of wheat. It is the various rings who are doing that. I am anxious to help the farmers by means of a protective duty. There is a movement throughout the Commonwealth to induce the State Governments to establish State flour mills where the farmer can get his wheat ground into flour, instead of being compelled to sell on the farm to the agents of rings.

Senator DAWSON.—How will the duty affect them?

Senator HIGGS.—The farmer will be protected against outside competition. He will continue to grow wheat, and he will agitate, and be assisted to agitate, for the establishment of State flour mills. If it is desired to help the farmer, he should not be exposed to the competition of foreign countries like the Argentine and Siberia.

Senator CLEMONS.—Siberia sending wheat here!

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable and learned senator, who always speaks with greater authority than any one else, challenges the idea that there is any wheat cultivation in Siberia.

Senator CLEMONS.—I said that they could not send it here.

Senator HIGGS.—The Statesman's Year Book will disclose the amount of cultivation which is going on in Siberia as well as in the Argentine.

Senator CLEMONS.—If they could land wheat here, at what price could it be done?

Senator HIGGS.—The same remark was made in respect to the Argentine, which is one of the greatest competitors that Australia has to meet in the English market as regards sheep, cattle, and wool. The honorable and learned senator seems to lose sight of the fact that it has only been in recent years that agriculturists have taken to cultivating the lands of Siberia. If he will go to the Library and read a book by a Frenchman called Leroy Beaulieu, who spent some time in investigating the conditions of various industries in China, Japan, and Siberia, he will see that we are likely at any time to be exposed to the competition of those countries. The competition of Siberia is unfair to the farmers in Australia. The drought, which is spoken of in such heartrending terms, will not last forever. Senator Fraser has said that if it lasted the squatters would go down. If we get no rain throughout the Commonwealth we shall have to flee or die. But to talk of these calamities in that way is, to my mind, to border on exaggeration. There has been a fair fall of rain throughout New South Wales. This is a drought of an almost unprecedented character. As a rule a drought comes only once in four years.

Senator FRASER.—This one has lasted four or five years.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator belongs to the class who are always howling calamity, although they are able to get 40s. for a sheep, whereas, in the drought of 1879 a sheep could be bought for 1s. The squatter who has some sheep to sell is not suffering very much.

Senator FRASER.—I shall be very glad to get 1s. a head for some sheep in the centre of Queensland.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator should have sent his sheep down to the market when they were able to travel.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—These remarks are not at all relevant to the item.

Senator HIGGS.—What annoys me, sir, is to hear honorable senators pleading for the introduction of free wheat, because the drought is affecting pastoralists who have a number of sheep for which they would be glad to get 1s. per head.

Senator FRASER.—There is a bit of a corner in wheat now.

Senator HIGGS.—There is a corner in sheep, too—otherwise the public would be able to get their mutton at a lower price.

Item 23.—Grain and pulse, prepared or manufactured, viz., n.e.i., per cental, 2s. 6d.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 1s. 6d.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

In this instance the House of Representatives decided by a majority of ten not to accept the suggestion of the Senate. I mention that first, because it is a consideration which is worthy of note in connexion with all these questions which we have to decide now. There has to be a decision ultimately, and it is an element of importance to consider what the attitude of the other House was and what was the majority there. As far as I can see, there appears to be a disposition on the part of some honorable senators to discuss and decide these questions exactly upon the old lines upon which they have been discussed and decided in both Houses for many months. We shall never arrive at a settlement unless some new element is imported into the discussion, and we should consider whether one side or the other cannot give way in regard to the opinions expressed. I regard what is proposed in this case as the lowest amount of duty which can reasonably be imposed for all purposes.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I hope that honorable senators will vote for not insisting upon the request in this case, because, having secured the introduction of free wheat, they should not object to that wheat being turned into flour by the local flour mills. They surely cannot object to the employment of Australian workmen in flour mills. A duty of 2s. 6d. per cental amounts to a little over $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. That is not a very great protection, and is not likely to increase the price of flour very much.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia). — I wish to say, in reply to what Senator Higgs has said, that it seems to be overlooked that, by adhering to the request we have made, we are making a greater discrimination in favour of the local mill-owner than was given by the Tariff as it came up from the House of Representatives. The duty on wheat was 1s. 6d., whereas it is now free. Formerly the duty on flour was 2s. 6d., and there was a difference of 1s. Now our request makes a difference of 1s. 6d. So that my honorable friend has entirely overlooked the fact that by adhering to our request we are giving a greater advantage and not a lesser one to the miller. As to what Senator O'Connor has said with regard to the certainty that by-and-by we shall have to arrive at a final settlement, I reply that of course we shall. We hope that it will be a settlement satisfactory to all parties in Parliament and satisfactory to the country. We should have had a better foundation upon which we could proceed, if it had not been that unfortunately no reasons have been given by the House of Representatives as to why they have refused our requests. It would have been a very great convenience if those requests which they could not see their way to comply with had been set out in a schedule, and if opposite to each one of them the reasons had been given why they had not been accepted. We have practically nothing to debate, so far as the reasons of the House of Representatives are concerned. Although Senator O'Connor has given us the benefit of the reasons which appeal to him, they are the reasons of the Government and not of the House of Representatives. Naturally and necessarily, they are very largely a rehash of what we have gone over before. It could not be otherwise. That being the case, I hope that we shall adhere to our request.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There is one matter to which I should like to refer now, and that is in regard to an anomaly that would be created with respect to oatmeal manufactured if the suggestion were pressed. It will be remembered that we have already agreed to a duty on oats of 1s. 6d. per cental. This item, "prepared or manufactured," includes what are called hulled oats; that is to say, oats with the husks taken off them. They are imported largely for the purpose of making oatmeal. In hulling, oats lose half their weight. So that it would be very much better to use imported hulled oats at a duty of 1s. 6d. than to use our own oats, because the imported hulled oats, having half the weight, come in at half the duty at which ordinary oats will come in. Upon that subject a representation has been made by the leading oatmeal manufacturers of Melbourne. The document from which I will read is signed by Messrs. McKenzie and Co., Messrs. Harper and Co., and Messrs. Parsons Brothers and Co. They say in the course of this communication:—

If the duty on prepared grain, n.e.i., as suggested by the Senate, is reduced to 1s. 6d. per cental, the same as the duty on unprepared grain, then the prepared or manufactured articles mentioned will come in at a much lower duty equivalently than that at which the raw materials of same are admitted. For instance, shelled or hulled oats, which are always cleaned and kiln dried before shelling, and after shelling are dressed, lose 50 per cent. of their original weight as oats. Therefore 1 cental of shelled or hulled oats represents 2 centals of oats which had not been so prepared or manufactured. Consequently, if the duty on the prepared article is reduced to 1s. 6d. per cental, it will be equivalent to only 9d. per cental on the raw material, one-half of the ordinary oat duty being evaded by the reduction of the original bulk or weight of the oats. The reduction of the duty of 1s. 6d. per cental would open the door for all the oats required for oatmeal purposes to come in at equivalently half the duty which the Tariff fixes for oats. This would be a most serious blow to the farmers of the Commonwealth. It would also do great injury to the oatmilling industry here, as by admitting the almost completed product (shelled or hulled oats being "next door" to "oatmeal") into this market at equivalently half the rate which the raw material has to pay, it would be practically offering a premium to outside mills to do the work, and valuable employment for a large amount of labour and much valuable machinery would thereby be lost to the Commonwealth.

That letter seems to put in a very concise way the anomaly that would be created by adopting the Senate's suggestion, and it comes from a source which cannot be doubted, because, although these people are interested, they are writing about a matter which they understand. It must be apparent to everybody that what they represent will be the case. That is to say, if these firms can get prepared oats imported at practically 9d. a cental instead of 1s. 6d., we shall take away to a very large extent the protection which we have already given to the growers of oats in Australia. It will be remembered that a number of those who voted for the 1s. 6d. per cental on other grain did so on the ground that if that protection were not given, locally-grown grain would be likely to be swamped and driven out of the market by importations from other places. That being so, it is surely unfair to leave unprepared oats in such a position that it will pay the miller better to buy imported oats than to use the oats grown by our own people. We ought to be consistent, and impose a duty on this and other grains of the kind in contradistinction to what has been done in regard to wheat. Do not let us impose it with one hand and take it away with the other. Do not let us tell the growers of oats in Tasmania that we propose to give them a certain amount of taxation, and then by the way in which we treat them in this next item really take away the market which we otherwise should give them. Above all things let us avoid anomalies which are almost sure to create a feeling that injustice has been done, and which really operate to produce the very opposite effect to that which the majority of the committee have intended in dealing with these items generally. I hope that the committee will not press its request.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I have said practically all that I wish to say about this matter, but I desire to point out that the anomaly in relation to hulled oats, to which Senator O'Connor has just referred, is due not to the request made by the Senate, but to the want of care with which the preceding lines in item 23 have been framed. It might have been included under the heading of "Oatmeal, rolled oats," and so on, or we might have had it in a line by itself. The reason that the anomaly exists is of course that it was not discovered until these gentlemen found it out, and indicated the fact in the letter which has been read. It seems to me that it would be a very strange proceeding to charge the same duty upon hulled oats, which are not oatmeal—and which, so to speak, are only half-way between the raw grain and the manufactured article—and upon flour. I see what the difficulty is, and if my honorable and learned friend will suggest that hulled oats be put into a new line, I shall assent to that being done. I should be sorry to see them admitted free of duty or at a lower rate than would be proper in view of the fact that the duty on oatmeal is $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. That would be unfair to the miller who manufactures oatmeal, and it would also be unfair to those who have to import oats, because this is a commodity which is betwixt and between. If my honorable and learned friend will suggest any way by which we can impose a duty on hulled oats I shall agree to it.

Senator O'CONNOR.—We shall meet with difficulties if we attempt to deal with these prepared articles in a different way. We must take them as a whole.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot possibly do that. As we have made wheat free, flour should not be left at 2s. 6d. a cental. Whereas under the Tariff as introduced the difference was only 1s., under our request the difference would be 1s. 6d., and surely that is enough. As Senator O'Connor does not propose some way of meeting the difficulty, I would suggest the introduction of a new line "n.e.i., except as to hulled oats."

Senator O'CONNOR.—I cannot accept that, and I do not think it would bring us any nearer a settlement.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Perhaps it would not meet the difficulty.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I venture to think that the best way out of the difficulty would be to make the duty of 1s. 6d. per cental apply only to wheaten flour. Undoubtedly that is the principal article which we desire to bring down to this level. I think that the others are of no great importance, and I am not sure that the item mentioned by Senator O'Connor is worth troubling about.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—One more anomaly will not count for much.

Senator PULSFORD.—No. If we limited our request to wheaten flour the difficulty would be overcome.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That would not put the duty on hulled oats. Let us adhere to our request.

Item 24. Hay and Chaff, 1s. per cwt.

Senate's Request.—Add to special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

I do not intend to repeat arguments which have already been used. I think that the committee is in possession of the merits of the question, but I wish to mention that the motion submitted in another place that the amendment requested by us be made was defeated by ten votes, while in this House the request was carried by only two votes. As we have to come to an agreement ultimately, and, as I said before, the sooner the agreement is arrived at the better it will be, I would ask honorable senators whether, considering the merits of this question, anything is to be gained by pressing our request. Without going into the merits of the matter, I would point out that on the grounds of protection, the equal distribution of the benefits of the Tariff, and every other ground, the duty should be allowed to stand.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—The Vice-President of the Executive Council has requested the committee not to adhere to its request on the ground of the equal distribution of the benefits of the Tariff. Words like that when applied to the duties on fodder sound very strange to the ears of honorable senators from New South Wales.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Especially from the lips of a New South Welshman.

Senator MILLEN.—And especially coming from a New South Welshman at a time when it may safely be said that nine-tenths of New South Wales is struggling with a drought, the like of which no white man has ever seen here before.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Are we making a Tariff for these exceptional times?

Senator MILLEN.—We are making a Tariff to ruin the people who are suffering.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The duty will not be of any avail in normal times.

Senator MILLEN.—Exactly. The duty therefore can only be imposed for a time of extreme distress, such as the present. Had the Government shown some inclination to listen to the prayer for help, and to remit these duties at a time like this—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—I do not think I can allow the honorable senator to go into that matter; it is really not relevant.

Senator MILLEN.—Then I will say that if the Government had taken some course different from that which it has adopted in regard to these duties the request that we should give way might not have been unreasonable. But as the only chance which the representatives of New South Wales have to obtain some concession in this direction is by the adherence of the committee to its request, it is utterly impossible for any of us to adopt the attitude suggested by Senator O'Connor. Since the Senate last dealt with this matter, I have had an opportunity of travelling through many of the country districts of New South Wales, and I regret to say that in no single instance have I seen anything to justify me in supposing that the reports of the drought have been exaggerated. Indeed, everything proves the contrary. In spite of the temporary relief which the rain has given to a few districts, New South Wales is to-day in a more perilous position than she has ever been in. Not only is the condition of that State as I have described it, but I find that there is an intensely bitter feeling growing up as the result of the want of sympathy shown by the Federal Government. It is only a straw in the current of affairs, but it will not have escaped the attention of honorable senators that in the State Parliament last night, the Premier was asked whether he would take steps to secure the secession of the State from the Union.

Senator DRAKE.—What did he say?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned senator asks me what he said.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—I ask the honorable and learned senator whether he thinks this is relevant.

Senator MILLEN.—I am endeavouring to submit evidence of the feeling in New South Wales upon this particular item. With all deference, I think I have a right, speaking for the electors of New South Wales, to show that they have pronounced very strongly upon this matter, and that I, as one of their representatives, cannot adopt the attitude which the Vice-President of the Executive Council asks me to adopt. Senator Drake has asked me what reply was given to the question to which I have referred. It is a significant thing that the Premier of New South Wales was not prepared straight off to say "No" to the question. He asked that the questioner should give notice of his question. Honorable senators may laugh, but they should recognise that the question is likely to become a very acute and very active one in New South Wales unless some larger measure of consideration is shown for that State than the Government are apparently prepared to concede. Without going further into the matter, I say that it is impossible for me, as a New South Wales representative, to do anything else but vote that this item should be placed upon the free list.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I indorse every word that has fallen from my honorable colleague, Senator Millen. I do not know that the heart of New South Wales has ever been so deeply stirred, during the 40 years I have lived in that colony and State, over any one question as it is stirred to-day, and has been stirred for some time past in connexion with this question of the duties upon forage. Not only the great pastoral interest, but the dairying interest, and the cabmen and draymen feel the present strain. The cabman feels it very bitterly, because, while the price of feed for his horse or horses has been materially increased, his power of earning owing to the drought has been materially decreased. He is, unfortunately, hit on both sides, and he ought to be considered. Certainly draymen and cabmen cannot be classified under the heading of the great financial institutions we heard so much about in a recent debate upon this item. I very strongly reprehend the action of the Government in attempting to wring from those in peril and distress, and only at such times and only from such persons, the proposed tax which Senator O'Connor asks the committee to assent to. The honorable and learned senator knows perfectly well that this is a tax which can only fall upon my State in times of distress, of national calamity, and even of national peril. It is certainly not for such times and circumstances that any Parliament should regulate special taxation. This tax is valueless to the Government in a time of prosperity, and is of use as a revenue collecting machine only in times of peril and distress. I speak perhaps warmly, but I am prepared to fight this matter to the last, and if I have to go down upon it, it shall be with the New South Wales colours at the fore.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Item 46. Rice, n.e.i., per cental, 6s.

Senate's Request—That the duty be reduced to 5s. per cental.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

In proportion to population, rice is used much more largely in Queensland than in any other State, because of the number of coloured aliens there. In the Northern Territory of South Australia a great quantity is used. Until rice is largely produced in Queensland—and we hope that it will be by-and-by—there must be in that State, as in others, a large amount of revenue derived from its importation. In the six months extending from the 1st January to 30th June of this year—after a great portion of the overloading had been got rid of, and normal conditions restored—we collected in New South Wales, £6,020; in Victoria, £3,598; in Queensland, £16,126; in South Australia, £4,096; in Tasmania, £1,160, and in Western Australia, £2,728, showing an enormous consumption of the article in Queensland; as compared with other States. It is undoubted that if the duty is reduced by 1s. per cental, the revenue will be diminished all round. No more rice will be imported by reason of the reduction of the duty, because for a long time to come it must be imported. The consumption of the article will not be increased by a reduction of the duty, but a very large sum will be lost to the revenue. In the case of Queensland the loss to the revenue would be at least £5,400 per annum, and proportionately the same in the other States. From the standpoint of the Commonwealth revenue that is a very serious consideration. The States are equally interested in the preservation of this revenue. If the duty is reduced by 1s. the margin to the rice-cleaners will be reduced from 2s. to 1s. net. This is unjustifiable. The rice-cleaning industry is certainly one which ought to be regarded. If we can preserve revenue, and, at the same time, give an additional amount of protection to the rice-cleaners, it ought to be done. Considering how this question has been thrashed out in both Houses, I submit that the time has now come when the committee might very well abandon its request.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD (Victoria).—In the temporary absence of Senator Symon I have to ask the committee to oppose this motion. Our request was disagreed to by a small majority of three in a House of 76 members; while it was carried here by a majority considerably in excess of that number. The printed paper which has been circulated shows that, while rice was free in New South Wales and Western Australia, it was subject to a duty of 3s. per cwt. in South Australia; 1d. per lb. in Tasmania and Queensland, and 6s. and 4s. per cental in Victoria. Senator O'Connor was quite correct in stating that, whereas under a duty of 6s. per cental the margin to the cleaners is 1s. 10d., under a duty of 5s. per cental it would be reduced to 1s. He has stated that, in his opinion, a margin of 1s. per cental is not sufficient. That is a matter upon which we may fairly differ. The inquiries I have made lead me to think that it is quite sufficient, bearing in mind that what is called the refuse is worth about £4 per ton. All through the discussions on the Tariff we have been told of the inability of various manufacturers to carry on if the duties were reduced. I must confess that the longer the consideration of the Tariff is prolonged, and the more opportunities I have to look into these questions, the more doubtful I am as to the accuracy of those statements on the part of the manufacturers. There are some most glaring inconsistencies in their statements. I may refer, in passing, to the woollen factories, which were to be ruined when the duty was reduced to 30 per cent., but which, with a protection of 15 per cent., are better off than ever they were. It will be recollected that when the rice and starch duties were being considered, a circular letter by Mr. T. A. Lewis, of the firm of Lewis and Whitty, was quoted by an honorable senator. I have no doubt that it affected the votes of more than one honorable senator. It affected my vote, because I knew the writer. After it was received by me, I sent to Mr. Lewis and went into the matter with him, and he assured me, from his personal knowledge, that the statements it contained were absolutely correct. The letter, which is dated 8th May, reads as follows:—

So much has been said in the House of Representatives upon the "starch" question that is not in accordance with facts, that I think it advisable to acquaint you with some particulars that justify the continuance of the present duty and also the removal of the excise, and thereby, to a great extent, equalize the conditions of the Australian starch manufacture with the English and continental makers.

I had exceptional opportunities when visiting the works of Messrs. Colman, at Norwich, of ascertaining particulars not generally known in connexion with their works. The information was direct and personal.

They pay their men 12s. a week, provide them with a house to live in, with a little land about it for which they charge 2s. per week, leaving a net balance of 10s. for their services. They work ten hours a day, and if after such working they have the inclination to cultivate the soil about their houses, the firm undertakes to find a market for the produce. The education of the children is also undertaken by the firm, the parents paying 2d. per week for one child, 2d. per week where there are two, and 3d. per week for three, or equal to 1d. each child weekly. The conditions existing here, so far as ourselves are concerned, are as follow:—We pay the men doing the same work from 36s. to £2 2s. per week: they work eight hours a day. We think this comparison will serve the purpose so far that it will indicate how we are handicapped on the question of wages alone. There are further particulars, which I shall be very pleased to enter into at the interview you were good enough to promise on Monday next.

At that interview Mr. Lewis confirmed all that he had stated in his letter, and gave me further information in the same direction. I told him that the information was such as surprised me, and subsequently I thought that the best thing I could do was to send a letter to my partner, Mr. Ewen, in London, asking him to submit to Messrs. Colman the letter of Mr. Lewis, and hear what they had to say. A mail or two ago I received the reply, which they sent to Mr. Ewen on the 7th July, and which reads as follows :—

In reply to your favour of the 4th instant, we beg to inform you that, whilst it is somewhat unusual to receive an inquiry concerning that which, after all, is a purely private matter affecting the conduct of our business, the statements of your correspondent are so absolutely inaccurate, notwithstanding the assertion that his information was obtained "direct and personal," that our directors desire to reply to your courteous communication in the same spirit as that which inspired it.

The current wage of our starch labourers, instead of being 12s., as stated by Mr. F. A. Lewis, is 23s. per week; foremen, fitters, engineers, skilled workmen, and others of course obtaining a much higher rate of pay. Their average hours are not more than 58 per week, and are frequently less when the nature of the work permits. In addition, our directors provide a pension scheme, which enables our hands to retire at 65 years of age on a life pension of 8s. per week, irrespective of a further 2s. per week arising from the pensioner's own contribution of 2d. per week, upon which compound interest has been allowed by the company, and which is always the property of the employé. This scheme alone involves an expense of many thousands of pounds per annum.

Your correspondent refers to education. The directors encouraged the education of the children of the workpeople long before the passing of the Education Act of 1870 at a large annual expense, which the nominal charge made was wholly inadequate to discharge. Only quite recently did the company surrender its schools to the board in order that the children might be brought into line with the system of education nationally adopted. Thrift is encouraged by the creation of savings banks and sick clubs, all of which are carried on at a large expense to the company. The costs of manufacture are dependent upon many things. Besides the cost of labour there are the rates and taxes, the price of raw materials such as coal, carriage, all so varied and far-reaching in effect as to require, as we informed another correspondent, an economic treatise to deal with them.

Your correspondent's statements as to rents and allotments are as misleading as are his statements respecting costs of labour. But few of the many hundreds of hands are tenants of the company, and a still fewer number are allotment holders, and no attempt is made, as your correspondent asserts, to relieve such holders of their produce.

We do not desire to refer to other heavy expenses incurred to benefit and improve the social status of our workpeople involving a very large annual outlay, as we think we have said sufficient to prove that when all these matters are actuarially valued, the disparity in wages, the existence of which your correspondent tried to prove, almost if not entirely disappears.

Your correspondent should be made to realize that any attempts to influence legislation must be based on facts, and not on such inaccurate statements as those made to Sir Frederick Sargood, and for this reason we have much pleasure in supplying you with the information herein contained.

We have no record of a visit being paid to these works by Mr. Lewis. Would Sir F. Sargood oblige us by ascertaining the date when the alleged visit took place?

On receipt of this letter I communicated with Mr. Lewis, and he came to see me. I read this letter to him, and gave him a copy of it, and he then, for the first time, stated that it was thirteen years ago when he visited the works of Messrs. Colman. I asked him why, in his circular to members of the Senate, he did not mention that fact, and I must confess that his reply was not by any means satisfactory. As the letter of Mr. Lewis was circulated amongst honorable senators, I thought it only fair to the committee and to Messrs. Colman to read their reply also. I have done so. I may also state that quotations were made at the same time with regard to the fact that Messrs. Colman supplied their starch at a higher price to buyers at home than the price at which they are prepared to sell it for export. I need hardly say to those who know anything of business that that is not an unusual thing. The export business is an extra business, which a firm can afford to do at a lower price. But Messrs. Colman also take exception to that statement, and they say that the difference is simply caused by the fact that at home they supply their goods on such terms that they have to pay all the expenses of delivery, and that accounts for the variance in price.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—As my name has been introduced into this discussion—not by Sir Frederick Sargood, who has dealt with the subject, as he does with every subject, in a gentlemanly way; as my honorable friend, the Opposition whip, has interjected that I read the letter from Mr. Lewis—I desire to say a few words. It is true that I read the letter, but it is also true that every member of the committee at that time had a copy of it. Therefore the fact of my reading it cannot have influenced the committee in regard to their decision. If I had not read it aloud, it cannot be doubted that some other honorable senator would have done so. It may be remembered that I was the third member of the committee who took part in the debate upon the starch question—that is to say, I spoke after the Vice-President of the Executive Council and the leader of the Opposition had addressed the committee. Had I intervened a little later in the debate, probably some one else would have read the letter. Probably Senator Sargood himself might have done so. After I had read the letter, Senator Symon interjected—

The honorable senator does not accept the statement as to Colman's, does he?

Then the following passage occurred:—

Senator STYLES.—Yes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I should not.

Senator STYLES.—I have no reason to think that Messrs. Lewis and Whitty would put their names to a deliberate untruth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It looks uncommonly like it.

Senator STYLES.—Their statement may be untrue, but I do not think it is. If I thought this letter were untrue I would throw it into the waste-paper basket.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Hear, hear.

There is another phase of this question to which Senator Sargood has not referred. By permission of the committee I will read a letter which was published by Messrs James Service and Co., who are the agents for Messrs. Colman in Melbourne. This letter appeared in the Argus on the 31st of last month:—

On 6th June last, on a motion in the Senate by Sir Josiah Symon that a recommendation be made to the House of Representatives that the duty on starch should be reduced from 2d. to 1½d. per lb., Senator Styles, in opposing the motion, argued that it was unfair to make this reduction, because manufacturers of starch were paid high wages, while an English firm like Messrs. J. and J. Colman Limited only paid their workmen 12s. a week, supplying them with a house, for which they charged 2s. per week. In support of his statement, he read a letter from Mr. Lewis, of Messrs Lewis and Whitty, as his authority.

We at once forwarded to Messrs. J. and J. Colman a Hansard copy of the debate, and are just in receipt of a cable from them, announcing that the statement made is "absolutely untrue," and requesting us to make this information public, and that they are sending us full particulars by post.

I should also like to direct attention to Mr. Lewis' reply to that letter. It is only fair that some one should speak on behalf of Mr. Lewis, and as I have taken an active part in the discussion I will do so.

I may mention that I have never seen Mr. Lewis in my life, to the best of my knowledge. From this letter the committee will see that Mr. Lewis takes the whole responsibility upon himself. He says, in a letter to the Argus, on the 1st August—

A letter appears in to-day's issue from Messrs. James Service and Co., as agents for Messrs. J. and J. Colman, denying the truth of the statement furnished by Senator Styles respecting the remuneration paid by Messrs. J. and J. Colman to their workmen. As the author of the statement I wish to say that the information was imparted to me personally, and unsolicited, at their works, Norwich, by one in authority, and whose position enabled him to be familiar with the conditions existing at that period, now some thirteen years ago.

I am very pleased to hear that circumstances have improved, and wait with pleasure the promised particulars.

Yours, &c.,

F. A. LEWIS.

Those promised particulars have not reached Melbourne yet, so far as I am aware.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Oh, yes! these are they. I have given a copy of this letter to Mr. Lewis.

Senator STYLES.—Does that letter come through Messrs. James Service and Co.?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—No; it has come direct to me.

Senator STYLES.—I understand that the promised particulars have not been sent to Messrs. Colman's agents?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Yes; a copy of this letter was sent to Messrs. James Service and Co.

Senator STYLES.—Messrs. Service's letter refers to particulars which were to be sent to them.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—These are they.

Senator STYLES.—But I understand that the letter which Senator Sargood read comes from his partner.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Yes; and Messrs. Colman have sent a copy of this letter to Messrs. Service and Co.

Senator STYLES.—My point is, that Mr. Lewis has not yet been supplied with the particulars promised by Messrs. Service and Co., which they said they were getting out.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Those particulars are just the same as I have given, and, as I have mentioned, Mr. Lewis has had a copy.

Senator STYLES.—And he has not appeared in print on the subject since?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Exactly.

Senator STYLES.—If that be so, and if Mr. Lewis is satisfied that this statement came from Messrs. Colman—and I do not doubt it—and has not seen fit to reply through the press, I shall consider that he regards himself as being in fault. If he regards a copy of that letter as being a statement of the particulars promised to be furnished to Messrs. Service and Co. by Messrs. Colman, and he has not seen fit to reply, the fault is his. I thank Senator Sargood for the nice way in which he put the matter, and I repeat that I read the letter—as any honorable senator might have done in my place—because I happened to be the first speaker who had an opportunity of quoting it. I may also remark that in the course of the same debate Senator Higgs said—

I think we have every reason to believe the statements made in the letter quoted by Senator Styles.

If Senator Higgs believed that he would have read the letter if I had not done so. I will now leave the matter for Mr. Lewis to make a reply, seeing that he furnished every member of this Chamber with a copy of the letter which I quoted. In fact, it was a circular letter.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not receive a copy.

Senator STYLES.—I am aware that Senator Sargood said that he had received a copy of the letter, and had sent it home to his house in order to ascertain the facts.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—Senator O'Connor has asked the committee not to insist upon its request in regard to this item on account of the revenue. It is upon the ground of revenue itself that the committee a month or two ago agreed to the request of the House of Representatives by a very substantial majority. Senator O'Connor has correctly stated the difference between the duty on uncleaned rice and that on cleaned rice. The actual difference is really 2s. But the position is this. Up to the present time there has been no rice-cleaning anywhere in Australia, except in Victoria, and with the exception of this State, most of the rice that has been imported into Australia has been cleaned. On that rice the Customs have been able to collect a duty of 6s. per cental, which revenue has gone to the service of the public. If this system of cleaning in bond is to be encouraged in the way suggested, away goes a considerable amount of that revenue. It has been shown by a good deal of evidence, in the most conclusive manner, that the cost of cleaning rice is comparatively small. I think it has been accepted as being about 15s. a ton. The consumption of rice in Australia is at least 15,000 tons or more. Are we to give away £30,000 or £40,000 a year of public revenue in order that a few thousand pounds may be spent in cleaning rice? According to the Tariff proposals before us the cleaners of rice are to be allowed an enormous payment. I do not know whether honorable senators quite grasp how serious the position is. It is worth knowing that in the other House the request made by the Senate was very nearly being agreed to. The majority by which the Government succeeded in inducing the House to refuse our request was only three. So that it is quite clear that the House of Representatives as a whole is very much impressed with the solidity of the request which has been made by the Senate, and I entertain very little doubt that they will very soon see their way clear to accept the request which we make. As it is, I think the proposal of the Government is one of the grossest pieces of—I will not say corruption, but of outrageous waste of the money of the public which I have ever known. In these times, when all the Australian Parliaments are being called upon to exercise economy, surely we cannot accept a piece of extravagance like this. It is practically the same as if the money were taken out of the pockets of the people and deliberately thrown away, save that money will be taken out of the pockets of the people as a whole and retained by certain persons. Surely we cannot allow the people to be robbed in this extravagant fashion. I hope the committee will unhesitatingly affirm this request.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I wish to point out to the Vice-President of the Executive Council that he has fallen into exactly the same error into which he fell when we were discussing this item on a previous occasion, by assuming that if the duty were increased we should obtain more revenue. Nothing is more contrary to the fact. As a matter of fact, the revenue that every State—even the State in which rice cleaning is carried on—will receive must depend entirely upon the duty which is imposed on uncleaned rice unless, of course, any State imports a large quantity of cleaned rice.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The honorable and learned senator knows that the great bulk of the rice used in Queensland by Orientals is imported cleaned. They will not have the rice which is cleaned here.

Senator CLEMONS.—I did not know it before, but I know what goes on in the more normal States.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It was shown on a former occasion by Senator Pearce that there is more rice consumed in Western Australia than in Queensland, where there is a great influx of Chinese.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The revenue returns absolutely contradict that assertion.

Senator CLEMONS.—I remember that Senator O'Connor's argument was entirely exploded by Senator Pearce. I will say that the honorable and learned senator has properly accounted for Queensland, but apart from that it is apparent that if we allow a large margin between the duty on uncleaned rice, and that on cleaned rice, the revenue will depend undoubtedly upon the quantity of uncleaned rice that is imported. If we fix a heavy duty on cleaned rice, nearly all the rice consumed in the Commonwealth will be cleaned locally, and we shall have to depend entirely for our revenue on the duty on uncleaned rice. If, on the other hand, as honorable senators on this side suggest, the margin is made a reasonable one—if we say that a margin of 1s. 8d. per cental is abundant to the man who wants to clean rice here—we may hope that, without doing much harm to the great local industry of rice cleaning, some of the States that want revenue will obtain it. It is the bounden duty of every honorable senator who wishes, as the Vice-President of the Executive Council apparently does, to see revenue obtained, to vote for a duty of 5s. per cental in accordance with our request rather than for a duty of 6s. per cental as fixed in the Tariff. When we went into this question on a former occasion a great many of us thought that the demand for revenue was a fair one, and an attempt was made by Senator Higgs to increase the duty on uncleaned rice. That proposal met with opposition from several honorable senators, and we decided ultimately, by a majority of 6, that the House of Representatives should be requested to fix the duty on cleaned rice at 5s. per cental. I venture to say, without hesitation, that what induced most honorable senators to vote for that rate of duty was the consideration of revenue. Yet we hear the Vice-President of the Executive Council falling into the same old trap, and saying that if we want more revenue we should fix the duty at 6s. I do not believe there is an honorable senator who does not recognise the fact that if we want more revenue we should adhere to our request. A margin of 1s. 8d. is abundant, the demand for revenue is fair, and a duty of 5s. is very necessary.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I should like to correct the misapprehension under which Senator Clemons seems to labour as to the amount of protection afforded the rice cleaning industry. The duty on uncleaned rice is 3s. 4d. a cental. It was admitted on a former occasion, that allowance has to be made for 17 per cent. of dirt, and that brings up the duty on the actual quantity of rice to be cleaned to something like 4s; that is to say, we have to add 8d. to the duty of 3s. 4d., before we get to the actual rice to be cleaned. Therefore, the protection would not be 1s. 8d., as the honorable and learned senator has said, but 1s.

Senator CLEMONS. — The protection is really 1s. 8d. per cental. The loss is made in cleaning the rice.

Senator O'CONNOR.—We have to allow 8d. per cental for the dirt, before we can make our comparisons. Having added the 8d., we get the duty on uncleaned rice at 4s. per cental, so that the difference between us is whether the margin should be 2s. or 1s.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—That is so far as the cleaning is concerned, and excepting of course the bye products.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I have heard nothing to show that the duty which we claim to be necessary is not the lowest which should be given. I appeal to those honorable senators who wish to see the revenue of the different States maintained to have some regard to the case of Queensland. There has been no attempt to answer what I said in regard to it. Senator Clemons says that with this duty the rice which is consumed here will be cleaned locally. Assuming that that may be so to a certain extent, so far as the other States are concerned, we know by experience that it will not be the case in regard to the States in which a large number of Orientals have to be fed, because they obtain their rice from their own country, and will not have any other.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is only a small matter.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Will the honorable senator try to realize what the difference is between the importations into Queensland and the other States? In Queensland the revenue obtained from this source amounted to £16,126, as against £6,020 in New South Wales. Considering the disparity in the population, that shows an enormous difference in the consumption of rice in the two States. A large number of the Orientals in Queensland obtain their food from the Chinese and Japanese firms who import their rice, cleaned, from their own countries. That is why there is such a large quantity of cleaned rice imported into Queensland as compared with that imported into the other States. I say that honorable senators opposite are proposing to deliberately throw away £5,400 of Queensland's revenue, to throw away the revenue of the other States, and to diminish the protection proposed to be given to the rice cleaner. In addition to that they are taking up a position which will make it more difficult to agree with another place. There is no justification for such an attitude, and I hope the committee will see the reasonableness of coming to the conclusion that this request should not be pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is certainly refreshing to hear once more the old, fallacious arguments which were dished up for us upon a previous occasion. They are extremely threadbare, and daylight is easily seen through them. The history of the position is this: Under the Tariff as it came to us uncleaned rice was subject to a duty of 3s. 4d. per cental, while the duty on cleaned rice was 6s. per cental. That gave a difference of 2s. 8d. per cental in favour of the gentlemen employing two or three boys in rice-cleaning. If honorable senators will casually glance at the Hansard report of the former debate, which was a very long one, they will find that it was admitted on all hands that 8d. was a very fair amount to allow in respect of the waste before any profit can go into the pockets of the cleaner from this difference in duties. I regarded it as extravagant, but we were willing to accept it as a very fair compromise of what we might say was the waste. In Victoria, the duties were 4s. and 6s. The duty of 3s. 4d. per cental upon the uncleaned article was below the old Victorian rate, but the duty on cleaned rice was left as it was in Victoria. That was the position when, after I had withdrawn my amendment to reduce the duty of 6s. to 5s. per cental, so as to aid the revenue, Senator Higgs moved to increase the duty upon the uncleaned article to 5s. 3d. per cental, for the sake of giving additional protection to the grower of rice in Queensland. That proposal was negatived, and then my proposition that the House of Representatives should be requested to reduce the duty on cleaned rice to 5s. per cental was carried by a majority of six. The records of another place show that our proposal was rejected by the narrow majority of three, which was only half that which we had in favour of reducing the duty to 5s. per cental. I quite agree with Senator O'Connor, that it is perfectly fair to look at the records on both sides. What is the inference to be drawn from what I have stated? It is, that whatever the records may show as to the feeling in another place when the duty of 6s. per cental was originally adopted, the House of Representatives have largely come to the opinion conveyed in our message that 5s. per cental is a very fair thing. But what is the difference? As a matter of protection to this gigantic industry of cleaning rice, the difference is only 4d. less than that given to the cleaner under the old Victorian Tariff. It must be remembered that the Victorian cleaner has now the whole of Australia to look to for compensation, whereas before he was restricted to the markets of Victoria, and possibly of free-trade New South Wales, while all the other States had barriers erected against him. Is not that a reason for thinking that the request of the Senate is a very fair one? Senator O'Connor asks what it represents. When it is put at so much a cental, and the amount is stated at 1s., it appears to be but a small sum, but it is equivalent to £1 per ton, and rice is cleaned, not by the pound weight or the cwt., but by the ton. So that after allowing 8d. per cental, irrespective of waste, we propose to give a clear protection of £1 net per ton to the gentleman who employs a few boys in the cleaning of rice. We discussed the matter before from the revenue point of view, and I fail to understand how my honorable and learned friend can tell the committee that the request we make, if adopted, is likely to reduce the revenue. If it will not be an inducement to people to clean rice here, what sort of rice will be imported? Cleaned rice. What sort of rice pays the highest duty? Cleaned rice. It is less in quantity also, because I understand that no rebate is allowed in respect of the waste. The effect of the proposal will be that we shall have a much larger importation of the cleaned rice which pays duty at the rate of 5s. per cental, and a smaller importation of the uncleaned article paying duty at only 3s. 4d. per cental. Surely that will be for the benefit of the revenue. Honorable senators will see that the reduction of the duty from 6s. to 5s. was moved in the first instance from a revenue point of view, and at the same time with a view not to deal harshly with those engaged in this industry. We leave them the benefit of a protection of £1 net per ton, and the waste product which in the form of rice flour is of considerable market value. All these matters were gone into in the course of an exhaustive debate, with the result that from the point of view of revenue and of an adequate measure of protection, the Senate carried its request by a majority of six. I feel certain that the House of Representatives will acquiesce in the request, if by pressing it we respectfully ask them to reconsider the matter.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I regret that I have to renew the appeal on behalf of Queensland. If honorable senators will refer to pages 110 and 111 of the Queensland Statistics, they will find that during the year 1901 there were imported into Queensland some 7,623,903 lbs. of rice, valued at £43,783, and providing a revenue from customs taxation of £28,532 12s. 1d. This rice was imported from a number of places—£474 worth from the Straits Settlement, £509 from India, £14,338 from Japan, £27,406 from China, and £1,056 from Siam. We have in Queensland certain lands which are eminently suited for the production of rice, but if honorable senators absolutely destroy our protection, farmers will give up the cultivation of the article. We had in that State a duty upon rice of no less than 8s. 4d. per cental. The protectionists and free-traders in the House of Representatives saw fit to agree to a compromise in this matter and fixed the duty at 6s. per cental. Now honorable senators who profess to be revenue-tariffists propose that the duty should be further reduced to 5s.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is the duty upon the uncleaned rice which is the basis of protection, and not the duty upon the cleaned rice.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would have been better to have raised the duty on uncleaned rice, but in any case Queensland would have lost revenue.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Pulsford must have made a mistake. For the moment, the honorable senator is under the impression that rice is one of the important ingredients in the preparation of the list of edibles I mentioned some time ago as appearing prominently on banqueting menu cards. There may be a little rice powder used in the custards, but the plain ordinary rice rarely finds any place in company with the high-class wines, muscatels, cigars, and so forth. What we desire is to give encouragement to the farmers of the Commonwealth who cultivate rice, and we desire also to tax, so far as we can, the 80,000 or more coloured aliens, distributed throughout the Commonwealth, who pay no taxation whatever.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We had a double duty on rice in the Northern Territory in order to get at the Chinese.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; but because there were so few things subject to taxation there.

Senator HIGGS.—The great importing industry represented by Senator Pulsford, with special attention to bottled beer, is not likely to be greatly advantaged by the proposed reduction in the duty. From China there comes some £27,000 worth of rice into Queensland in the year, but, as has been pointed out, that rice is brought into Queensland mainly by the Chinese importers in that State.

Senator DAWSON.—What kind of rice do they import?

Senator HIGGS.—I do not happen to be well informed upon that question, but I understand that while they import all kinds of rice they chiefly import cleaned rice. However, there is the fact that in Queensland there are some 23,000 coloured aliens, and there are some 80,000 of them in the Commonwealth as a whole, who live in the poorest possible homes. They never patronise the carpenter, and I wonder that Senator Pearce has overlooked that for the moment. They just erect four posts, and patch them up with kerosene tins, old bags, and so forth, and they live on the poorest diet, consisting mainly of rice. If I proposed to get at these gentlemen in another way by the imposition of a poll-tax, honorable senators would not support me, but surely they will agree that the expense of the government of the Commonwealth should be to some extent borne by the coloured aliens who are within it? There is no other way of compelling them to pay towards the cost of government. If there is, I hope honorable senators will point it out. We have no other means of getting at the vast hordes of Hindoos who are making their way into Queensland now and cutting out white men at a ridiculously low rate of wages.

Senator BARRETT.—When they get a little money they clear out.

Senator HIGGS.—As the honorable senator says, when they get a little money they either go back to India or they send for some of their relations to come and assist them in the destructive work which they are carrying on. They are neither good for the Commonwealth as a Commonwealth, nor for the individual members of the community. If they would live as we try to live, and if they tried to bring up decent families and educate them, and make good citizens of them it would be all right. But they come to this country, and as a rule do not bring their wives with them, and they are a menace to our civilization. Our Immigration Restriction Act will not deal with them, because they are already here.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—The honorable senator can only allude to those matters by way of illustration, and I think he has proceeded far enough in that direction.

Senator HIGGS.—I confess that I have taken some time to illustrate the point, but it appeared to me to be necessary. Senator Pulsford, I know, regards the Hindoo coloured alien as his long lost brother, and is anxious to receive him with open arms.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—The honorable senator must see that that statement is not relevant.

Senator HIGGS.—I withdraw the statement. Senator Pulsford, with other revenue-tariffists, is very anxious that this duty should be reduced, but when an opportunity is afforded to raise revenue, the honorable senator refuses to avail himself of it. I again urge, on behalf of the Queensland farmer, and on behalf of the Queensland Treasurer, who is very hard up for money just now, that the committee should not attempt to deprive that State of some thousands of pounds of revenue each year. Honorable senators profess to desire to be fair to each of the States, and yet they are here making another attack upon Queensland. I urge them not to create trouble over a difference between 6s. and 5s. per cental duty upon rice. The fact that the proposed duty of 6s. per cental was a compromise in the other Chamber appears to have been overlooked by those who oppose the motion submitted by Senator O'Connor. In view of the fact that it is the result of a compromise, we can have no hope that our requests will be agreed to by the other Chamber. Honorable senators, therefore, may as well cease this trifling method of procedure, and let us get on to something solid like agricultural machinery.

Question—That the request be not pressed—put. The committee divided.

Item 58. Apparel and attire and articles, n.e.i.:—Woollen or silk, or containing wool or silk partly or wholly made up (not being piece goods), including articles cut into shape, ad valorem, 25 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 20 per cent., ad valorem.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

As this question was thrashed out on a previous occasion, I do not propose to do much more than to point out that a reduction of the duty to 20 per cent. will leave only a 5 per cent. margin of protection in regard to a large number of articles which are manufactured here. In view of the fact that the duty on woollen and silk material is 15 per cent., it was not intended that there should be a margin of only 5 per cent. in favour of the local manufacturer. When it is compared with the margins which have been left in other cases the disproportion becomes all the more evident. In the case of hats and caps the Senate has agreed to a duty of 25 per cent. on the manufactured article, and a duty of 15 per cent. on the material. In the case of boots and shoes it has agreed to a duty of 30 per cent. on the manufactured article, and a duty of 15 per cent. on the material. In the case of stationery it has agreed to a duty of 25 per cent. on the manufactured article, and a duty of 15 per cent. on the paper. In the case of jewellery it has agreed to a duty of 25 per cent. on the finished product, and a duty of 15 per cent. on the partly-manufactured article. In those four cases, not to mention others, there is a margin of from 10 to 15 per cent. Yet in the case of an industry which employs a large number of persons the margin has been cut down to 5 per cent. I shall not go into the question of the number of the employes, or any details of that kind, but it is well known that the manufacture of apparel involves, not only the employment of a very large number of persons, but also the use of material grown by our own people. Whether it is considered from the point of view of the natural products of the soil, which are worked up by our own people into clothes for local consumption, or whether regard is only had to the working up of imported material, it is equally important that the protection should be something real. It is utterly fallacious and misleading for honorable senators to tell the people of the Commonwealth that they are adhering to their requests because they wish to continue the protection to existing industries, and at the same time to cut it down to such an amount that no advantage is given. These arguments must occur to anybody who considers the matter merely on its merits. We have reached a position in which very large interests are involved. We have the twice-expressed opinion of the other House that the duty of 25 per cent. should be adhered to. We have to look to the future. We have to see what chances there are of coming to a settlement. I ask honorable senators whether, considering the margin of protection which is left, there is the least chance of their request being finally agreed to. The more easily they come to an agreement now, the more speedily will Australia be in the position of having a settled fiscal policy, and not until then. I hope that honorable senators will see the necessity of looking at the matter from a point of view different from their previous one. If the new element is not considered, I hope that the responsibility for the difficulties, and the consequences to Australia and to the mercantile community, will rest upon the proper shoulders.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I hope that the committee will adhere to its request. I feel, with Senator O'Connor, that the whole matter was very exhaustively gone into from every point of view on a previous occasion, and no speech was then delivered which was more packed with facts, figures, and arguments than was that delivered by Senator Pearce in answering every point urged by the honorable and learned senator, from the position of the manufacturer, the number of people employed, and the effect of the reduction of the duty to 20 per cent. In order to verify my memory, I have referred to the speech of Senator Pearce, who said—

That 5 per cent. is ample is shown by the report of the Tariff Board of Victoria, by the evidence of the manufacturers, and by the experience of Western Australia, where, with the same protection, we have as many per head of the population engaged in this industry as there are in the Eastern States.

My honorable friend's speech absolutely pulverized the arguments against the maintenance of this high rate of duty on the common articles, which are generally known as slop clothing, and which are more largely used by the poorer people than by any other section. As he dealt so exhaustively and conclusively with that subject, I do not propose to say another word about it. But I propose to say a few words as to the position which Senator O'Connor has suggested in regard to the future. There are no persons, I am sure, who are more deeply sensible than are my honorable friends on this side and myself of the desirability of bringing this matter to a settlement at the earliest possible moment.

Senator O'KEEFE.—You are not going the right way to work.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator think that the right way for us to go to work is to lie down and be walked upon—to abandon our opinions? Is that the function of an honorable senator who has conscientious opinions?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend voted with this side in regard to wheat. Why did he not go back on his old opinion, and vote for the motion of Senator O'Connor?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I had better reasons for opposing that motion than you have for opposing this one.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The only reason I know of is that as the honorable senator had moved that wheat should be free, he did not like to go back on his former vote. Why did he not go back on his former vote in order to conciliate the other House? I am perfectly willing to conciliate the other House, but I have a greater respect for that House than to think that by an unmanly abandonment of our opinions on this side we are likely to make them think better of us. I have a higher respect for them than to imagine that they will not be prepared when the time comes to reconsider these matters, giving the same credit to us as we give to them. I am glad to give them credit for having reconsidered these questions from their point of view fairly, and without any desire to irritate the Senate. So far as the responsibility is concerned, which Senator O'Connor rightly says must rest on some shoulders—he employed a rather menacing tone—the right shoulders to bear it are those of every man in the Senate. It is my belief that no honorable senator will hesitate for a moment to accept whatever responsibility falls to his lot from a conscientious discharge of his duties. All we have to do is to give effect to what we believe to be right in regard to these items, and, where we think our former votes were abundantly justified, to adhere to our position. If it were a mere matter of the revenue from this line, from my point of view it would not have to be considered in the least degree. If the list of those who voted for this request is examined, it will be seen that there is no one who will be prepared to abandon the position which he then took up in regard to articles which are so much in common use. I hope that we shall look at the question from the larger point of view. But if it is taken from the revenue point of view, what was shown in the former debate? The position is unaltered. The Treasurer did not expect to collect more than half the amount of revenue which has been received. Why? When the Tariff was introduced there was an immense quantity of goods on the water for New South Wales, where no duties had existed. On their arrival, these goods were all charged at the rate of 25 per cent. It will be found that the great bulk of the revenue which was received during the past nine months was collected in that State, and not in the other States; and so the Treasurer estimated to receive between £200,000 and £250,000, although the actual collections at the rate which was derivable from the first six months' collections would have brought the amount up to £750,000. Why? Because the circumstances of New South Wales swelled the revenue up to an unusual amount, which will not be received again. So that, if we put this duty at the rate which the Senate has requested, namely, 20 per cent., we shall be benefiting the revenue, lessening the burden on the people who have to use these things, and leaving what the report read by Senator Pearce describes as an ample margin of protection, according to the finding of the board which sat in Victoria, the evidence of the manufacturers, and the experience of Western Australia. Then, let me also point out as to the second line—apparel and attire not containing wool or silk—as to which the Senate requested a reduction from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent., that I propose when we reach that to suggest a modification so as to effect a compromise, increasing 15 per cent. to 20 per cent., so as to leave the rate on the same level as that for item 58, and give the same margin of protection to the one as to the other.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—There is one remark I should like to make with regard to the menacing attitude of Senator O'Connor in reference to the position of the House of Representatives. I would point out that nearly all the majorities in the other House have been smaller than the number of Ministers who voted. Consequently the Government have it in their own hands at any moment they choose to settle these matters with the Senate. In nearly every one of the divisions which took place in the other House, the whole of the votes of the six Ministers were recorded. Take this particular request. It was refused by a majority of five after the votes of the six Ministers had been included. Senator O'Connor was not quite correct in saying that there was only 5 per cent. protection left by these duties. It is quite true that there is only a difference of 5 between 15 and 20. But suppose you have £1,000 worth of cloth. That would be subject to a 15 per cent. duty, and would pay £165. But £1,000 worth of cloth made up into clothing will represent a great deal more in value. Say it means £1,500 worth of clothing. That amount of clothing coming in would pay the 20 per cent. on the full £1,500 worth, or a total of £330. So that the protection is really the difference between the money that is paid on the clothing and the money paid on the cloth. Consequently, instead of there being 5 per cent. protection, there would be 10 per cent. There would be still more protection if the £1,000 worth of cloth made more than £1,500 worth of clothing. In view of these facts I trust that the committee will adhere to their previous request.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD (Victoria).—The Vice-President of the Executive Council has stated that a margin of 5 per cent. is not sufficient for this class of goods. I think I may fairly claim to know something about this branch of trade. In New Zealand the margin has been 5 per cent. for many years, and a larger proportion of apparel of all kinds is made up there in proportion to population than in Victoria. I may add, further, that the wages paid in New Zealand are better than those paid in Victoria. These are facts for which I can vouch as being absolutely correct. But there is another matter to which I should like to call attention. We have now finished the first six months under this Tariff, and, as far as concerns my own branch of commerce, I have had the results taken out. I think it may interest the committee to know what they are; I am certain that it will interest the public outside. It was stated at the time of the introduction of the Tariff, and previously, that the high Tariff of Victoria was not to be followed on the one hand, nor the low Tariff of New South Wales on the other. The results I shall quote will be for softgoods, such as are not used by the higher classes, but by the labourer, the artisan, the clerk, the middleman, and the farmer. The result for six months, comparing the old Victorian Tariff with the new Tariff, is that, taking all these classes of goods, the increase is 6 per cent. all round. That 6 per cent. by the time the goods reach the consumer amounts to fully 10 per cent. Take, for instance, womens' dresses. The increase of duty there amounts to 15 per cent. In future, therefore, a woman will have to pay close on 22½ per cent. on everything she buys in the way of dress, or the other result will follow, namely, that the quality of the goods will have to be reduced. I could also give other particulars dealing with the same facts, but I think that what I have said is sufficient to show that there is an increase of at least 6 per cent. over the old high Victorian Tariff. That was not what any one expected would be the result of the first Federal Tariff. It was expected that there would be a Tariff lower than the old Victorian Tariff, but, of course, considerably higher than the New South Wales Tariff. Coming back again to the item before the committee, I unhesitatingly say that a margin of 5 per cent. is ample, and that there is not the slightest difficulty about conducting and increasing the manufacture of apparel from colonial piece goods with that margin. I state what has been my own experience for 30 years in New Zealand, where not only is there a larger proportion of local stuff made up according to population, but, in addition, better wages are paid.

Senator MACFARLANE (Tasmania).—I was very much surprised at the way in which the Vice-President of the Executive Council met us yesterday. He told us that we ought to be very much pleased if we got a fourth of what we had asked from the other place regarding one small item. He has talked about our responsibilities. I should like to remind him of the responsibilities we owe to the people of this Commonwealth. We, on this side of the Chamber, represent a majority of the people of the Commonwealth. I have been to the trouble of going through the votes given for honorable senators, as shown in the return placed before the House, and I find that, taking New South Wales and Victoria alone, out of 636,000 votes polled there are some 450,000 in favour of our contentions.

Senator O'CONNOR.—On a point of order, I submit that the remarks of the honorable senator are not in order. If we are going into a discussion of this sort, and are to enter upon the consideration of which side represents Australia and which does not, there will be no end to this discussion. The remarks of the honorable senator have nothing whatever to do with the item. If we do not keep to the item under discussion, we shall never get through with our business.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—On the point of order, I think that my honorable and learned friend is very touchy, and very narrow in the view he takes. He has referred to shifting responsibility on to the right shoulders. My honorable friend, Senator Macfarlane, is surely right in showing that that responsibility, as represented on this side of the Chamber, will be on the shoulders of the majority of the people of the Commonwealth. If the Vice-President of the Executive Council makes a charge of that kind, surely an honorable senator can reply to it.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Is the honorable and learned senator serious in that argument?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think that my honorable and learned friend can be serious in raising such a point of order. If a question is raised as to which shoulders the responsibility rests upon, Senator Macfarlane is surely entitled to show what are the facts.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—It seems to me that as both sides throughout the debate have referred to the number of votes recorded in divisions in the other House, and as that has been allowed, I cannot say that Senator Macfarlane is out of order in quoting the numbers of the electors behind those majorities.

Senator MACFARLANE.—In Victoria 95,979 votes were given to what I take were the free-trade candidates.

Senator STYLES.—Give us the names.

Senator MACFARLANE.—Senator Fraser and Senator Sargood are the only two I have included.

Senator BARRETT.—Senator Fraser is not a free-trader.

Senator KEATING.—Senator Sargood is a protectionist.

Senator MACFARLANE.—I am willing to take away the 50,000 votes which were cast for Senator Fraser, and still there is over 400,000 free-trade votes in New South Wales and Victoria. These are not my own figures. At all events, I think that, out of 1,160,767 votes recorded in the Commonwealth, 657,600 were cast in favour of a low Tariff.

Senator O'KEEFE.—On what side have you put Senator Dobson?

Senator MACFARLANE.—I have taken his 1,568 primary votes as those of free-traders. I do not think it is necessary to read out all the names, for I have met all the points that required to be put. If we take away the 50,512 votes cast for Senator Fraser, we have still over 400,000 left as the total free-trade vote in New South Wales and Victoria.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The observations made by Senator Macfarlane with regard to these figures, which have been taken from the free-trade organ—the Argus—rest upon fallacious grounds. In view of the declarations of the Age, it is absurd to say that Senators Fraser and Sargood are free-traders. I was not in Victoria when the federal elections took place, but I certainly understood that Senator Sargood adopted the Maitland policy.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—This is not that policy.

Senator HIGGS.—The Maitland policy was revenue without destruction, but we have seen Senators Fraser and Sargood helping to destroy revenue and to destroy industries at the same time.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—That is not so.

Senator HIGGS.—I am sorry that Senator Macfarlane did not produce extracts from Senator Sargood's election speeches in which he said he was going to support Mr. Barton.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—Does the honorable senator think that this is relevant?

Senator HIGGS.—After Senator Macfarlane's speech, almost anything might be claimed to be in order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—I am not prepared to allow a discussion of the policy of honorable senators individually.

Senator HIGGS.—These figures have been produced by Senator Macfarlane with a view of influencing our votes, and I am pointing out that it is a mistake to include Senator Sargood and Senator Fraser among the list of free-traders.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—I have allowed the honorable senator to point that out, but I cannot allow him to discuss the policy of honorable senators individually.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator has even classed you, sir, as a free-trader, although I understand that you were supported by two protectionist newspapers. Senator Sargood has certainly given us the impression by the way in which he has voted that he is a free-trader, but his votes have surely been cast under a misapprehension. Throughout the world Victoria has been looked upon as a scientific protectionist State, returning protectionist members, and who dare say that if the voters had known what these honorable senators intended to do, they would have returned them to the Senate? Every one I meet here asserts that if Senator Sargood and Senator Fraser were to seek re-election to-day they would not be returned. You have shown, Mr. Chairman, that you are a protectionist with regard to hops; Senator Symon has shown that he is a protectionist as far as wine and salt are concerned; while Senator Gould is also a protectionist so far as the Tariff relates to tobacco. Senator Macfarlane's remarks have been based upon calculations published in the Argus, which are not altogether well founded. From a cursory examination of this item, I should say that Senator Symon is anxious to secure at the lowest possible rates silk shirts, with which to protect his aristocratic health, and silk socks, with which to clothe his handsome feet. I wish to show that in pressing this request honorable senators of the opposition are not actuated by any desire to help the poor. Are we to help a man who wants to appear in the Senate as Disraeli is said to have appeared in the House of Commons, wearing a waistcoat of woollen and silk, and of fine ornamentation? If that is Senator Symon's desire, I think he should be prepared to pay a duty of 25 per cent.

Senator PULSFORD.—This is tomfoolery.

Senator HIGGS.—We know that Senator Pulsford wants his black silk ties as cheaply as possible. No one would ever accuse him of a desire to put on a vest of the many coloured textures of Joseph's coat, although I should recommend the honorable senator to do so. If he did he would carry a great deal more influence in the Senate. Surely the garments of woollen and silk which come within this item should bear a duty? There is no pioneer prospector in Western Australia—and I appeal to Senator Ewing to support me—who wants a silk shirt. The arguments used in support of cheap wheat, and cheap tinned vegetables and preserved meats will not apply in this case. Honorable senators must see that the poorer classes of the community will have to bear an increased burden if such duties as these are lowered. If lines such as rice are reduced so that the alien may escape taxation, the poorer classes will have to pay a little more towards the cost of government. Every penny that we take off Senator Symon's silk garments, we place upon the poorer classes of tweeds which are used by working men and the ordinary materials used by ordinary housewives.

Senator EWING.—We do not place it on such things. We advocate reductions.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator's party goes for reductions which will throw about half of the working men of the Commonwealth out of employment, and leave them to compete with the other half. I find that there was originally a very strong fight in another place to obtain a reduction of this duty, but the House of Representatives as a whole took a more statesmanlike view of the necessities of the Government and the capacity of the people to bear taxation. By a considerable majority they very wisely decided that the duty should be 25 per cent., and by a considerable majority they also respectfully declined to agree to our request. No honorable senator should be anxious to create trouble between the two Houses. I am sure that those of us who were present while members of the House of Representatives were discussing our requests must have been struck with the sincere and respectful manner with which they considered our proposals. Although, as Senator Sargood has pointed out, the majority was only 22 to 17, those figures do not comprise the number of members of the House of Representatives who actually took part in the vote, because there were very many pairs. When we come to consider the votes that have been recorded, we must remember that this is not the first consideration of the subject. This decision has been arrived at after several months' consideration of the schedule in the first place, and after several hours' earnest discussion of our request in the second. So that honorable senators cannot expect to see the same majority. The proposal made by Senator Symon represents only a difference of 1s. in the £1 as compared with that submitted by the Government. Will any one believe that a citizen of the Commonwealth, like Sir Julian Salomons, for instance, who is the senior barrister in New South Wales, and has an income of about £3,000 a year, will not be able to pay the extra shilling which the acceptance of the Government proposal will require him to pay when he goes into Farmer and Co's. shop to purchase a garment which ordinarily will cost him about 10s.? To bring the matter more clearly home to honorable senators, I shall take the case of Senator Ewing. Would any one say that the honorable and learned senator, who is a kind of Beau Brummel, and indulges in very correct attire, should not be asked to pay the extra cost of these articles if we agree to the proposed duty of 25 per cent.? I have heard no argument to recommend the course proposed by Senator Symon. No one will be benefited by it but those who are doing very well in the Commonwealth at the present time. Out of the 4,000,000 souls in the Commonwealth, I suppose that not more than 100,000 use these silk garments. Let us consider the case of the men who are engaged in the mining industry, and I ask honorable senators, is there one who will benefit by this reduction? Take the case of the shearers and labourers on the stations, compositors engaged in the printing-offices of the city, carpenters, stonemasons, bricklayers, and others, and is there a single man engaged in any of these various trades who will be benefited by the reduction of this duty? The only people who will be benefited will be those who are well able to pay, and honorable senators are annoyed that I should continue in this strain only because they are anxious to protect a class. I say they are wrong. We ought to do justice to the whole community, and endeavour to frame a Tariff which will press as lightly as possible upon those who are least able to pay taxation.

Item 58. Apparel and attire, and articles n.e.i. —not containing wool or silk, partly or wholly made up (not being piece goods), including articles cut into shape and dressed feathers, ad valorem, 25 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 15 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

The first difficulty in the way of carrying out this suggestion is that it will bring about an almost insurmountable difficulty in administration. I think that was admitted, because it was agreed that in every case we should have to inquire whether an article did or did not contain wool or silk. In addition there is the further objection that the reduction of the duty will give no margin of protection in respect of a large class of articles made from material which does not contain wool or silk, and which is dutiable at 15 per cent. I need not refer to all these articles. It is sufficient to refer to a few, such as coatings, vestings, trouserings, not being of wool or silk, flannelettes, velvets, velveteens, plushes, and other materials of that kind. In the case of such materials there will be no protection given to locally made-up articles, because the duty of 15 per cent. upon the imported made-up article is the same as the duty upon the raw material. I understand that Senator Symon is about to make some suggestion to alter that, and I shall have to say something upon the subject when the honorable and learned senator submits his motion. I can only say at present that whatever the modification proposed may be, if it falls short of the 25 per cent. duty it will be quite insufficient for the purpose for which this duty is proposed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I do not wish to deal with the subject at large, but I recognise that the rate of 15 per cent. which is mentioned in our request introduces difficulties of administration. It has been indicated in what way it happens. Of course nobody desires to perpetuate a source of irritation. The recent division leaves the duty on apparel, attire, and articles, whether woollen or silk, or containing wool or silk, at 20 per cent. Our request was that the duty on apparel, attire, and articles not containing wool or silk should be reduced from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent.; but because of the difficulties of administration which have been mentioned, I invite the committee to request that the two lines shall be subjected to the same rate of duty, namely, 20 per cent. In accordance with the suggestion which was made yesterday by the President, and concurred in by the Senate, I move—

That all the words after the word “be” be omitted, with a view to insert the following words:—“modified, by requesting the House of Representatives to amend the item by making the duty 20 per cent.”

Senator O’CONNOR.—I doubt very much whether there is any power in the Senate to make any such request. I do not in any way assent to the right of my honorable and learned friend to move this amendment, but there is no necessity to consider that point, except merely to state what the view of the Government is. On its merits, the proposal is of no value, and for exactly the same reasons which make the reduction of the duty on the other item objectionable, the reduction of the duty on this item is objectionable.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—It is your own original proposal.

Senator O’CONNOR.—Of course it is the original proposal, but does not the honorable senator know that a great many alterations have been made in the Tariff since it was introduced, and that the whole relation of the piece goods to the manufactured articles has been changed? It is absurd to tell me that, because originally the duty on one of these lines was proposed at a particular rate, notwithstanding all the changes which have been made it is to be adhered to. Taking all those materials upon which a duty of 15 per cent. was proposed, I assert that a duty of 20 per cent. is not sufficient. I do not wish to repeat the arguments which have been used. I shall content myself with saying that the amendment, although it might make some difference in regard to administration, supposing it were made, does not remove any of the difficulties or objections which I before urged in regard to the small margin between the duty on the imported material and the duty on the imported made-up article.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that Senator O’Connor has really overlooked the situation. As the Tariff was brought down, apparel, attire, and articles not containing wool or silk, woollen goods, and coatings, vestings, and trouserings were all dutiable at 20 per cent., so that there was no margin at all. I should have thought that my amendment, assuming that we have the power to make this modification, would have been welcomed, because it would get rid of the difficulties of administration. It is a fortunate thing if we have the power to make the modification, because it is one step in the direction of arriving at that settlement, which Senator O’Connor has told us several times this afternoon we have to face in the near future. I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Question—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the motion—put. The committee divided.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS BILL.

Bill received from the House of Representatives, and (on motion by Senator O'CONNOR) read a first time.

Senate adjourned at 10.4 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 27 August, 1902.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

ADJOURNMENT.

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATION.

Sir MALCOLM McE CHARN (Melbourne).—I desire to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the administration of the Customs Act."

Five honorable members having risen in their places,

Question proposed.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — I was under the impression that the questions of which I have given notice would have been answered before I was called upon to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. KINGSTON.—As a matter of convenience, I shall be glad to answer the questions now.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I should be happy to facilitate the business of the House, but I am afraid that I could not permit that to be done, because it would be improper to anticipate answers which should be given at a later period. Perhaps, however, the Minister for Trade and Customs could suggest some way in which the desired end might be attained.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—With the permission of the House, and believing that certain matters are of interest, I should like to make a statement which, although it will not be put in the form of an answer to a question, will at the same time convey information to honorable members. In the first place, I may say that it is not known that any such standard for tea as that prescribed by the Customs Act is adopted by any other Customs authority in any part of the British Empire or in America. It is, however, the standard which has been in force in Queensland for years, and it is also the standard which was recommended last September by the analysts of all the States, and by Mr. Hake, for adoption by the Federal Government. It is also the standard recommended by the Society of Public Analysts of Great Britain, which includes the analysts appointed under the health laws. In one or two details the standard suggested by the public analysts in New South Wales and Tasmania was more severe than that adopted. I received a protest, dated 30th January last, from persons engaged in the tea trade in Victoria, against the adoption of an artificial standard for tea, based upon a chemical analysis. This led to an inquiry, which disclosed what appeared to be a necessity for further action in regard to tea which had been imported. No formal reply was sent to that protest, but the substance of what was being done was mentioned to the head of one of the subscribing firms. Tea has been stopped at various times as being prohibited. Various requests to re-ship were received, but were not acknowledged, pending inquiry, until 4th April, when the matter was referred to the Crown law officers. Summonses have been taken out against certain firms in connexion with tea stopped in January last. The quantities and values of these parcels were probably as has been represented, viz., (a) six half-chests, three chests; (b) ten half-chests; (c) seventeen half-chests, five chests; (d) two half-chests; (e) 42 half-chests; (f) three half-chests; (g) eleven half-chests; and the value would probably be £150, or £200. No doubt a number of the firms who have been proceeded against import tea in very large quantities. I consider that a reasonable time, as required by the Customs Act, was allowed for communicating the tea standard to shippers in India. Upon the question whether we should withdraw the prosecutions instituted, and allow the tea to be re-shipped, we consider that matters of this kind generally require investigation by the courts, and we shall give no promise whatever.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—What time was allowed for notifying shippers of tea in India and the East?

Mr. KINGSTON.—One month from the date on which the Act came into operation.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—It is with great regret that I feel it my duty to move the adjournment, in order to express my dissatisfaction at the action of the Minister for Trade and Customs in regard to the particular cases which have been referred to, and generally in the administration of the Customs Act. I quite recognise the difficulties with which the Minister has had to contend in bringing about a uniformity of customs administration in the six States. I also appreciate the fact that the Minister has been closely engaged in piloting the Tariff through the House, and that Parliament has been in continuous session since May, 1901. Those who are interested in the Customs Act are by no means dissatisfied with the Act itself, and I am not complaining of the stringency of its provisions, but my remarks are entirely directed against the methods of administration. The Minister, with every desire to discharge what is really a giant task, has, to my mind, proceeded upon lines that have proved harassing to merchants, and which cannot possibly assist him in bringing about a satisfactory state of affairs so far as the revenue is concerned. Furthermore, his treatment of the officers of his department has been harassing in the extreme. There is a general feeling of discontent among the members of the staff, and there is certainly the very strongest possible feeling of irritation amongst those outside the department who are interested in customs work. The greatest difficulties are experienced by merchants who transact business with other States. The regulations with reference to entries, and the particulars which have to be supplied with regard to goods which have to be sent from State to State, involve the greatest trouble and inconvenience. I have here a letter from a gentleman who expresses a view which is shared very generally in mercantile circles. He says—

The difficulties in supplying particulars to satisfy the Customs are so great in the Inter-State trade that I have been compelled to notify Tasmanian clients that I must refuse their orders until there is some alteration in the present system of export Inter-State entries. I trust a remedy will come soon.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Does not the honorable member think it would be fairer to confine the debate to the matter referred to in the questions of which he has given notice? How is it possible for me upon a motion of adjournment to discuss the various details of administration in my department?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—I do not propose to deal with more than one or two cases beyond those mentioned in the questions I had placed on the notice-paper. At the same time I did not undertake to limit myself to the matters which are before the House. In the cases referred to in the questions on the notice-paper, I shall be able to show that the Minister did not act even in accordance with the law. There are hundreds and hundreds of cases which might be referred to by myself or by other honorable members, who have been the recipients of numberless complaints. It could be shown that it is impossible to obtain replies to letters addressed to the Customs authorities, and that the state of affairs in the department must be utterly unsatisfactory. If, however, the Minister is not prepared to deal with other matters than those mentioned in my questions, I do not wish to take any unfair advantage of him by extending the scope of my remarks.

I find that in my absence from the Commonwealth the honorable member for Wentworth raised the question of the administration of the Customs Act. He used very forcible language, and it was hoped by the members of the commercial community that results more favorable to merchants would follow from his representations. The Minister communicated with the various chambers of commerce, and he has received replies from them, but the impression that the position of affairs would be improved very soon vanished. The Minister may say that he is bound to administer the Customs in accordance with the law, but I think we can have too much law and too little common sense. It was not intended when the Act was passed that every person who made a mistake, whether with fraudulent intent or not, should be hauled to court. I do not propose to refer to any case in which any question of fraud is involved, but to restrict my remarks to instances in which delays have occurred, and in which insufficient time has been allowed to merchants to convey the necessary advices to shippers when new regulations had been brought into force. The Minister will be upheld by honorable members in prosecuting all persons who may reasonably be suspected of fraudulent intent, but some leniency should be shown in cases where simple errors are made. I think I shall be able to show that the Minister himself did not contemplate that prosecutions should take place in all cases where errors were committed. The Tariff has not yet been adopted by Parliament, and many changes have been made during its discussion. It is only right, therefore, that merchants should be allowed to correct errors in cases where no fraud could possibly be suggested. In connexion with the Customs staff, I am informed that that tried and trusted officer, the Comptroller-General, has been placed in a most undignified position. Notwithstanding all his experience, he has had a minute sent to him directing him not to deal with any case involving a larger sum than £1.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Rubbish!

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—I am very glad to hear that that is not correct. At any rate I am correct in stating that the powers of the officials generally have been curtailed to the extent that the Minister insists upon every matter even of the slightest detail being brought before him.

Under such circumstances, we cannot possibly expect that business will proceed as it would if satisfaction existed amongst the officers of the department. As evidencing the fact that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction amongst the officers, I desire to quote from a speech by the honorable member for Bland, which is reported in Hansard of 3rd July last.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot quote from the Hansard report of the current session.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The substance of the remarks of the honorable member for Bland is that it was about time that the Customs officers organized a union and came out upon strike. He said that the Minister was treating the officers in the Sydney Custom-house in an absolutely outrageous fashion. I can also cite one instance in which I personally brought under the notice of the Minister the fact that a firm with which I am connected, and for which some eighteen or twenty bonds have to be signed in various parts of the Commonwealth, asked that one bond should be substituted. The Minister consulted the Act and thought he would be able to arrange that one bond should suffice for each State. Surely that is a matter which he could have settled without any difficulty or delay. Yet three or four weeks have now elapsed without any definite reply to the request being forthcoming. Instead of deciding questions of this sort himself, I complain that the right honorable gentleman considers it necessary to refer them to the Crown Solicitor. Indeed, every matter apparently goes before that officer. I can also quote another instance in which a merchant wished to pass a sight entry, because his invoices were not to hand, but the Minister evidently had no power to deal even with that trivial matter.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member has got hold of some one who has been "stuffing" him.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—I do not think so. The Minister is like a general who has to face a large engagement, and who, in the midst of the fight, wishes to lead every regiment into action and at the same time to attend to the canteen. I have in my possession numerous letters testifying to the delay which has occurred in replying to correspondence.

These show that sometimes letters remain unanswered for several months. I am sure that the Minister will admit that in all the interviews which I have had with him, I have not shown the slightest desire to hamper him in any way. Whenever I have approached him it has been in the most friendly spirit. In connexion with the prosecution of tea merchants, the small quantities upon which the prosecutions were based—one being as low as two half chests—are worthy of notice. I would further point out that the shipments were made between the 4th November and the 8th December, and none of them arrived here later than 27th December. Some of the tea was condemned on the 31st December, and the balance in January. In some instances, letters were written during January, to which no replies were received until the summonses had been issued. Is that a fair way in which to treat reputable firms who are so largely engaged in this business? Again, a protest was entered against the standard prescribed, but I am informed that no attention was paid to it. At any rate no formal acknowledgment was forthcoming, and no intimation was given that any satisfaction would result in that connexion. But the main point which I desire to make is that a reasonable time, as required by the Act, was not allowed merchants to convey notice of the contents of the regulations to the shippers of tea in distant parts. In this connexion it is necessary for honorable members to recollect the dates. On the 11th October, the regulations were laid upon the table. They were to come into operation upon the 1st November. The first mail which left Melbourne after the 11th October was despatched on the 16th October. The earliest date at which that mail could arrive in Calcutta would be the 10th November. Some of the consignments of tea which have been condemned were shipped upon the 4th November, others on the 9th November, and still others on the 18th November. I do not deny that these regulations were not forwarded to the shippers before the sale of the tea was prohibited. To that extent the merchants are to blame. But I contend that it was unreasonable to give them such a short notice. Three shipments were made on the 18th November, one upon the 30th, another on the 7th December, and still another on the 8th December.

Mr. THOMAS.—Did they ship tea which was not fit for human consumption?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The honorable member will get his opportunity of speaking later on. Upon the 11th July the Minister stated, according to Hansard, page 2445, after I had pointed out the possibility of people being prosecuted without having any knowledge whatever of their responsibilities, that he quite agreed with me that it would be a mistake on the part of the collector to take any proceedings whatever in a case in which there was manifestly an error. Doubtless honorable members will recollect that when the Customs Bill was under consideration, considerable discussion took place regarding the period when the regulations should come into force. The leader of the Opposition pointed out that it was absurd that the regulations should come into operation on the day they were laid upon the table of the House. I moved an amendment providing that 21 days should elapse, on account of the large extent of territory within the Commonwealth and the time which would be occupied in communicating with Thursday Island and other parts of Australia. On that occasion the honorable member for Gippsland said it was monstrous that a person in a distant part of the continent should be liable to penalties for non-compliance with regulations having the force of law before it was possible for him to receive any intimation of their existence. He added—"Surely if we expect people to respect the law, we should make it possible for them to do so." He stated that in several instances he had voted against his better feelings, and that he objected to the action of the Minister on that particular occasion. Again, on page 2746 of Hansard, I find—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to read from Hansard. The standing orders prohibit it, and I cannot allow it.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—If I give the gist of the remarks, I presume I shall be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If I permit the honorable member to hold Hansard in his hand, and to all intents and purposes to quote from it, I cannot refuse to allow any other honorable member to adopt the same course upon a future occasion, and I cannot do that.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—On the occasion in question, the Minister himself stated that he recognised the distances with which we now had to deal, and that that matter would be taken into consideration by him. I contend that it is unjust to bring to the police court, in the arbitrary manner adopted by the Minister, merchants of high repute who imported tea which was shipped in November, when it was utterly impossible for the shippers to be aware of the existence of these regulations. The earliest date upon which the information contained in the regulations could reach the shippers of tea was the 10th November or 12th November, and the bulk of the consignments had been previously shipped. Moreover, these regulations would have to be forwarded to the tea plantations, and their contents would have to become known to tea shippers generally. I consider that I am amply justified in raising the question that they have not been given a reasonable notice. I am aware that time was extended to goods shipped up to the 4th November. But under the Victorian Customs Act the regulations were not to come into force for six months, and when the Minister himself stated that consideration would have to be given to distant territory, surely he ought not to have taken the arbitrary action of which he has been guilty. Further, it is a moot point whether the tea which has been condemned has been rightly condemned. I am under the impression that it has not. Indeed, I received an analysis to-day, and another yesterday, showing that whereas the standard requires that the total aqueous tea extract should be 30 per cent., it actually ranged up to 50 per cent. In one case the total ash is within the limit fixed by the standard, and in the other case it is 8.73 as against 8; and the certificate states that the tea is free from adulteration and really good. These facts will of course be elicited before the court, but I mention them now because I feel that, before placing these merchants in such an invidious position, the Minister ought to have taken extra trouble to obtain outside analysis, in view of the fact that doubts had been expressed, not only by myself, but by others. As I am limited to half-an-hour, I shall not be able to quote statements sent to the Minister by various chambers of commerce.

Mr. KINGSTON. — Does the honorable member not know that inquiries have been made in the case of every complaint?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — Then there is the matter of the stoppage of Inter-State goods. Apart from any question of duty or fraud, a man in the State happened to ship some pills from America which are made up here, and were described as of Victorian manufacture. The total difference made to the revenue of Tasmania was 2s., and yet the whole shipment was stopped.

Mr. KINGSTON. — Any one under the circumstances can get goods by depositing the duty.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — That may be so now, perhaps.

Mr. KINGSTON. — It has been so for months past.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — I believe the goods to which I refer have not yet been released.

Mr. KINGSTON. — That is not my fault.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — There is another matter in which the Minister has acted in an arbitrary manner. Goods carried on deck may have to be jettisoned, and this fact is not known to the merchant. As a rule, the entries are ready as soon as a ship comes in, and although the goods may have been jettisoned the Minister refuses to refund the duty.

Mr. KINGSTON. — I have not had before me a single case in which goods have been jettisoned, and a claim made for a refund.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — I placed the information before the Minister myself. Though all these delays occur, the Minister is prompt enough in catching any one whom he thinks he can bring before the police court. The Socotra is a ship which brought doors ready made up. The Minister, or some one else, heard that this shipment of doors were branded with a crown, and, because of that, assumed them to be prison-made. A statutory declaration was made by the merchants, and information from the Consul-General for the United States was given to the Minister that prison labour was not employed; but these goods were delayed from the 17th until the 25th of June, the Minister, in the meantime, telegraphing to San Francisco in order to ascertain whether or not they were prison-made. Surely the Minister should accept the statutory declaration of responsible people, without troubling to telegraph in a matter of the kind?

Mr. THOMSON. — Is a Crown the mark of prison-made goods in America?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — No; America is not a monarchy. But I do not think that the Minister will gainsay what I have stated. As to seized tobacco, the regulations are so severe that it has really to be destroyed. Those to whom such tobacco has been consigned are desirous that it shall be turned into sheepwash, but under the regulations, vitriol or some liquid of the kind is poured over it, in order to render it absolutely useless. I am told that these regulations were prepared without consulting responsible officers in the Customs department. That may or may not be true, but, at any rate, that is my information.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I must say that the honorable member has been informed of a good many extraordinary things.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—There are a great many cases to which I could refer; but the Minister himself must know the strong feeling of widespread dissatisfaction that exists. Letters are coming to members of this House; but when complaints of the kind are handed over to the Minister in order to prevent the questions being raised in the House, nothing more is heard of them. At any rate, that is my experience, and I think it is the experience of a great many honorable members.

Mr. KINGSTON.—In relation to what?

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The Minister has received from me several letters, to which no replies in any shape or form have been made.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I suppose that the matters have been attended to.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The whole commercial community feel very strongly on this matter, and unless I can see some change in the administration of the Customs department it will be utterly impossible for me to remain a supporter of the Government. I know that the step I contemplate is very important; but I have not arrived at my decision without a considerable amount of thought. So far as my election pledges and my convictions, as expressed on the platform, are concerned, they are unaltered. I shall be loyal to the pledges I have given; but this is a matter of such great interest, not only to merchants, but to their employes, and it affects so nearly the respectability of mercantile men, that I shall feel bound when occasion arises on any motion of want of confidence, to vote against the Government in consequence of the action of the Minister for Trade and Customs. Personally I feel very sorry, indeed, at having to take such a step. This is purely a political matter between the Minister for Trade and Customs and myself. My relations with the other Ministers have been most pleasant, and personally I wish to thank the Acting Prime Minister for the courtesy he has displayed, and the kindly way in which he received me when I told him the course I should be compelled to adopt.

The SPEAKER.—The honorable member's time has expired.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—I am just about to finish. I felt that under the circumstances I should be wanting in my duty to my constituents, and to my own conscience, if I did not take the course I have indicated, and did not express myself as strongly as I have done.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The Government have no objection to the honorable member for Melbourne occupying longer time if he so desires.

The SPEAKER.—If permission be given by the House, the honorable member for Melbourne may, of course, continue.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I shall not make any conditions, but as this is a dispute in regard to shipments of tea——

Mr. CONROY.—The question is the general administration of the department.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The question between myself and the honorable member for Melbourne relates to shipments of tea, and I suggest that the discussion be confined to that question, with which I have come prepared to deal.

The SPEAKER.—I may point out that the notice handed to me by the honorable member for Melbourne shows that the motion for adjournment was moved to consider the administration of the Customs Act, and that, of course, affords a much wider scope than the question mentioned by the Minister for Trade and Customs.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I should like to speak at this stage, because it is only fair that the Minister should have the opportunity of replying to everything that is said with regard to the administration of his department. We ought to deal with the great mercantile community of Australia in the same spirit of justice and equity that we should deal with any other class. I know, of course, that there may be a certain amount of feeling in dealing with those who appear to break the law, and who, from their position, influence, and wealth ought to be the last to commit such offences. But the mercantile community of Australia in the different States and under different Tariffs, have, so far as the great majority are concerned, done their best to uphold the Customs department in carrying out the law.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Hear, hear!

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—If we had not had customs duties of a similar character in the several States, it might have been said that we had to exercise a stringency previously unknown. But there have been very similar customs duties in different States of Australia, and Tariffs have been introduced, and Tariffs have been altered. But I venture to say, from my own experience, that there has never been such an outcry from the mercantile community with regard to the administration of the Customs department in any State, at any time, as that we have heard during the last twelve months.

Mr. WATSON.—It is time there was an alteration in many of the States.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I thank the honorable member; that is the key-note of the feeling now. If any meaning is to be attached to the interjection, and to a certain amount of the administration of the Minister, it is that for years past there has been a secret system by which the Customs have been swindled, and the various States deprived of revenue. There is no burking the question, if the Minister's contention be correct, that by various Treasurers or Ministers of Customs leniency has been shown to wealthy people. Absolutely fraudulent practices have been either overlooked or dealt with by insignificant fines, and the time has now arrived when, in the interests of the Commonwealth, that state of affairs must come to an end.

Mr. HUME Cook.—There have been too many private settlements.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—That is the atmosphere with which we have to deal, and the atmosphere may be so thick that it is impossible to do justice and equity to the mercantile community. But I take it that it is one of the salient or chief maxims of taxation that when we are taking money out of the pockets of the people the administration should be fair, and with as little trouble as possible caused to the people affected. I believe a great deal of the trouble has arisen from a wrong conception, or from what I might more properly describe as a want of the true conception of the position as a matter of administration. I do not want to reflect on the Minister for Trade and Customs. I am sure that, personally, we are the best of friends; but I consider that, in some respects, it is a calamity that his great position, which involves so much that is essential to the best interests of the country at this particular crisis, is not occupied by a man of large mercantile experience, even though that man might not possess half the ability and genius of the right honorable gentleman. Let us look at the position which has faced the Minister. I ask honorable members to consider the position of the different States at the time of the introduction of the uniform Tariff in October last. In one of the States—a State containing 37 per cent. of the population of the whole Commonwealth—there was then in force probably the freest and simplest Tariff in the world. Surely in dealing with a uniform Tariff which had become necessary by reason of the adoption of federation, it was not necessary to consider that half the mercantile community of that free-trade State were rogues? Another reason why the administration of the uniform Tariff has been a matter of great difficulty is this: Previously in at least four of the States—in New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia—the whole of the import trade was centred practically in one port. The administration of the Customs laws of those States was therefore very simple, because you had the Minister and his staff of officers at that port, and decisions of a uniform character were easily obtainable. But the federal Tariff, when introduced, applied to all the ports of Australia, and although no doubt it was necessary to secure uniformity of administration, it was, to my mind, equally necessary to give the fullest power of action to the officials at the head of the department in each port. A third difficulty arose in this way: The Federal duties were collectable immediately upon the announcement of the Tariff in October, but during its subsequent consideration by a committee of this House, alterations were made in it from day to day, and a great many of the errors which have been committed arose, not out of any desire to defraud, but because of the uncertainty created by those alterations. After having been considered in committee, the Tariff was recommitted, for a second consideration, and was again for a period subject to continual alteration. Under all these circumstances the greatest consideration should have been shown to merchants. But, instead of that being done, merchants were brought before the police courts in the various States to answer charges in regard to which the officers of the Customs department did not understand the exact intention of the Legislature. Parliament is also to blame in this matter, because of the bad classification which has been adopted in the Tariff. As the Tariff is arranged, no department can administer it, and no mercantile community can comply with its conditions without committing errors. The Tariff is divided into divisions, and each division is subdivided into items imposing duties upon certain lines; but attached to these items are hundreds of exemptions. Furthermore, in some cases it has happened that while an article is made free if imported for one purpose it is dutiable if imported for other purposes. Under these circumstances it will be only after a great deal of experience of the working of the Tariff that any one will know exactly what is to be done in each case. I do not intend to bring forward a number of specific complaints, but I would point out that dissatisfaction has been created in the case of firms which are above suspicion, and that instead of the administration of the Customs department having been such as would draw the forces of the commercial world to its assistance, the Minister has forced them into a position of antagonism. I am sure that honorable members, whether free-traders or protectionists, desire to see the administration of the Customs department carried on with the utmost smoothness and fairness; and we wish to protect the revenue. I have had some experience in commerce in both Sydney and Melbourne. Years ago there was an association in Victoria, in close touch with the Customs authorities, to prevent fraudulent importers from bringing in goods without the payment of the legal duties. No doubt that association was formed for the protection of honest importers, but I refer to it to show that if the Customs department is fairly and equitably administered, the great bulk of the importing community will assist it in the prevention of fraud, because it is essential to honest commercial dealing that fraudulent importers should not be able to evade the payment of duties to the prejudice of those who respect the law. In that you have a great conservative, and what I might term a police-like, factor. There is in the Customs Act a section which I am surprised was passed by this House, and which provides that the slightest clerical error may be regarded as a fraud. It was explained during the consideration of the measure here that so stringent a provision would not be enforced in cases of pure clerical error, but I am not talking at random when I say that the section has been enforced in hundreds of cases of clerical errors, and that under it men have been dragged before the police courts without rhyme or reason. It may be said that the department must not make a distinction between one firm and another. But in the administration of Customs Acts there must be distinctions. Where a firm has had a clean record for 20 years, its books having always been open to the department, and its employés always ready to assist the officials of the department in the proper administration of the law, consideration should be given to those facts when a clerical error comes to be made. I do not say that any distinction should be made when the perpetration of a fraud is discovered.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The time allowed to the honorable member by the standing order has expired.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—With the permission of honorable members I should like to be allowed another five minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that further time be granted to the honorable member for Wentworth?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear! hear!

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—My remarks have been very scattered because my time has been limited. This is probably the first occasion on which the present Minister has been in charge of what I may call a business department, and I would point out to him that he cannot control such a department upon the same lines as those upon which he might control the Attorney-General's department in South Australia. In no business in the world, whether carried on by the State or by a private individual, can error be avoided, and curiously enough, mere clerical errors often have the appearance of palpable fraud. That being so, the Minister should not have taken up the position which he has adopted. He says, "I am not going to parley with any of these people. Let the law take its course. If they have offended against the law, let them go before the courts of justice." No business in the world could stand that ordeal. I know some of the opinions of the Minister as to what is the right method of administering the Customs department, because I have had opportunities to speak with him on the subject. One of his ideas was that to obtain uniform decisions upon certain matters, it was necessary during the first twelve months that every case should be referred to Melbourne. The right honorable gentleman, not knowing anything of mercantile affairs, did not take cognisance of the fact that mercantile conditions are continually changing, and that under the Commonwealth Tariff, above every other that I have ever known, questions of interpretation must arise continuously. There is no way of administering the department, except under the circumstances, by giving the largest powers to the responsible officials in each State, so that cases may be dealt with immediately, without the necessity for reference to Melbourne. The lack of courtesy in delaying to reply to letters for weeks and weeks has been such as would have broken down any private business. Then, again, all sorts of complaints have arisen in regard to errors made in connexion with Inter-State certificates, where there can be no question of fraud. No doubt the various States Governments are interested to a trifling extent in connection with the Inter-State certificates, but their interest is very small indeed. I admit that every representation which I have made to the Minister has been courteously received, and quickly dealt with, but I wish to mention a glaring case, in which quite opposite treatment has been received. On the 5th June last a certain firm sold to a Queensland firm about 20 boxes of butter which had been imported from New Zealand, and had passed through several hands. Of course, the import duty had been paid; but some mistake was made in connexion with the Inter-State certificate, and on the 20th June a letter was received from the Collector of Customs in Sydney—not in the stand-and-deliver style—but saying that he would "be glad to receive an immediate explanation from you regarding this matter."

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is the form always used.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—On the 23rd June, three days afterwards, the firm wrote a letter explaining the whole case, apologizing for the mistake, and offering to rectify it in any way that might be suggested. To that letter they received no word of reply until the 23rd August—two months later—when, on a Saturday, they received a summons to appear at the police court on the following Wednesday.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — Did the Minister proceed in that case?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — No; I asked him to stay proceedings.

Mr. KINGSTON.—There was too short a time for the preparation of the defence, and, therefore, I consented to the adjournment of the case for a fortnight.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—That is only one case among hundreds. No doubt the honorable member for Melbourne and others in similar positions are able to obtain interviews with the Minister; but there are hundreds of merchants who cannot do so, and who are, therefore, absolutely at the mercy of the officials of the department. The principle upon which the department has acted, and which the Minister has enunciated in this House, is—"Let the law take its course. We are not going to interfere."

Mr. WATSON.—A very good principle.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It is impossible to administer a department like the Customs department in that way.

Mr. KINGSTON. — Would the honorable member have these cases tried in the Minister's office?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I do not want that. But when there has been a palpable error, or where the mistake is in an Inter-State certificate, and could not under any circumstances benefit those responsible for it, surely some reasonable treatment should be given to the offenders. What is the contention in regard to mistakes in Inter-State certificates? It is not that the individuals responsible are committing fraud to benefit themselves, but that, if mistakes are permitted, the States may be mulcted of a certain amount of revenue. Surely in these cases the rigid practice of the department regarding the prosecution of those who commit trifling breaches of the Customs Act should be relaxed. Owing to the alterations which have been made in the Tariff from time to time, and owing also to the want of proper classification of the items, we have created difficulties which have made it almost impossible to prevent errors, and as a matter of common sense and business experience these errors ought not to be dealt with by the department as if they were made with fraudulent intent in every case. On the other hand, every facility should be given to members of the commercial community, nine-tenths of whom wish to facilitate the operations of the Customs department.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I think the thanks of the community are due to the honorable member for Melbourne for bringing forward his motion, because he has demonstrated that those who stated, when the Tariff was under consideration, that the abolition of the tea duty would result in the poisoning of the people were not correct in their prophecy. From the statement now put before us, the public will be able to see that every precaution is still being taken to insure that the grades of tea imported here are of proper quality, and are not likely to inflict any injury upon consumers.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The contention is that the prohibited samples of tea are fit for consumption.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a matter for competent authorities to settle; but I am glad that publicity is to be given to the fact that the Customs Act itself contains the necessary provision in this regard, and that we have a Minister who is not amenable to influence or representation from outsiders, and who is prepared to administer the Act in its integrity. I have stated before that in my opinion the Minister is going rather far with regard to the interpretation of some of the provisions and the multiplication of the various forms with which it is necessary to comply before entries can be passed for the interchange of goods between State and State.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—There is too much red tape.

Mr. WATSON.—That may be so. But so far as the specific charges brought forward to-day are concerned, I desire to give the fullest possible support to the Minister. The experience of New South Wales has been just what might have been expected, because for many years Ministers were allowed to settle in their offices cases arising out of breaches of the Customs Act. We have on various occasions heard rumours regarding successful attempts to defraud the revenue on the part of different firms, who, when their cases were brought to light, were simply asked to make good the deficiency involved, nothing further being heard of the matter. The honorable member for Wentworth said that no doubt those who supported the Minister were of opinion that the large majority of commercial men were given to practices of this kind. I do not, however, say that any large number of the men engaged in commerce in any of the States would descend to anything of the sort, and it is just because I believe that it is the insignificant minority who would be guilty of fraud that I consider it necessary that their proceedings should always be brought into the light of day, and that the Minister should be placed above any influences that might help them to get the better of their competitors in trade. The honorable member for Wentworth must remember one case which occurred in New South Wales, in which it was shown that a brewing firm had for years defrauded the excise branch of the Customs department of thousands of pounds. That fraud was discovered through information given by a discharged employé. The case was settled by the Minister, and the public did not know until years afterwards—certainly it was months afterwards—that the firm concerned had committed any fraud, or had been allowed to settle their case on the payment of the amount of which the revenue had been defrauded. The honorable member for West Sydney, who was then a member of the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, brought the matter up in that Chamber, and it was proved beyond doubt that the persons concerned should have been in gaol; but because of the system which had grown up under which Ministers continually settled cases of this kind, without reference to the courts, the offenders escaped on the mere restitution—which any common thief would be glad to make—of the money of which they had defrauded the State. So long as any Minister agrees to consider these cases in camera, so long will such abuses be possible. I do not care how virtuous a Minister may be; it is impossible for him not to make mistakes occasionally against the interests of the public.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The honorable member is dealing with matters of fraud. I was referring to an entirely different class of case.

Mr. WATSON.—It is extremely difficult for a non-judicial person to decide whether merely pure inadvertence or direct fraud is involved in a mistake, and all such questions should be decided by a magistrate or judge in open court, in the full view of the public, and under circumstances in which every consideration can be given, and the person prosecuted may get his deserts.

Mr. CONROY.—The Act prevents magistrates from deciding upon what they regard as the merits of the case.

Mr. WATSON.—That is an argument for an alteration of the law. I believe that some justification has been shown for such an alteration, and I should be quite prepared to support a proposal in that direction. After having assisted to pass the Customs Act, we have no right to shunt all the responsibility on to the Minister.

Mr. THOMSON.—But what assurances were given?

Mr. WATSON.—That the law would be carried out. In cases where it is shown that the mistake made was due to mere inadvertence, the magistrate should have power to either dismiss the information, to inflict a nominal fine, or to find that the mistake was the result of inadvertence. It would, however, be dangerous to give the Minister this discretion.

Mr. CONROY.—That is left to the Minister now.

Mr. WATSON.—I understand the charge against the Minister is that he does not use any discretion, but forces all cases into court.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Does the honorable member know that the Customs officials refuse to tell those who desire to pass entries whether an article is dutiable or not?

Mr. KINGSTON.—When we are told what is in a package, we say whether it is dutiable or not.

Mr. WATSON.—I know that a certain amount of justifiable dissatisfaction exists in Sydney with regard to the details which are asked for, and the method in which they have to be supplied, and I have not been slow to condemn the Minister for the complicated method in which he is working the department, but that is altogether apart from the question raised by the honorable member for Melbourne. The honorable member's quotation from my remarks on a former occasion were also inappropriate to the matter in hand. I was then referring to the fact that the Minister was sweating the employés in the Sydney Custom-house by compelling the members of the clerical and outside staffs to work overtime without remuneration, and at a pressure which was not conducive to good work. That matter was totally distinct from that now raised by the honorable member for Melbourne.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—The honorable member contended that the Minister was treating the officials outrageously.

Mr. WATSON.—But that had no reference to merchants being proceeded against for erroneous entries. The complaint made by the honorable member is that the Minister has refused to settle certain cases out of court.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Where no fraud is involved.

Mr. WATSON.—In my view it would be most unwise to allow any Minister to be the judge as to whether mistakes were made by inadvertence or design. I trust that whilst the Minister may see his way clear to relax some of the regulations which undoubtedly hamper commercial men, particularly in regard to Inter-State exchanges, I hope that he will allow no criticism, such as has just been levelled at him, to induce him to deviate for one moment from the straight course of insisting that all cases of error, whether intentional or not, shall be sent to the public courts for judgment as to whether they are venial offences or otherwise.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—I should like to know whether the honorable member for Bland, who applies such a rigid code to the Customs Act, would also be willing to apply it to every department of the Commonwealth, or the State—say, for instance, to the administration of the income tax or the land tax?

Mr. WATSON.—I would.

Mr. THOMSON.—Then we should never have our law courts empty. They would flourish, and the development of the country would be arrested.

Mr. WATSON.—I could mention a good many cases of fraud in connexion with the land tax.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am quite aware that frauds are committed under the land tax, and also under the Customs Act, and I should be the last to excuse such offences against the law, or to prevent the most drastic steps being taken regarding them. If, however, every case of error, even though manifestly free from fraudulent intent, is to be taken into court, we shall work untold injury to our great trading and industrial institutions. I know nothing about the cases mentioned by the honorable member for Melbourne, and I shall not express any opinion regarding them. I know from experience that it is very dangerous to take proceedings upon the extract strength of tea analyses. If, however, tea is not according to standard, proceedings should be taken against the importers unless there are some circumstances, such as have been mentioned by the honorable member for Melbourne, which ought to relieve them from responsibility at this early stage of the administration of the new regulations. I wish to confine my remarks to the administration of the Customs department. To me that administration appears to be defective from several causes. First, it is defective because of the provisions contained in our Constitution relating to the bookkeeping system between the different States—for which the Minister is not responsible—and the necessity which consequently exists for the supply of the most trivial particulars in connexion with Inter-State transactions. Those provisions must create difficulty and leave a great opening for error. Then we have the Tariff itself, for the framing of which the Minister is, to some extent, blameworthy. Time after time it was pointed out to him that the line of demarcation between the scheduled items was not sufficiently distinct, and that difficulties would therefore be created in interpretation and administration. Further, we have enacted such peculiar provisions in regard to the collection of duties, that, in particular instances, I defy any honorable member, even after the most elaborate research, to determine what duty should be paid. In some cases—as was pointed out by the acting leader of the Opposition—the duty chargeable upon certain articles depends upon the use to which they are to be put. Let us take wheels for trucks as an example. A man may import 100 of these. If they are used in connexion with coal skips they are not dutiable, but if they are used for other mining purposes they are dutiable. How can an importer determine the use to which they are to be put? He imports them for sale. Can anyone decide under what duty those goods should be entered? Who can say what is the ultimate use to which they will be put? The importer may sell some which will be used for one purpose, and others which will be used for another. That is merely an illustration of the difficulty which exists, and which is equally applicable to a good many items on the Tariff. In every instance I objected to the duty chargeable upon any article being made dependent upon the use to which it was to be put.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to discuss the Tariff.

Mr. THOMSON.—I am merely pointing out that the peculiar way in which the Tariff has been framed is responsible for some of the difficulties which are experienced in its administration. I have a great deal of sympathy with the Minister. He has told us that he accepted his present office without having had the benefit of any previous experience.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not hesitate to say that the honorable member has always shown his sympathy.

Mr. THOMSON.—I have tried to do so, and the Minister has extended every courtesy to me, so much so that if this matter had not been brought up, and I had not felt in duty bound to voice the numerous representations which have been made to me, I should not have raised it at the present time. I should have been content to remain silent in the hope that the Customs administration would improve, and that complaints would be prevented. But at the present time it appears to me there is infinitely too much delay in obtaining decisions. If the business of Australia is to be effectively carried on—and it is to the interest of every one that it should be—prompt decisions must be given. But we cannot have promptitude in decisions if matters have to be referred from the uttermost ends of Australia to Melbourne, and although the Minister hopes that some day these references will cease, they have not ceased up to the present, and have been the means of creating enormous dissatisfaction. Then again the right honorable gentleman takes so much work upon himself that he cannot possibly deal with it. I might mention one case in which only a decision was asked for. The importer was ready to pay the duty immediately that decision was given, but it took five or six months to obtain it. I say that the Minister cannot successfully undertake all the work which he attempts to perform. Moreover his action involves the degradation of his high officers in the other States, who with their large experience, ought to be prepared to give decisions upon matters which are brought under their notice. It is highly desirable—even if in some cases errors may at first be committed—that prompt decisions should be available rather than that trade should be dislocated, and goods detained whilst a reference is being made to the central authority in Melbourne. Regarding the prosecutions which have taken place, I am sure that no one desires any back-door settlement of fraudulent cases. When the drastic provisions in the Customs Act were under consideration, objection was taken to them. What was the reply given? It was stated that it was necessary to have very drastic provisions in a Customs Act. So it is; but it was intended that the powers conferred by those provisions should be exercised with discretion. My complaint is that no discretion is being exercised. The Minister regards everybody with a strong suspicion. He even regards himself with suspicion, fearing that he may be led away by some chance circumstance, some friendship, some belief in honesty to do wrong when he ought to do right. Consequently he says to the importers, "Go to the courts." What does that mean? It means the reverse of what is involved in any ordinary appeal to the courts, because under the English law a man is presumed to be innocent until he has been proved guilty; but under the law that the right honorable gentleman administers, he is presumed to be guilty until he has established his innocence. Even after he has proved his innocence he is liable to a fine, and to the reflection upon his good name which the fine involves, because very often people do not distinguish between a penalty imposed for guilt or merely on account of error. The prosecution of a man in South Australia the other day in connexion with the importation of a small quantity of mustard oil seems to me a most astounding one. Why should such a case go into court? The value of the whole of the goods was only 2s. 8d. In that case the goods were declared on the package to have been manufactured by prison labour. The person who imported them for his own use knew nothing about that. The goods, of course, should be forfeited, but why should he be dragged into court, and his good name affected, because of such a simple error? In conclusion, I desire to point out the complaint of the Sydney Chamber of Commerce in connexion with Customs administration, as expressed by the president. I think that honorable members will consider that the address of the president of that chamber, in alluding to these matters, is essentially well balanced. He speaks in most kindly tones of the Minister, which is evidence that credit is given where it is due. He says—

I say unhesitatingly that if the electors throughout the Commonwealth had had the faintest suspicion that intercolonial free-trade could possibly involve business in such utter chaos, federation would have been rejected by every State. We find but little fault with the Customs Act itself. It is clear, concise, and comprehensive, and reflects great credit on the draughtsman. It is recognised that laws relating to taxation should include stringent provisions and penalties for the prevention and punishment of fraud, and the commercial community are equally interested with the Government in the prompt detection and punishment of any fraudulent practices on the revenue. It is not the law, but its administration, that is agitating the minds of the people in this State, and I am sure if the Minister were only aware of the strained feeling of disappointment with the administration he would more fully appreciate the continued appeal of a commercial community for more reasonable treatment, not in their interests only, but also in the interests of the good name and reputation of the Government. A continuance of the present policy cannot possibly be attended with any beneficial results, and can only tend to alienate the sympathies of an important section of the community, to whose enterprise and industry Australia owes no small share of its prosperity. Whilst fully appreciating and recognising the high motives which appear to be guiding the Minister for Trade and Customs in his strict interpretation and severe administration of the law, it is felt that had he been familiar with the practical side of the question, less friction and misunderstanding would have resulted, and less necessity for legal procedure. Whilst the law affords the administration wide and arbitrary powers, which are wise and necessary when special occasion arises, it was never contemplated by the Legislature that they were intended to comprehend by punishments and penalties the pardonable errors and omissions which, in spite of all human care and provision, are inevitable. Hitherto, in British communities at least, an absolute interpretation of the law, according to its strict letter, has been reserved to the courts, whilst the principles of equity have guided the practice in administration. It is obvious that the law cannot provide for every possible contingency, any more than it can be said that its provisions are each capable of literal interpretation and enforcement. To presume so, suggests a perfection in law-makers which has no existence in fact. It is surely therefore not unreasonable to ask and expect that equity should guide the hand of administration, so that the law may be construed, not according to the strict letter, but rather in a reasonable and just spirit, with due regard to the individual, as well as to the Commonwealth. The constant prosecutions for isolated, and very often trifling, errors and omissions in entries and declarations; the discredit attaching to firms whose names have never previously been before the court; the anxieties and fears of importers, agents, and employes, have reached such a pitch of tension as almost to provoke the errors which the means adopted are supposed to remedy. The trading community generally desire to observe all the proper demands of the department which the law provides, and they also desire that when there is evidence of gross carelessness or intentional evasion, due punishment should follow, but they earnestly and strongly protest against the present unnecessary severity in administration for which, so far as they are aware, there is no justification or precedent. It is with a sincere desire to aid the Minister that I thus publicly refer to the true cause of much of the present discontent, and I venture to hope that my remarks may be accepted in the spirit that prompts them, and be the means of inducing the Minister to somewhat relax his present harsh and cruel system of administration, and so relieve us of a position which has become utterly intolerable.

It is in that spirit, and that spirit only, that I approach this matter, and I say that if the Minister will allow that common sense which he usually exercises to guide him in the administration of our customs law, he will benefit not only the people of Australia, but the whole of the mercantile community.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—Whilst I agree with the motion submitted, I cannot say that I support it upon the grounds which have been urged by the honorable member for Melbourne. Until he recants his former views, I hope that he will not cross over to the opposition side of the chamber. We do not want him until his ideas undergo a change.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—The Opposition will not get me upon those terms.

Mr. CONROY.—When the honorable member referred to the lack of sound administration in the department, I was in thorough accord with him. It was really alarming to hear the Minister cheered on the Government side of the House, as if it was thought he had to send on to the court in every case. The Minister need not and does not do so in every case, but has the power to determine the course to be taken. So far back as 16th July last year I drew attention to the stringency of the provisions of the Customs Bill, which was then before the House. I knew the bungle the Minister would make, having in a short time summed up his character. I objected to this power being bestowed, and said that if the administration were intrusted to the Minister's hands there would bound to be confusion in the mercantile world. Trouble must arise when the Minister is a legal man without requisite commercial knowledge, or that large acquaintance of the world which the study of outside affairs alone can give; and I do not suppose there is a man either inside or outside the House who would undertake to say that the administration has been successful. Under the Customs Act in its present form, it does not matter how innocent an error may have been, a man who is brought before the court must be convicted, and if there be two such convictions, a third offence, however inadvertently committed, may be punished with imprisonment for not less than six months, or more than two years. It is not left within the power of the magistrate or the judge, even in the case of the most trivial offence, to decide that no penalty shall be inflicted. On the 16th July last year I asked whether, in the case of mere error or inadvertence, the Minister had power to stop any action, and the Minister replied in the affirmative. That is the correct view, and it is possible that power may have been exercised so seldom, in the case of innocent men at least, that it is not worth mentioning. On the same occasion the Minister said that there was no compulsion to sue any one, and that no one would be sued unless it was felt that such a course ought to be taken. The Minister will not try to decide these matters as an administrator. He is perpetually troubling himself with petty details which entail on himself extremely hard work, without producing any good result. If the town clerk of Melbourne, who is paid about £2,000 a year for looking after the administration of the interests of the citizens, were to occupy himself in removing orange-peel from the pavements, he would be in a position exactly analogous to that taken up by the Minister for Trade and Customs. The details occupy him so much that there is no time to deal with large matters, and the result is a state of affairs which has caused complaint in every part of Australia. From Brisbane the other day a man, through his solicitors, forwarded £120 to the Customs department, and it is perfectly easy to see, on reading between the lines, that that man was one who had gained some advantage in consequence of a slight error in the entries, but an error which, in consequence of the character of the administration, he was afraid to acknowledge. Some five months ago a merchant in Sydney made a small error of the kind, and though he would have been perfectly willing to pay the duty, he was advised by his solicitor to say nothing about the matter, or otherwise he would be convicted. I was consulted, and I informed the man's solicitor that my opinions could be found in my speeches of five or six months previously, and that I must decline now to advise in the case. Every one will agree with the Minister in endeavouring to prevent fraud, but his administration is certainly responsible for the present position. I wonder the honorable member for Melbourne brought the question forward, seeing that large importers rather like these hindrances, which are too expensive for smaller men to bear, but that is probably the reason why the Minister imposes these disabilities, as they wipe out the smaller men, and lessen competition. But consequences of that kind would do a great wrong to the great bulk of the traders who carry on their business legitimately. The administration all through has been a disgrace to a civilized community. As to tea, it is clear that the Minister, with his remarkable knowledge of chemistry is going to tell us that the stoppage is in the interests of the public health—that the tea is the sweepings of the gutter, and that he deserves credit for preventing its distribution. If the tea is really bad, there is no credit in stopping it, though discredit would attach to the Minister if he did not stop it according to law. I do not think that the Minister is able to give us the information, but we might as well at this juncture recognise exactly what tea is. It is one of the commonest and hardiest of plants, which will flourish in any temperate climate. Tea will grow in England and is grown in Australia, the common camellia which we see growing in the open air being a plant of the same order. The Minister ought, I think, to give us some information about tea, in relation to the alkaloid theine, and also to the tannin in it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question is the administration of the Customs Act.

Mr. CONROY.—I hope the Minister will give us that information for the benefit of the people. But the Minister's time is taken too much up in dealing with the dismissal and appointment of message boys that he has no opportunity for dealing with trade matters involving thousands and thousands of pounds. While I do not welcome to this side the honorable member for Melbourne, until he is prepared to embrace our ideas, I am glad that even outsiders are beginning to recognise that the administration of the department is bad. I do not think I shall actively support the motion for the adjournment of the House; my inclination is to walk out rather than vote.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—Instead of condemnation being heaped on the honorable member for Melbourne, he ought to be praised for bringing this question up; and I hope the discussion will cause the Minister for Trade and Customs to discontinue, if it be possible, dragging insignificant cases into court. If I were not well acquainted with the Minister, as an old supporter, and if I did not know him to be a sterling, honest man, I should believe that this was a case of one lawyer making litigation for a lot of his brethren out of work. But I do not believe anything of the kind, and I am sorry the honorable member for Werriwa has introduced personal matters into the discussion. We do not want to have personal matters introduced into this Chamber. We are here to represent the people, and to defend their interests, and while it may be necessary to condemn a policy, I do not think we should deal personally with the individual responsible for it. The acting leader of the Opposition said that the Minister for Trade and Customs ought to be a commercial man, but I do not think that that statement will bear investigation. The Judges in our courts are not men with commercial experience, but great commercial cases are decided by them.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—They do not deal with matters of administration.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—They have power to send those appearing before them to gaol if need be.

Mr. CONROY.—They deal with the cases brought before them on the evidence submitted.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—In the same way, the cases arising out of the administration of the Customs department must be dealt with upon the evidence submitted. The Minister should weigh this evidence carefully, and consider whether a wrongful act was done for the purpose of defrauding the revenue. He should remember that the mistake may be due to the fault of a clerk, and all the circumstances surrounding the case should be fully considered. But honest merchants should be thankful when unscrupulous and dishonest traders are punished, and should be ready to help the Minister to brand as dishonest those who attempt to defraud the revenue.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—That has always been the case.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I do not like to hear of people being dragged into the courts unnecessarily for what are merely mistakes. Mistakes are constantly being made in mercantile dealings, but one man writes to another to call on him, and they are rectified in a few minutes. The curse of every British community is that people think that crime will be prevented by dragging persons into court, and imprisoning, branding, or hanging them. Nothing of the sort. Terrible punishments never prevent crime.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—I recognise the generous tone of the debate, and I am not disposed to take exception to the observations of the honorable member for Melbourne, who, believing that he had a right to protest, has protested in what he considers to be the most effectual and proper way. I trust that further consideration will lead him to the conclusion that his protest was, perhaps, under the circumstances, a little extreme; but I may assure him that, as he has the satisfaction of knowing that he has done what he believes to be right, we are animated by the same feeling, and have come to the same conclusion. We think that the private settlement in the Minister's office of cases of the kind to which reference has been made this afternoon, is highly undesirable. I do not hesitate to say, from my knowledge of the records of Victoria, officially acquired, that the system of private settlement which existed here, but nowhere else, though adopted for a good purpose, was pushed to an extreme, and should not be revived. The opinion of the House in this matter was well indicated when we were dealing with the Customs Bill. Honorable members then showed that they desired nothing of the sort, and that private inquiries are abhorrent to them. If a breach of the law for which a penalty should be exacted has been committed, let that penalty be exacted in the light of day. Let it be known why those who have offended are to be penalized. Let the case be made public, so that every one may know all the circumstances connected with it, instead of having a vague paragraph in a corner of a newspaper which may mean this, that, or the other thing. Why should a practice be conceded to the mercantile community which is not extended to the members of any other section who offend against the law? I am sure that there is a general feeling that a return to any system such as I refer to should not be permitted, and we are doing what we can to give effect to what we believe is the wish of Parliament in this matter, and accords with the sense of justice in the community.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Would not the Minister permit a Customs official to allow the rectification of a clerical error?

Mr. KINGSTON.—We are not laying down the rule that persons must be prosecuted and penalized for the smallest clerical error, such as might take place in an arithmetical calculation; but in collecting duties, as I have stated in communications with chambers of commerce and other bodies interested, we have a right to know from the importers what is the nature of the goods they are importing, and what is the value of those goods. As a general rule, where that information is stated honestly, there is an indication of an honest intention, and with proper vigilance on the part of the Customs officials neither the honest merchants nor the revenue will suffer, even if there be slight mistakes, which do not amount to a false declaration, in reply to either of the questions I have named. Our wish in this matter is to obtain the security of the revenue, so that the Government may get what it ought to get. It would be monstrous if, when the States and the Commonwealth have some difficulty in procuring the revenue necessary to make ends meet—I am speaking figuratively—those who owe money to the Government should by various means escape the payment of it, and that therefore additional taxation must be exacted from those who already have sufficient to bear, or retrenchment practised in connexion with the public service and in other directions. We should make our debtors pay the money they owe us before placing additional burdens upon the taxpayers. I have the assurance from my officers that the revenue is coming in very well indeed under existing circumstances. I may be taking to the department credit which does not belong to it when I say that the exactitude with which the Customs laws have been administered has led to that state of affairs in no small degree, but I believe it to be so, and that hundreds and thousands of pounds are now being received which otherwise would not have been obtained. That fact may explain, to a considerable extent, the large returns which we are getting from a Tariff whose duties have been considerably reduced, even to exemption, during their consideration by this Chamber. I acknowledge the valuable assistance which I have received from the representatives of the commercial community. Reference has been made to chambers of commerce, and I am happy to think that my relations with them have been so satisfactory. We believe in administering the law, so that the honest traders, who constitute the great majority of the commercial community, will be protected against the unscrupulous minority, who have recourse to little frauds which, when they are bowled out, they try to excuse as mere clerical errors. It is to the interests of the revenue, in justice to the taxpayer, and the whole community, and for the protection of the great majority of our traders, that the law should be stringently administered. We welcome a debate of this sort. We have taken any amount of trouble in connexion with the administration of the department. I do not think any one will say that any one of the Ministers has in the slightest degree shrunk from the work entailed upon him by the duties of his office. If there is one thing which has pleased me recently, it is the opinion of the Board of Customs in England upon the Customs Act which was passed by this Parliament last year. The Board speak of that Act in the highest terms, and I am delighted that my department was able to contribute to its successful enactment. Having a measure which is so highly praised by such a high authority, we should spare no pains to secure its best administration. We wish to bring about justice of the most even-handed description, and to assist honest traders in every way possible. The difficulties which at present exist are no doubt of the most troublesome character, but we are getting over them, and I hope that shortly we shall successfully surmount them all. I have not hesitated, although I knew that I might expect rather sharp replies from some quarters, to place myself in direct communication with chambers of commerce, chambers of manufactures, and other commercial representative bodies, for the purpose of exchanging views upon the subject of administration. I have asked these bodies—"What have you to complain of? What have you to suggest?" so that I may look into their suggestions most carefully, and, where necessary, apply what remedies are possible.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Has the right honorable gentleman learnt anything?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I hope so. I am disposed to think that I know a great deal more about Customs matters now than I knew two years ago. I should be sorry if it were not so. I am only too ready to drink deeply at the well of commercial truth and knowledge, and to use the information I obtain for the benefit of the public and to the advantage of the department over which I have the honour to preside. I have received a number of replies, but I have not had time to go through them all. I know what hard work is. I have never shirked it, but I have never had harder labour to perform than during the past eighteen months.

Mr. WILKS.—The right honorable gentleman deserves it. Some people think he should get ten years' hard labour.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am only too glad to have the opportunity to perform this work, and I hope that the result may be for the good of all. It was a trouble to pilot a Tariff through a State House. I sat beside Senator Playford when he piloted a Tariff through the South Australian Parliament, and I thought it hard work. But we have had to deal, not only with a uniform Tariff affecting all the States, but to pass in addition the Customs Act, which has been so highly spoken of, and other machinery Bills, such as those dealing with beer excise, distillation, and excise generally, and also to frame regulations. Some of my officers, I think, were not sorry when the work which had to be done in connexion with the machinery measures ceased. It imposed upon them a strain which I regretted, but which was absolutely unavoidable. But what is the position to-day? One of the most distinguished public servants in Victoria—the Comptroller of Customs—has been told by his medical adviser that it is absolutely necessary, on account of the mental strain to which he has been subjected, to ask for a lengthy period of leave. I have gladly granted him that leave, but I regret the circumstances which have made it necessary. The Victorian Collector, who for a time took his place, had to retire to a sick bed, from which, I am glad to say, he is at last able to rise. Two other officers under me have been almost similarly afflicted. Honorable members complain of delays because this and that little note has not been promptly answered, but all our time has been required for the performance of more substantial and necessary work. I venture to think that those who complain are a little exacting. I do not hesitate to tell honorable members that I could not have done what I am doing now if my health had not been better this year than it was last. When I have seen my officers, those who were my right hand, as it were, dropping round me, I have sometimes wondered when my turn would come; but until my time does come, I shall do the work which I am given an opportunity to do. I was really interested to hear some of the extraordinary charges brought against me, and I intend, in due course, to demolish the whole of the complaints. Regarding what was said by my friend the honorable member for Melbourne—we are still friends, although there has been a difference of opinion between us—to the effect that I had laid down the rule, that Dr. Wollaston should deal with no matter involving an amount of more than £1, all I need say is, that the idea is preposterous, and that I never dreamt of doing anything of the sort.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—I said that it was stated that the Minister had done so.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Exactly, and I want to know where these statements come from. That is why I want the Chambers of Commerce to give me particulars of the charges and complaints which they have to make against me. Amongst other things, they said that I directed that passengers' effects were not to be allowed to enter free of duty on any account.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—I did not mention that.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; but the statement was contained in an official letter, and was in direct contradiction to a circular which was issued long ago. However, I shall deal with the Chambers of Commerce direct by letter. The honorable member for Melbourne also stated that I would not permit a sight entry to be passed without my direction. If that were so, I should be an abominable tyrant. It is said that I am an autocrat and a despot, and I have had many other similar names applied to me, but there is no truth in the statement to which I have referred. The Act provides that—

If the owner cannot immediately supply the full particulars for making an entry, and shall make a declaration to that effect before the collector, he may make a sight entry.

That is a provision within the four corners of the Act, and beyond that it is not necessary for me to go. The honorable member for Melbourne has also made a statement with regard to a little matter which has happened between us. He asked me to consolidate certain bonds. We had not been in the habit of consolidating bonds throughout the whole of the States, nor did we think it would be a good thing to do so as regards the whole of the Commonwealth. But what I assented to was that the bonds, as regards each particular State, should be consolidated, and the matter has gone on to the Crown Solicitor, in order that he may see that the bond is in proper form. What could I do more than that? Am I to draft these legal documents—am I to settle them myself?

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—The Minister is fond of doing so.

Mr. KINGSTON.—So I am, and it is a pity that I have not time to do so to a greater extent. Is it, however, right that I should be impeached after having agreed to the honorable member's request, and sent the papers through the proper channel for settlement? I recognise the difficulties of interpretation, and the inconvenience which often arises through the necessity for reference to head-quarters. But this is the way in which I look at the matter. Would honorable members prefer to have a uniform Tariff uniformly administered, or a uniform Tariff administered at the sweet will and pleasure of the various Collectors of Customs in all the States? A uniform Tariff would not be worth sixpence, unless it were uniformly administered. The most serious charge made against me is that in some cases one rule is being applied in Victoria, and another in New South Wales—and when that happens, I blush. The only way of obviating this is to make the collectors report to me for the purpose of obtaining a decision that will enable a uniform practice to be followed. It is not desirable that we should go on in a miserable happy-go-lucky style, because unless the Tariff is uniformly administered it will not be worth the paper it is written on. At this moment we have in course of preparation—and hope that it will be completed simultaneously with the passing of the Tariff—a Tariff Guide, in which all the articles we can think of will be mentioned and classified alphabetically, so that they may be referred to without the slightest difficulty. Against each of these articles there will be an official interpretation as to the heading of the Tariff to which it belongs, and the duty payable upon it. I believe that we shall do well to issue a work of this kind, and when we do so, I hope that all the grumbling will disappear and that one wave of exultation will pass over the commercial community. I hope that this Guide will enable merchants to easily comply with the regulations to which they have hitherto found it difficult to conform. The book will be a handy and very desirable supplement to the legislation to which this House has devoted so many long days during this year and a portion of last year. A great deal has been said with reference to tea. I like tea, and I like to have it pure, and the public have a right to pure and good tea. In view of the provisions contained in the Act regarding the importation of tea, I should not be worthy of my position if I failed to strictly administer the law, and to haul before the courts those who infringe upon the right of the public to have good tea, and not Indian mud, charged for as if it were tea. I found some little time ago that different systems of administration were adopted in the various States in regard to tea—that one expert would pass tea as all right, whilst the expert in another State would reverse his decision. This was not satisfactory, and such a condition of affairs could not be allowed to exist in a united Australia. One flag, one tea standard. On the 26th September, I wrote a memorandum—I was, apparently, annoyed at the time—as follows:—

These constant variations between State experts are alarming and distressing.

(a) Let all the papers from Queensland be obtained at once. Wire for them.

(b) Let the opinion of Mr. Hake be obtained.

Mr. Kingston.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Is Mr. Hake the expert of the department?

Mr. KINGSTON.—He has advised, and he is a very good expert, too. I wrote further—

(c) I wish to know both from Mr. Blackett and Mr. Hake if the presence of iron is altogether consistent with non-adulteration, or what it suggests.

(d) Report to me after obtaining opinions of State experts as to what standard for tea should be prescribed in customs regulations.

I asked the Comptroller of Customs, after consultation with the experts, to report to me as to what should be the standard for tea. I found, amongst other things, that the standard for tea, which was afterwards prescribed under the Act, had been in force in Queensland for seven or eight years.

Mr. CONROY.—That does not make it right.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; but there is a good deal of evidence in its favour. The regulation reads as follows—

No teas imported into Queensland will be allowed to go into consumption which contain less than 30 per cent. of extract, 3 per cent. of soluble ash, calculated on the dry tea, 212° Fahrenheit, or more than 8 per cent. of total ash.

All the experts of Australia united in recommending the present standard, or something a little higher, and we adopted it on the recommendation of Mr. Blackett and of Mr. Hake.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Will the Minister give us the figures for the “extract”?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not wish to debate the matter too closely. There is a case before the court now, and I am rather sorry that I should have been called upon to discuss this matter before it has been dealt with judicially. All I desire to do is to describe the circumstances that led us to adopt the present standard. It is lower than that which the Tasmanian and Western Australian experts suggested, and the circumstance which turned the scale and removed any doubt that I might have had in my mind was the fact that it was recommended by the British Society of Analysts, which includes amongst its members the official analysts to the health authorities of Great Britain. We took every trouble to arrive at a fair conclusion, and there was no alteration suggested until we stopped some tea from passing into consumption. Then those who were interested in the tea began to make complaints. They wrote to me—not directly, but through a meeting—with the evident intention of bringing about a stoppage of the proceedings.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Was that in Victoria?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes. The meeting was held in Victoria.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—No proceedings had been taken in Victoria at that time.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I wrote a memorandum as follows :—

Have the provisions of section 54 been complied with? I wish a return of all the cases showing dates of shipment and of analysis, also results, and particularly if declared unwholesome, or unfit for human use, exhausted, or adulterated.

I was away from Melbourne shortly after this time; but the return was furnished, and when I read it I was angry, although I venture to consider that I retained full power to enable me to arrive at a judicial conclusion as to what should be done. I am not going to read the names of those concerned, but I intend to read some of the official reports which attracted my attention; they include cases besides those now under prosecution. Honorable members are aware that in this connexion the Act prescribes the process which shall be adopted. When tea is imported it is examined by the Customs tea expert. If he is dissatisfied with its quality, he sends it on to the analyst for report. I will read to honorable members some of the reports by the expert and others by the analyst. The first is one by the expert, who gives the following as his reason for sending the tea in question to the analyst—“Being mixed with substances other than tea.” In reference to this case the analyst reports—“Total ash exceeds 8 per cent. Unfit for human use according to regulation, section 54.” In the case of the second consignment, the reports from both the expert and the analyst are identical with those which I have just read. In the third instance, the reason given by the expert is “Decay having set in,” and the report of the analyst reads—“Contains rotten and decayed leaves. Complies with regulation, section 54.” Concerning the fourth case, the expert’s report is—“Being mixed with substances other than tea,” and the analyst states—“Exhausted tea, total ash, 8·12 per cent.; insoluble ash, 4·48 per cent.; soluble ash, 3·64 per cent.; extract ash, 41·10 per cent. Does not comply with standard under regulation, section 54, and therefore unfit for human use.” In regard to another consignment, the report of the expert is—“Rotten and decayed leaf.” Concerning this case, the report of the analyst is—“Exhausted tea, not fit for human food. It contains old and decayed leaf, nauseous, and without aroma.” In another case the expert reports—“Rotten and decayed leaf,” and the analyst states—“Exhausted tea by decay and rottenness; gives a nauseous liquor and bad odour.” In still another instance the expert’s report is—“Being mixed with substances other than tea,” and concerning it the analyst states—“Contains magnetic oxide of iron and mineral matter, sand, &c. Very much mixed with other substances. Extract above 30 per cent. Not fit for human food.” When I saw reports of this kind, covering two full pages, I do not hesitate to say that I was angry.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Are those all Victorian cases?

Mr. KINGSTON.—They seem to be.

Mr. ISAACS.—Has no trouble been experienced in the other States?

Mr. KINGSTON.—There have been some cases in the other States.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of the same sort?

Mr. KINGSTON.—They are not so bad, it seems to me, as are the Victorian cases to which I have referred. Evidently some of the merchants who imported these teas were getting rotten and decayed stuff instead of pure and wholesome tea. Do honorable members know what is said in regard to some of this condemned tea? It is urged that the foreign substance is only mud, and in this connexion I say, let those responsible for it get rid of the mud before they bring the tea here. I have had a picture painted to me of a man standing over this tea fanning it. When he fans the tea in one direction, he leaves the rocks which it contains behind. It appears to me that this tea was intended to be subjected to a sort of dry-blowing process. When I read these reports I sat down and penned the following :—

I am disappointed to note that sections 51 and 54 have not, in some States, been more strictly enforced. No laxity in future to be permitted on any account.

I did not care who the persons involved were, and I added—

The papers in all cases up to date to be laid before the Crown Solicitor, with a view to prosecutions in all clear cases of shipments later than one month after the coming into force of the Customs Act 1901.

The matter went before the Crown Solicitor. He came to the conclusion that in those cases in which prosecutions have since taken place the law should be set in motion. I would be the last person to prevent him from taking action in this connexion. Only two days ago I had an interview with the Crown Solicitor, and I then put the question to him—"Are the cases clear?" and I received a reply from him in writing that they are. Under such circumstances, what is the duty of any man who desires to retain the respect of this House? It is said that I am blamable in that I allowed only a month in which persons might become acquainted with the law. But I do not feel that I was called upon to allow a longer period. The shipments of tea, in many of the cases to which reference has been made, come not from Calcutta, but from Colombo, which is much nearer to Australia than is Calcutta. Surely tea merchants, who boast large businesses, ought to study the provisions of the law in respect of their importations. If they fail to do so, let them stand the consequences, but let the public, at all hazards, be protected.

Question resolved in the negative.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN DRILL INSTRUCTORS.

Mr. GLYNN asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Whether the salaries of drill sergeants transferred from one State to another are "new expenditure," and, as such, payable by the Commonwealth?

2. If transferred expenditure, are the salaries debited to the State from which, or the State to which the men have been transferred?

3. Have the drill sergeants recently transferred to South Australia been enrolled under the South Australian Defence Forces Act of 1895?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—This is a matter which the Acting Minister for Defence is investigating, and, therefore, I shall be glad if the honorable and learned member will allow his questions to stand over until next Tuesday, by which time we hope to be in possession of full information.

OFFICERS' COMMISSIONS.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Acting Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Were No. 99, R.S.M., B. Watts, and No. 324, Sergeant-Major H. O. Appleby, of the Fifth Victorian Mounted Rifles, appointed to the rank of lieutenant by South African Army Orders, published in general orders No. 85, of 30th September, 1901.

2. Has either of these gentlemen applied for their commissions and been refused; and, if so, on what grounds?

3. Has the Defence department refused in these or any other cases to give commissions to officers appointed in South Africa or on the field, and why?

4. Will the Defence department cause commissions to be issued to all officers (whatever their rank when they left Australia) who were promoted to officers' rank in South Africa?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable and learned member's questions I desire to state:—

1. Yes.

2. There is no record in the State head-quarters office of these gentlemen having applied for their commissions, and being refused.

3 and 4. The question of allowing those who were promoted in South Africa to retain their rank on return to the Commonwealth was considered, and it was decided by the Government, on the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, that they should receive honorary rank.

OFFICERS IN THE NEW SOUTH WALES POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WILKS asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact that Mr. E. H. Davies, of the professional division, G.P.O., Sydney, has received more rapid advancement in the electrical branch than any other junior officer of that branch during his eight years' service?

2. Is it a fact that another officer of the branch, now in receipt of a similar salary to Mr. Davies, has had over thirteen years' service?

3. Has such officer passed all the examinations passed by Mr. Davies, and does he, in addition, hold full technical college certificates for electrical and mechanical engineering, chemistry, fitting, and turning, and other subjects, and is he still graded in the clerical division?

3. Is it a fact that a cadet, at present in the branch, is in receipt of £80 per annum; is graded in the general division; and is the holder of full technical college certificate for electrical engineering—which Mr. Davies also competed for, and failed to obtain;

5. Does Mr. Davies hold the intermediate certificate?

6. Does the junior testing officer in the same grade as Mr. Davies hold a similar certificate to Mr. Davies?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. The only junior officer whose progress in the electricians' branch can be compared with that of Mr. Davies, is Mr. E. G. Hipsley, who, although he was previously employed for three years as a temporary clerk, was not appointed a cadet until 1st March, 1895, Mr. Davies having entered the department as a cadet on the 24th September, 1894. Since the latter date these officers have received promotion as follows :—

Mr. Hipsley, from—

£60 to £100 from 19th August, 1895.

£100 to £125, as junior testing officer, from 1st January, 1899.

£125 to £140 from 1st July, 1900.

£140 to £150 from 1st January, 1901.

Mr. Davies, from—

£39 to £52 from 1st April, 1895.

£52 to £70 from 1st July, 1896.

£70 to £100, as junior testing officer, from 1st January, 1899.

£100 to £115 from 1st July, 1900.

£115 to £140 from 1st January, 1901.

£140 to £150 from 1st January, 1902.

2. Yes ; but the officer who, presumably, is referred to, Mr. J. T. W. Green, is a clerk, and was not appointed to the electricians' branch until May, 1900.

3. Officers are not required by the regulations to pass any of the examinations referred to, but it has been ascertained that Mr. Green has passed most, though not all, of the examinations passed by Mr. Davies, as well as the other examinations mentioned in the questions, with the exception of mechanical engineering. Mr. Green is still graded in the clerical division.

4. There are two cadets in the electricians' branch, Mr. J. F. O'Rielly, who is in receipt of £80 per annum, and is graded in the professional division, and Mr. J. R. Campbell, whose salary is £84 per annum, and who is graded in the general division. The former has passed the examination prescribed by the regulations for admission to the professional division, while the latter has not. Mr. Campbell states that he passed the technical college examination in electrical engineering last year. Mr. Davies did not attend this examination, but failed at a similar one held during the previous year.

5. Mr. Davies holds the intermediate certificate for electricity and magnetism, but not for electrical engineering.

6. Yes.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS BILL.

Bill read a third time.

POST AND TELEGRAPH RATES BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 21st August, vide page 15225) :

Mr. KIRWAN (Kalgoorlie).—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted :—
“ The rates for the conveyance of letters posted within the Commonwealth shall be as set out in the Third Schedule to this Act.”

This clause, if carried with the schedule, will have far-reaching and important effects. Irrespective of what the postal rate on letters shall be, a great many honorable members agree that this Bill should deal with the matter of letter postage. The Bill fixes post and telegraph rates, and rates for newspapers, but makes no reference to letters ; and I think that in reference to the latter, some uniform system ought to be applied throughout the Commonwealth. If the schedule be agreed to, the clause will introduce into the Commonwealth the system of penny postage. I understand that the objections to that system are mainly financial ; and I propose to show that where it has been established within the British Empire, and in other countries, it has never been productive of the heavy loss here anticipated, any deficiencies being of a temporary character. In regard to the Commonwealth, I believe that any estimate so far made as to the likely loss is considerably beyond what would prove to be the case. Penny postage was introduced into Great Britain in 1840, and the increase in the postal business was very considerable, the number of letters in one year increasing from 82,000,000 to 169,000,000. But with that increase in the volume of business, there was a very considerable decrease in the revenue. The latter was very alarming, but it was not sufficient to frighten the postal authorities, and results have shown that they acted wisely. In the first year the revenue fell from £1,600,000 to about £500,000 ; but the decrease in the rate was considerably greater than that which would be experienced in connexion with penny postage in the Commonwealth. Prior to 1840, the lowest rate in the British Isles was 2d., and that was applicable only to places within eight miles of each other, being virtually a suburban rate. The rate to other parts of Great Britain was 4d., so that the introduction of penny postage meant a considerable drop. In the Commonwealth, however, penny postage is very common. It is already established in Victoria, and in a modified form is in existence in almost every State. Penny postage prevails in the big cities and suburbs of New South Wales, Queensland, and Western Australia ; and the change I propose is not very radical. I may be told that it is hardly fair to draw an analogy between the system in its operation in the British Isles, and the system in its operation in the Commonwealth—that the British Isles are a thickly populated country, of short distances, whereas the Commonwealth is a country of great distances and sparse settlement. It must be remembered, however, that the British Isles of 40 years ago were very different from the British Isles of to-day. There is more analogy between the British Isles of 40 years ago and the Commonwealth of to-day, than there is between the British Isles of to-day and the Commonwealth of to-day. Sixty years ago distance was not annihilated to the extent it has been since, and journeys which now occupy a few hours then took many days; so that, in the matter of expensive communication, the analogy between the British Isles of that day and the Commonwealth of to-day is not very remote. Then we have an example in the sister Federation of Canada, where a penny postage was introduced in 1898. According to the Statistical Year Book of the Dominion, the number of letters posted in 1897 was 123,000,000; in 1898 it was 134,000,000; in 1899 it was 150,000,000; in 1900 it was 178,000,000; and in 1901 it was 191,000,000. The number of letters per head posted in Canada prior to the introduction of penny postage was 24·8, and in the following year it was 28·59; in 1900 it was 33·50, and in 1901 it was 35·57. The Deputy Postmaster-General of Canada, in a report dated Ottawa, June 30th, 1899, gives some information as to the operation of the penny postage in the year 1898-9. The report states:—

On December 25th, 1898, as a result of the conference of representatives of various portions of the British Empire, held in London, beginning on June 25th, 1898, to deal with the subject of reduced postage within the Empire, the rate for letter postage between Canada and the mother country and various other portions of the Empire was reduced from 5 cents to 2 cents per half ounce. This important change has been marked by a greatly increased correspondence between Canada and the United Kingdom.

That report was written six months after the establishment of penny postage, and, therefore, does not go into the details of the financial aspect. The report further refers to domestic penny postage, that is, penny postage within the Dominion of Canada.

On 1st January, 1899, the letter rate within Canada was reduced from 3 to 2 cents per oz. This change has been accompanied by such a marked and continuous increase in the number of domestic letters being transmitted through the mails as to warrant the conclusion that the loss of revenue consequent on such reduction will soon be overcome.

In the report for the year 1899-1900, when the penny postage system had been in operation for more than twelve months, the Deputy Postmaster of Canada says—

In the matter of postal revenue, it is to be remembered that the year in question was the first during the whole of which the reduction of domestic postage from 3 cents to 2 cents per oz. and of the inter-imperial postage from 5 cents to 2 cents per half oz. had effect, the higher rates having prevailed during the first half of the year ended June 30, 1899. Comparing the revenue from the sale of postage stamps, post cards, &c., it is found that the revenue for the year ended June 30, 1900, falls short by something less than 53,000 dollars, the total amount derived from the same source in the previous year indicating what other figures equally show, a marked increase in the number of letters posted. The total net revenue of the Post-office from all sources, except that from the Yukon and Atlin districts, exceeded that of the previous year by $1,053·25, and the total gross revenue exceeded that of the previous year by $20,391·09. On the other hand, the expenditure of the department, omitting from the comparison the special expenses incurred in the Yukon and Atlin districts, exceeded that of the previous year by $63,797·33, the excess being distributed somewhat evenly over the larger items of Post-office expenditure. It appears, therefore, that a considerably larger volume of postal business, sufficient to nearly balance the loss arising during the first half of the year, as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year, from the reduction of postage, was handled at an increased expense of slightly over 1½ per cent.

Therefore the loss through the adoption of the penny postage system in Canada was, roughly speaking, about £10,000. But we have another example which in some respects is still more valuable—that of New Zealand. New Zealand adopted the universal penny postage system in March 1901; but it is a curious thing that whilst, until very lately, a person residing there could post letters to distant countries, such as Chili, and most of the South American States, Italy, Canada, and any part of the British Isles, the postage to Australia was 2d., and, even now, although letters can be sent from New Zealand to Australia for 1d. the postage from Australia to New Zealand is 2d. Surely an arrangement like that is not likely to promote friendly feeling and advantageous commercial relations between the Commonwealth and New Zealand. The latest report of the New Zealand Post and Telegraph department shows that the loss through the adoption of the system has been much less than was anticipated.

Prior to the adoption of the system it was estimated that the loss would be something like £80,000 a year, but during the first twelve months which followed its introduction it was not more than 35,000. The report states—

The results of the year are probably the most noteworthy in the history of the department. Notwithstanding the introduction of penny postage, the gross revenue, which might have been expected to show a serious drop, is only less by £15,262 than for the previous year. The postal receipts, instead of being much below those of 1900, as might have been anticipated, have reached within £35,761 of the 1900 figures. . . . That the penny post, which involved the handling of close upon 13,000,000 additional letters, has been successfully introduced and carried on, while the increased expenditure for postal salaries is only £6,468, may fairly be credited to careful management. As, however, the reserve capacity of the postal staff at many of the second and third-class offices is probably near exhaustion, further increase in the volume of work will prove to be more costly in proportion than that already overtaken, and an increased expenditure on that account may be looked for. . . . The loss on the penny post for the first year has been below anticipations. Instead of a loss of £80,000, as originally estimated, the actual loss may be put down at about £34,000. The enormous increase of mail matter for the year, including nearly 13,000,000 additional letters dealt with, mainly the result of the penny post, was unprecedented, but it was handled without hitch of any kind. . . . The one defect in the original scheme, owing to the inability of Australia to respond to the invitation of this colony to enter either into a reciprocal agreement or one under which our letters prepaid at 1d. might be accepted and delivered without surcharge, was removed by the adoption, at the suggestion of the Postmaster-General, of the latter arrangement as from the 28th April last. It is hoped that the time is near when the Commonwealth will be in a position to enter into a fully reciprocal agreement.

I think that that wish will be echoed by the people of Australia. It is stated in the newspapers to-day that the loss which would be incurred by the Commonwealth, through the adoption of the universal penny postage system here, would amount to something like £300,000; but I should like to know how that extraordinary estimate is made up. The loss which has occurred in Victoria is not, proportionately, anything like so great. The Treasurer, when asked by the honorable member for North Sydney a short time ago what was the revenue of the Post and Telegraph department of Victoria for the twelve months immediately prior to federation, said that it was approximately £600,000, and that the revenue of the department for the twelve months ended 30th June last was 588,198, a difference of £11,802, which must be taken to be the actual diminution of revenue caused by the adoption of the penny postage system. If the loss had been anything like so great as some people would have us believe, the difference between the returns would be much greater.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does the honorable member allow for the general progress of the community.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I have simply taken the difference between the revenue for the year immediately prior to the adoption of the system, and that for the year subsequent to its adoption. The New Zealand loss is calculated in exactly the same way.

Mr. GLYNN.—But while the difference in revenue is, as the honorable member has shown, £11,802 the Treasurer has stated that the actual loss caused by the Victorian State legislation was £50,000.

Mr. CROUCH.—An increase in the quantity of mail matter must necessitate an increase in the number of men employed.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I do not think that the change of system in Victoria necessitated any great increase in the number of men employed. I would point out that the loss in Victoria has probably been greater than the loss in the other States would be, because, whereas Victoria formerly had a general rate of 2d., most of the other States have penny rates within their metropolitan areas, and in many country centres as well. According to a statement prepared by the secretary to the central administration of the Postal department of the Commonwealth, there has been a deficit of £46,243 in the administration of that department; but in the case of Victoria there is a credit balance of £14,389, in the case of New South Wales a credit balance of about £50,000, and in the case of South Australia a credit balance of about £23,000. Those credit balances would, I am sure, be more than sufficient to cover any loss which might be occasioned by the adoption of penny postage. Debit balances occurred in Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania. Western Australia had a debit balance of £31,000, but that State is in such a good financial position otherwise that it could well afford to meet a larger loss in order to secure the benefits of penny postage. In Queensland there is the large debit of £101,803, whilst Tasmania has a deficiency of £5,804. If, however, we are to wait until all the States show a credit balance in connexion with the Postal department, I am afraid that we may have to defer the reform for a very long time. Owing to the great extent of the Commonwealth, and the varying conditions which prevail in the States, it will be difficult to fix upon any particular time at which all the States will be in a position to show a credit balance. In view of the slight loss occasioned in those countries where penny postage has already been established, and bearing in mind, also, that the loss incurred has been much less than was first estimated, and has proved to be of a merely temporary character, honorable members must come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when we should extend this additional facility to the public. Federation has conferred no direct benefits upon the general public beyond the establishment of Inter-State free-trade, but the introduction of the penny postage would extend an advantage which would be generally appreciated as one resulting from the national union.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I indicated my view upon this question very clearly a few nights ago, and I intend to support the honorable member in his proposal to establish a penny postage system throughout Australia. I think that the present is an appropriate time to make this change, and I fear that if we abstain from introducing the reform now, a full decade will pass before we shall have another favorable opportunity. It is urged on behalf of the postal authorities that the department is making a loss, and that the ledger should be made to balance before any reform, such as that now suggested, is introduced. In reply to that statement, I would point out that although Canada makes a loss upon her postal service at present, her deficiency has been smaller since the introduction of penny postage. There has always been a large loss upon the postal service of the Dominion, which is apparently not run with the idea of making a profit, or of even balancing the ledger. Therefore, the objection raised by the postal authorities loses all point. It does not necessarily follow that the introduction of the penny postage system will make it more difficult to balance the ledger than if matters are allowed to remain as at present. All the information available points to the fact that the introduction of the penny postage system would not involve any great loss. The experience of Victoria, perhaps, affords a better guide than that of Canada. It is shown that the first year's operations after the penny postage was introduced in Victoria, resulted in a loss of only £11,000, plus a small increase in the cost of working.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—There was a difference between revenue and expenditure, of £11,000, but the total loss incurred by the introduction of the penny postage system was £50,000.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the difference was made up by the receipts from telegrams, we shall have an excellent reason for reducing the telegraphic rates. At present Australia is the only country in the Empire which has not adopted the penny postage system, and we should not hesitate to make the proposed change in order to bring our arrangements into line with those of Great Britain and her dependencies. The only argument advanced against the introduction of an international penny postage was the fact that we levied a 2d. rate upon letters posted within our own borders. It was argued that if we carried letters from London into the interior parts of Australia for 1d., the public would have a right to complain of the charge of 2d. upon letters conveyed from one part of Australia to another. We should do our best at the first opportunity to remove this obstacle in the way of the establishment of an international penny post. England has the penny postage system, and India, Canada, Cape Colony, Ceylon, Gibraltar, Jamaica, Natal, the Orange River Colony, and the Transvaal all enjoy the advantages of this great concession to the general public. New Zealand led the way in this direction. Notwithstanding that she loses a little in consequence of the introduction of penny postage she has so liberalized her postal conditions all round, that she makes a handsome profit out of the service. Our Post-office department will gain in many directions by the proposed reduction. I find that in Canada, since the introduction of penny postage, there has been a marked decrease in the number of post-cards despatched. Many people who can send a letter at the cost of a penny discontinue the use of post-cards, even though their cost is reduced to a halfpenny. There has also been the notable increase of 25 per cent. in the number of registered letters.

It is in these directions that the revenue is compensated by the increase of facilities extended to the public. If the Victorian returns were examined in the same way, it would probably be found that the actual loss resulting from the introduction of penny postage has been very small indeed. Even if there has been a small loss, I still contend that this would be the most opportune time for conferring some tangible benefit upon the people of the union—a benefit which was distinctly promised to them prior to the inauguration of our federation. The chief aim of the Postmaster-General seems to be to square off his balance-sheet, but the only result of his operations is to hamper and restrict the trading community. Now is the time to bring our postal system into line with those of countries whose official records show careers of great distinction and success. We need not fear the initial loss. If there be any, it will be rapidly made up to us. I do not believe that there is any analogy between Victoria and New South Wales, and I cannot believe that any loss whatever will be incurred in New South Wales by reason of the proposed change. Fully half the letters posted in New South Wales are forwarded in the city and suburbs at the penny rate. This practice did not prevail in Victoria prior to the introduction of the general penny postage in that State. In addition to the suburban penny postage system, we have all over the country thirteen-mile radii within which penny-postage rates prevail. In one instance, within my own electorate, letters can be sent 30 miles on the railway line to places within the thirteen-mile radius. The penny rate applies to a large number of our country towns, and it would be a good thing for us to abolish all irritating boundaries which now lead to a good deal of trouble. The loss involved would be very small indeed. In some of the other States the penny postage is charged within certain areas. If that be the case we shall be able to adjust matters very much more easily than have the people of Victoria. I cannot reconcile myself to the belief that in making the change the Commonwealth would suffer any loss worth considering. I know the nature of the Estimates which are compiled in the Postal department. They constitute the veriest guess-work, and surely we are just as well able to guess as are the officers of that department. I will undertake to say that there is not an official in the whole postal service of Australia who, if asked the basis upon which this calculation was made, could give a satisfactory answer. He would have to confess that it was based upon mere guess-work. One of the ablest officers in the department used frankly to make that avowal. Therefore I disregard these Estimates, which are of a conservative character—as perhaps they ought to be, seeing that they emanate only from officials who are not responsible. I hold that in this matter the Ministry should accept all responsibility. These Estimates are intended rather to guide than to control a Minister. Wherever the latter sees good commercial and substantial reasons for departing from them—reasons which affect our relations with the whole Empire—he ought to set them completely aside and exercise his own common sense. Every one of the Estimates which have been made regarding the loss which would accrue consequent upon the adoption of the penny postage system has been woefully belied by the operation of that system. It was so in Canada and New Zealand. In no case has the decreased revenue, which it was predicted would result from the proposed change, been realized. Notwithstanding the lugubrious-looking Estimates which the Minister representing the Postmaster-General has in his possession, and which I apprehend he will shortly submit to the committee as the opinion of experts, I hold that we ought to make the change, believing that we are as well able to guess the probable postal revenue as are the officials of that department, who know nothing about the commercial operations of the country. I trust that the committee will agree to the proposal of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. Now is the time when we ought to make the innovation. It is an innovation which will be fraught with the greatest good to Australia. It would constitute a Commonwealth gift to the people, which they would highly appreciate, and would represent the only material advantage which so far has accrued to them from the federation of these States.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania).—Before any other honorable member commits himself to this proposal, I think that it is my duty to call attention to the figures supplied to me by the Postal department, and to allow the committee to judge whether they are conservative—until all the States show a credit balance in connexion with the Postal department, I am afraid that we may have to defer the reform for a very long time. There has also been the notable increase of 25 per cent. in the number of registered letters.

I should like to see uniform postage and telegraph rates. Moreover, I want to see a uniform postage rate enforced throughout the Empire. I think that a mistake has been made in allowing New Zealand letters to be sent to Australia for a postage of 1d., while a postage of 2d. is charged upon letters sent from Australia to New Zealand.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—It was a matter of compact. There was a give-and-take element in the arrangement.

Mr. CROUCH.—In my opinion, New Zealand has obtained all the advantages of the arrangement.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—New Zealand gave us certain advantages in connexion with terminal telegraph rates.

Mr. CROUCH.—In any case, I think it is a great pity that such an anomaly should exist, and I feel that the Postmaster-General has not acted wisely in the matter. I would point out that a man in the permanent military forces, or a sailor in the Imperial Navy stationed anywhere in Australia, can send his letters throughout Australia and to any part of the world for a postage of 1d. No inconvenience has been caused by that arrangement, and I fail to see why this special rate which is allowed to part of our population should not be extended to the whole of the community. But the chief reason why I favour a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth is this:—There has been a great outcry against federation, because people cannot at once see all the advantages which we hope will come from it. Of course, they are benefiting at the present time by the removal of the Inter-State customs duties, and are receiving other indirect benefits which they do not recognise very readily; but I feel that it would be to the advantage of federation to stimulate the feeling of unity by bringing into prominence an immediate and visible benefit which the people will see is to be attributed to our union. If we introduced a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth, men would at once recognise it as a benefit derived from federation. It is what a man sees that he appreciates, and he thinks most of the advantages which he can grasp for himself. Such tangible benefits are worth much more, to his mind, than intangible benefits which may accrue five years hence. For this reason, therefore, I think that a large sum of money, and even as large an amount as the estimate of loss which has been framed by the Minister, might well be expended in extending the penny postage system to the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—Although I have every desire to facilitate communication between the various parts of the Commonwealth, it seems to me that in the present state of our finances, and of the finances of the States, we must consider first how the adoption of the penny postage system would affect the Treasury. I am not concerned as to whether the Estimates of the Postmaster-General are or are not absolutely correct. If the probable loss was set down at £150,000, which is only half the amount estimated, I should still be of the opinion that it is undesirable to make a change. I think that we cannot get away from the position that if the postal service is carried on at a loss; that is to say, if its total revenue is less than its total expenditure, the deficit must be made up by the contributions of the whole community. That means that those who write few letters must contribute to make good the loss caused by conferring a benefit upon those who write many letters. In this way the farmer, the miner, and the producer generally will be called upon to pay for advantages conferred upon those engaged in distributing and exchanging businesses. The people who perhaps write one letter a week will have to pay for benefits conferred upon the large financial and mercantile institutions, and upon all whose correspondence is large. The actual result of adopting penny postage is to a certain extent a matter of guess-work, but we cannot shut our eyes to the data at our disposal, and assume that it will be something quite different from a reasonable estimate based upon that data. If we halve our postage rates, we decrease our revenue by one-half, and at the same time, by adding to the mail matter to be carried, probably increase our expenditure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In adopting a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth, we should not have to halve the existing rates.

Mr. McCAY.—I am aware that there is already a penny postage throughout Victoria, but the adoption of that system has resulted in a loss to the State, which it is no more able than any other to bear. In New South Wales there is both a penny that he estimated it at £50,000, which was evidently the calculation made by the officers of the department. What is the experience of the actual working of the system? For the year ended March, 1901, the net receipts from the Victorian Postal department were 688,290, whilst for the succeeding twelve months they were £640,179—a deficiency of 48,111. Some honorable members appear to think that this sum of £48,000 would confer upon the public an opportunity of obtaining cheaper telegrams, without sustaining further loss. But it so happens that the extra amount received from stamps for telegraphic purposes during the period mentioned, was only £2,000. Were it not for that additional sum, there would have been a total loss of £50,111. That is the actual experience of Victoria.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How is the loss made up?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—This report does not go into that question. It simply states what the revenue was under the higher postage rate, and what it has been under the lower rate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How is the loss reduced to 11,000?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—That is a matter upon which I have no information. My purpose was to obtain figures which would fairly represent the difference between the revenue received by Victoria under the lower and the higher rates. As a business man I think that was the proper course to take. Surely this is not a question of the conservative reports of officers or of any man's opinion. The £11,000 is only the difference between the actual revenue and the expenditure for the year in the Post and Telegraph department. In placing the comparison before me, the officer made the significant remark that during all this period the Postal service was largely inflated by reason of the Royal visit. Although the honorable member for Parramatta has described this as a conservative estimate, it turns out to be a reasonable estimate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the officer say anything about the drought?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He has prepared an estimate for the case.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—That is not the way in which officers prepare estimates.

This estimate was prepared for the honorable member for Indi, who had some doubt as to the difference in the revenue from the two sources, and I think it is as reliable a return as the committee could possibly have.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Is the inference that the cost to New South Wales will be £40,000?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The cost to Victoria will be about £50,000, and it seems to me that the loss to New South Wales will be larger. It appears as simple as a rule-of-three sum. If we are all equally business-like and enterprising, and New South Wales has a greater population by 200,000, the loss to that State must be proportionately larger.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The conditions are not the same.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Whether or not the conditions be the same, we find in connexion with the Post and Telegraph service, a great average of circumstances. I am not here to deprecate what may have been a proper course for New South Wales when she was solus. I am here to speak of Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania—none of which States at the present time can afford the luxury of testing the system. The question was discussed at the conference of Deputy Postmasters-General held in Sydney about a year ago, and the report then issued bears the name of Sir Charles Todd and other permanent heads, whose experience and long service should inspire confidence. Ministers call for reports from the permanent heads of departments, and then form their own estimates; and I invite the committee to take that course in connexion with the report of the Deputy Postmasters-General.

Mr. KIRWAN.—Penny postage has always been established, in spite of the officials.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No doubt, supply might sometimes create demand; and, in course of time, though it must be a very long time, we might overtake the present revenue with the lower rate. The Postmaster-General's department, on the question of penny postage throughout Australia, arrived at a conclusion somewhat different from that I should have expected. Associated with the question was that of universal penny postage, but they gave their first attention to the system as applied to the Commonwealth, and estimated that its adoption would mean a loss to New South as the honorable member for Parramatta suggests—or whether the officers who have been so long associated with the department are capable of arriving at something like an accurate conclusion. But before I deal with those figures, and correct any misapprehension which may have resulted from the fact that the adoption of the penny postage system in Victoria caused a loss of only £11,000, I should like to follow the arguments adduced by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. To me it is apparent that some members of the committee intend to take advantage of this important proposal only to indulge in an academic discussion. The question of penny postage has been “in the air” for many years, and we have all followed with a lively interest the work of Mr. Henniker Heaton in securing the adoption of the system between Great Britain and many of her dependencies. So far, we have not been able to adopt that system here, although we may have been jealous of the privileges enjoyed by others. But, looking at this question from a practical stand-point, I fear that we cannot follow the lead of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, who assumes that because the results of Rowland Hill’s penny postage system, which dates from 1840, were to confer enormous benefits upon Great Britain, to secure to her people rapid communication, and a largely increased revenue, the same results would accrue here. We have to bear in mind that the period which has elapsed since 1840, and which covers the reign of our late Queen, was one which marked the greatest measure of progress that has yet been experienced by any nation. When Rowland Hill ultimately induced the British Parliament to agree to the penny postage system, the volume of the trade of Great Britain was less than £200,000,000—something like the trade which has already been established in Australia. But since that time the trade of Great Britain has increased until it has now reached the annual value of £700,000,000. That fact of itself is sufficient to show that large and important developments must have taken place—developments which are not due to penny postage, but from which the postal system has secured very important advantages. In Australia, however, we have to deal with a different state of affairs. In this connexion I find that New Zealand waited until the end of 1900 when she had the large surplus of £85,000 before she adopted this system. Similarly if New South Wales at the present moment occupied the position which she held prior to federation, the argument of the honorable member for Parramatta would be a sound one. But it has already been pointed out by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie that while last year New South Wales derived a profit from her postal department of £80,000, Queensland had a deficiency of £102,000, Western Australia of £30,000, and Tasmania of £6,000. I am not sure whether the surplus in New Zealand covered interest upon the cost of the construction of the lines there, but I am inclined to think that it did not. At any rate that colony had a surplus revenue of £85,000 before it adopted the penny postage system. But in the very first year of the operation of that system, I understand that the surplus was reduced by £30,000 or £40,000.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Was that entirely due to the adoption of the penny postage?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am disposed to think that there may have been other circumstances which contributed to that result, and therefore I propose to compare the conditions of that colony with those which obtained in Victoria. That brings me to the question of estimates made by responsible officers. We have heard from the honorable member for Parramatta that those gentlemen very properly take a conservative view in this connexion. Fortunately, I am able to meet his contention. I hope to be able to put before the committee figures which, irrespective of whether or not they are conservative have certainly been borne out by actual experience in Victoria. The honorable member for Kalgoorlie declared that the result of the operation of the penny postage system in Victoria was a loss of about £11,000 a year despite the prediction that it would total £50,000. But we must not gauge the system in that way. I have in my hand a report which has been specially prepared by the accountant in the Melbourne General Post-office in anticipation of this matter being brought before the committee. From it I gather that the loss which it was predicted that Victoria would sustain by reason of the introduction of penny postage was variously stated at from £40,000 to £80,000. The Treasurer has informed me that he estimated it at £50,000, which was evidently the calculation made by the officers of the department. What is the experience of the actual working of the system? For the year ended March, 1901, the net receipts from the Victorian Postal department were 688,290, whilst for the succeeding twelve months they were £640,179—a deficiency of 48,111. My purpose was to obtain figures which would fairly represent the difference between the revenue received by Victoria under the lower and the higher rates. As a business man I think that was the proper course to take. Surely this is not a question of the conservative reports of officers or of any man's opinion. The £11,000 is only the difference between the actual revenue and the expenditure for the year in the Post and Telegraph department. In placing the comparison before me, the officer made the significant remark that during all this period the Postal service was largely inflated by reason of the Royal visit. Although the honorable member for Parramatta has described this as a conservative estimate, it turns out to be a reasonable estimate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the officer say anything about the drought?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He has prepared an estimate for the case.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—That is not the way in which officers prepare estimates.

This estimate was prepared for the honorable member for Indi, who had some doubt as to the difference in the revenue from the two sources, and I think it is as reliable a return as the committee could possibly have.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Is the inference that the cost to New South Wales will be £40,000?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The cost to Victoria will be about £50,000, and it seems to me that the loss to New South Wales will be larger. It appears as simple as a rule-of-three sum. If we are all equally business-like and enterprising, and New South Wales has a greater population by 200,000, the loss to that State must be proportionately larger.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The conditions are not the same.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Whether or not the conditions be the same, we find in connexion with the Post and Telegraph service, a great average of circumstances. I am not here to deprecate what may have been a proper course for New South Wales when she was solus. I am here to speak of Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania—none of which States at the present time can afford the luxury of testing the system. The question was discussed at the conference of Deputy Postmasters-General held in Sydney about a year ago, and the report then issued bears the name of Sir Charles Todd and other permanent heads, whose experience and long service should inspire confidence. Ministers call for reports from the permanent heads of departments, and then form their own estimates; and I invite the committee to take that course in connexion with the report of the Deputy Postmasters-General.

Mr. KIRWAN.—Penny postage has always been established, in spite of the officials.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No doubt, supply might sometimes create demand; and, in course of time, though it must be a very long time, we might overtake the present revenue with the lower rate. The Postmaster-General's department, on the question of penny postage throughout Australia, arrived at a conclusion somewhat different from that I should have expected. Associated with the question was that of universal penny postage, but they gave their first attention to the system as applied to the Commonwealth, and estimated that its adoption would mean a loss to New South Wales of £83,000; to Victoria, a loss of £55,000, or as nearly as possible what the actual loss proved; to Queensland, a loss of £58,886; to South Australia, a loss of £40,000; to Western Australia, a loss of £34,200; and to Tasmania, a loss of £24,500.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is absolutely impossible there should be such big losses in New South Wales and Victoria.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Of course, much may depend on the proportionate number of letters which are at present carried at the lower rate in the cities and suburbs.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the Deputy Postmasters-General furnish any data on which their report was based?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then their estimates are mere guesses.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The total estimated loss is £295,586, though I am glad to say that the adoption of universal penny postage throughout the British Empire would mean an additional loss of only £20,924. If the proposal of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie is agreed to, it will at once necessitate the adoption of the system in connexion with the rest of the Empire; because, if we can afford to lose £295,000, we can afford to lose the additional £21,000. New Zealand and many of the States, in which there were surpluses, might, when standing alone, adopt penny postage; but the position in the Commonwealth is different. We have to bear in mind not what can be afforded by Victoria or New South Wales, but what can be afforded during the bookkeeping period by the smaller States, which represent nearly one-third of the population. By the adoption of penny postage, we should place Tasmania in the unhappy position of losing £25,000, and cause a deficiency under this head of £58,000 in Queensland. I presume that the clause means the adoption of the schedule, and I am afraid that that would cause distrust and distress in many of the States. I trust the committee will very seriously consider the proposal of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie before they agree to it. Penny postage will probably remain "in the air" until the bookkeeping period is over, and the Postmaster-General has ascertained the effects of his present proposals. To adopt the system now would be to some extent taking a "leap in the dark." The Bill, as it stands, gives cheaper telegrams at a loss of £48,000 a year, and we ought to know the effect of the measure before we commit the Treasurer to the serious further losses which I have indicated.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I am glad the honorable member for Kalgoorlie has submitted the proposed new clause. The Minister has hardly done justice to the suggestion of the honorable member for Parramatta, that New South Wales will not lose so much as has been estimated. The Minister contends that because New South Wales has a population greater than that of Victoria by 200,000, the loss of the former State will, therefore, be proportionately larger. It is apparently forgotten by the Minister that at the present time the bulk of the letters, which are posted in the towns and suburbs, are carried at the penny rate within a radius of 13 miles. Under these circumstances, surely the loss cannot be so great as has been contemplated. The honorable member for Parramatta is an ex-Postmaster-General of New South Wales, and is, perhaps, better able to judge of the effects than are officials, whose reports are always against progress in postal matters. The same official opposition was experienced in Victoria, and will always be experienced until a Minister or Parliament is prepared to adopt a reform. I shall support the proposal of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, for the same reasons as those for which I shall support the adoption of uniform telegraph rates for the whole Commonwealth. I think that we should wipe out the State divisions in regard to matters like this, and treat the Commonwealth as a whole. The State divisions should no longer be allowed to operate as barriers between one part of the Commonwealth and another, nor should the conditions in one part of Australia in respect to matters under the control of the Commonwealth be different from the conditions in another part of Australia. I do not think it is right, for instance, that if a man goes from Victoria, where there is a penny rate for letters throughout the State, to New South Wales, he should be compelled to pay a twopenny rate there, and thus be made to feel that in one part of the Commonwealth he is not receiving the same privileges as he enjoyed in another part. Every individual in the Commonwealth should be treated alike by the Commonwealth departments, and for that reason

I should like to see uniform postage and telegraph rates. Moreover, I want to see a uniform postage rate enforced throughout the Empire. I think that a mistake has been made in allowing New Zealand letters to be sent to Australia for a postage of 1d., while a postage of 2d. is charged upon letters sent from Australia to New Zealand.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—It was a matter of compact. There was a give-and-take element in the arrangement.

Mr. CROUCH.—In my opinion, New Zealand has obtained all the advantages of the arrangement.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—New Zealand gave us certain advantages in connexion with terminal telegraph rates.

Mr. CROUCH.—In any case, I think it is a great pity that such an anomaly should exist, and I feel that the Postmaster-General has not acted wisely in the matter. I would point out that a man in the permanent military forces, or a sailor in the Imperial Navy stationed anywhere in Australia, can send his letters throughout Australia and to any part of the world for a postage of 1d. No inconvenience has been caused by that arrangement, and I fail to see why this special rate which is allowed to part of our population should not be extended to the whole of the community. But the chief reason why I favour a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth is this:—There has been a great outcry against federation, because people cannot at once see all the advantages which we hope will come from it. Of course, they are benefiting at the present time by the removal of the Inter-State customs duties, and are receiving other indirect benefits which they do not recognise very readily; but I feel that it would be to the advantage of federation to stimulate the feeling of unity by bringing into prominence an immediate and visible benefit which the people will see is to be attributed to our union. If we introduced a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth, men would at once recognise it as a benefit derived from federation. It is what a man sees that he appreciates, and he thinks most of the advantages which he can grasp for himself. Such tangible benefits are worth much more, to his mind, than intangible benefits which may accrue five years hence. For this reason, therefore, I think that a large sum of money, and even as large an amount as the estimate of loss which has been framed by the Minister, might well be expended in extending the penny postage system to the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—Although I have every desire to facilitate communication between the various parts of the Commonwealth, it seems to me that in the present state of our finances, and of the finances of the States, we must consider first how the adoption of the penny postage system would affect the Treasury. I am not concerned as to whether the Estimates of the Postmaster-General are or are not absolutely correct. If the probable loss was set down at £150,000, which is only half the amount estimated, I should still be of the opinion that it is undesirable to make a change. I think that we cannot get away from the position that if the postal service is carried on at a loss; that is to say, if its total revenue is less than its total expenditure, the deficit must be made up by the contributions of the whole community. That means that those who write few letters must contribute to make good the loss caused by conferring a benefit upon those who write many letters. In this way the farmer, the miner, and the producer generally will be called upon to pay for advantages conferred upon those engaged in distributing and exchanging businesses. The people who perhaps write one letter a week will have to pay for benefits conferred upon the large financial and mercantile institutions, and upon all whose correspondence is large. The actual result of adopting penny postage is to a certain extent a matter of guess-work, but we cannot shut our eyes to the data at our disposal, and assume that it will be something quite different from a reasonable estimate based upon that data. If we halve our postage rates, we decrease our revenue by one-half, and at the same time, by adding to the mail matter to be carried, probably increase our expenditure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In adopting a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth, we should not have to halve the existing rates.

Mr. McCAY.—I am aware that there is already a penny postage throughout Victoria, but the adoption of that system has resulted in a loss to the State, which it is no more able than any other to bear. In New South Wales there is both a penny rate and a twopenny rate, but it is the letters which now pay the twopenny rate whose transmission is the most expensive. I do not know of any Inter-State correspondence upon which the rate is less than 2d., and that correspondence is very large. On the other hand, it cannot be thought that the people who now pay 2d. upon their correspondence would send two letters for every one they send now if the postage were reduced to 1d., and surely no one suffers from the existence of the twopenny rate. In my opinion, it is our duty not to increase the cost of federation by making this change. The honorable and learned member for Corio spoke of the blessings which the people would pour down upon our heads if we gave them this tangible benefit. No doubt the adoption of uniform penny postage would be a very easy way of obtaining that blessing; but, in my opinion, we are not justified in adding to the burdens of the community by adopting a rate which will not pay expenses. It cannot be said that there is any urgent public demand for this change. But even if there were, I think that when the public realized that there would be a loss, which would have to be made up by increasing the burdens of the taxpayers, the majority who would not benefit very largely, would be opposed to the change. Since the Government consider that the adoption of the system would mean a very large loss, the responsibility for which they are not anxious to undertake, I think that they should refuse to allow the matter to be taken out of their hands. Parliament will be acting in opposition to all principles of economy if it sanctions this arrangement. I would not sanction the adoption of the penny postage system anywhere, unless it was probable that the revenue of the postal department would within a reasonable time meet its expenditure.

Mr. E. SOLOMON (Fremantle).—The honorable and learned member for Corinella stated that he had not heard of any agitation in Victoria in favour of the establishment of penny postage, but that is hardly to be wondered at, seeing that the people of that State already have the advantage of the system. It is in other parts of the Commonwealth where the people do not enjoy this privilege, that the agitation for the extension of the penny postage system has occurred. When federation was being advocated, the people of the Commonwealth as a whole were led to believe that the establishment of uniform penny postage throughout the States was one of the benefits which would probably follow the union, and many candidates pledged themselves to support the system. In New Zealand where the penny postage system has been successfully introduced, the population is something under 800,000, and as the total number of persons in the Commonwealth is something like 4,000,000, we surely should be able to adopt penny postage without incurring any serious loss. I cannot understand the statement of the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, that only £21,000 would be lost if the postage upon letters for parts beyond the Commonwealth were reduced to 1d. The present rate of foreign postage is 2½d. per ½ oz., and the reduction to 1d. would involve a loss of 3-5ths of the present revenue in respect to letters for parts abroad. In view of the facts that we have to pay no subsidy for the conveyance of inland letters and that the relative reduction would not be so great as in the case of oversea letters, I cannot understand why there should be such an enormous difference in the estimated losses.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—It must be recollected that we at present lose very largely upon the carriage of sea-borne letters.

Mr. E. SOLOMON.—Even allowing for that, I cannot help thinking that some mistake has been made by the postal authorities. In Western Australia we have enjoyed the privilege of the penny post within municipal bounds, but in cases where letters are sent from one municipality to another, the full rate of 2d. per ½ oz. has to be paid. Honorable members will at once see the anomaly of charging 2d. for a letter carried a few hundred yards, and only 2½d. for despatching a letter to the furthest corner of the earth. The introduction of the penny postage system would confer a benefit upon a very large number of people in all the States. So far as Western Australia is concerned, the boon has long been asked for. It was understood that under federation the conditions in regard to postal and other matters would be made as uniform as possible in the various States, and we should remove all distinctions as soon as possible. I pledged myself to support the penny postage system, and I intend to do all in my power to carry out my promise.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I regret that I cannot support the honorable member for Kalgoorlie in his proposal. I feel indebted to him for the research he has displayed, and also to the Minister representing the Postmaster-General for the figures he has supplied. The conclusion I draw from the figures furnished to us is that this is not an opportune time for the establishment of the penny postage system. We ought to wait until the expiration of the bookkeeping period before we try an experiment which may involve the States in considerable loss for several years to come. According to the statistics furnished by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, every country in which this so-called reform of penny postage has been introduced has sustained an immediate, if temporary, loss. I do not know for how many years the returns showed a loss in England, but we have it on the testimony of the honorable member that there was a loss of 66 per cent. of the postal revenue in England upon the reduction of the general rate from 4d. to 1d. We also have his testimony that there was a loss of £35,000 in New Zealand, plus £6,400 increased expenditure, consequent upon the reduction of the postage to 1d. If we compare the population of New Zealand with that of the whole of the Commonwealth, and adopt that as a guide in estimating the probable loss that would be incurred by us, I think that the figures given by the Minister representing the the Postmaster-General must stand fully justified. I do not think that during the bookkeeping period—which will necessarily be a time of great anxiety for the State Treasurers—we should try experiments which would have the effect of adding to the unjustifiable discontent which already exists with regard to federation. There is no reason why we should do anything which would have the effect of involving the State Treasurers in a certain loss upon the Postal department. We are not called upon to reform everything within the first year or two. Our principal concern should be to unify the methods of administration, and to carry out certain reforms of urgent necessity. We are not required to go through the 39 articles which prescribe the subjects with which we are entitled to deal. We ought to wait and see what the financial effects of federation will be. The States Treasurers cannot even gauge the receipts from Customs, and they should not have to face a certain loss of postal revenue.

Canada lost the comparatively small sum of £10,000 during the first year after the introduction of the penny postage, but according to recent telegrams there has been a great increase of prosperity in the Dominion, and it may be assumed that the increase in the postal revenue is due to some extent to the general development of trade and industry, and the accumulation of wealth in that country. Moreover, the honorable member for Kalgoorlie did not make any allowance in his calculations for the increase of population in Canada since 1898, when the penny postage system was inaugurated. There is no blinking the facts mentioned by the Minister. The experiment of penny postage has been tried in Victoria, and a loss of £48,000 has been incurred, and additional expense amounting to £1,800 has been involved, so that the total loss may be stated at over £50,000. It may very fairly be assumed that if the advantages of penny postage were extended throughout the Commonwealth the loss would be not less than £250,000—the experts say that it would amount to £298,000. South Australia cannot afford to lose her proportion of that amount. At the present time the postal service shows a profit of £23,000, but that would be converted into a loss of £24,000, making a total deficiency as compared with the present revenue of upwards of £40,000. The compensation for this loss would not be a remission of taxation for the benefit of the general taxpayer. We should simply surrender a charge made upon those who use the post-office. We should really be reducing that which was paid as fair consideration for services rendered, not in the interests of the whole community, but for the benefit of those who use the post-office. There is a fair distinction to be made between a so-called reform of this kind, and one which would relieve the public generally from the burdens of taxation. I decline to recognise this proposal as a genuine reform. It would be a reform if it led to better results from the post-office, or if it enabled us to confer further advantages upon the public without incurring heavy loss. I cannot regard as a genuine reform any change that would result in a certain loss for at least five or six years. The introduction of the penny postage was a reform in England, because it was justified by results after a few years, and because a surplus had previously been derived from the working of the post-office.

The authorities simply released the profits which they had been making in order to cover a temporary shrinkage in the revenue, due to a change of policy which was expected to bring about a still greater accession of revenue in the immediate future. I trust that the consideration of this matter will be deferred until the bookkeeping period has expired, when the loss can be borne by Australia. It cannot be so borne at present. Some of the States can afford the loss at this juncture, but others cannot. The proper time to try an experiment of this sort is at the end of five years, when the State Treasurers will accurately know the amount which they can rely upon the Federal Treasurer returning to them, and when any loss resulting from a change which is applicable to the whole Commonwealth will be borne by the Federation.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—There is no doubt that during the federal elections the Government did extend to the people of the Commonwealth the hope that they would achieve the great reform of penny postage. At the same time it cannot be denied that the bookkeeping system, which is embodied in the Constitution, implies a certain responsibility upon each of the States. To compare New Zealand, which contains a population of 800,000, with Australia, which has a population of 4,000,000, is scarcely fair. We should compare New Zealand with each of the States separately. To my mind there is no doubt that the adoption of the penny postage system would result in a considerable loss to Queensland and Tasmania. If I were to consider the interests of New South Wales alone, I should vote for the proposal, because with the enormous increase in its Customs revenue that State could afford to adopt the penny postage system. At the same time, while it is well that this subject should be ventilated, and that a distinct declaration of the policy of the Government should be obtained before the closing of the present Parliament, it might perhaps be wise if the honorable member for Kalgoorlie were satisfied with having raised the question. So long as the bookkeeping system is in vogue the Executive of the Commonwealth must consult the interests of the smaller States. It would be very unfair if to a certain extent we forced on each State its own particular expenditure, and then tried to preach uniformity of system and great Commonwealth improvements. It would be like trapping the States into a certain condition of affairs, and then ignoring that condition in our own legislative actions. If Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania intimated to us that they would be willing to bear any loss consequent upon the adoption of this system, undoubtedly it would be the duty of the Government to introduce it. In this connexion, I was very much struck by a remark of the honorable member for Parramatta. He said that if we could establish penny postage throughout Australia, we should be giving the people the first real tangible benefit which they have received from federation. At the same time we have to consider the smaller States, which agreed to the bookkeeping period on the understanding that administration and legislation would be carried out on the basis of that system.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I am sorry to have to oppose this motion. There is no doubt that the honorable member for Kalgoorlie is absolutely sincere in his desire to bring about what he regards as a reform, but what I believe would constitute a retrograde step. The penny postage system would doubtless be of great advantage to wealthy offices. I know that the institution with which I am associated would benefit very materially. But how would that assist the west coast miner of Tasmania?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the man upon whom the present twopenny rate falls more than it does upon big offices.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—No. The average miner writes only about two letters a year. I want to see a scheme for the payment of old-age pensions adopted, and I am anxious to get an opportunity for the discussion of the motion relating to that matter, which has stood upon the business-paper for so long. But if the Commonwealth is going to sacrifice about £300,000 a year by the adoption of a penny-postage system, where is the money to come from to pay those pensions? No individual suffers because of the postage which he is required to pay upon his correspondence, seeing that it is a voluntary contribution. Nobody need write letters if he has no desire to do so. If friends are really anxious to obtain replies to their letters they can easily send stamped envelopes for the purpose. All these reforms must come about in their natural order. It is preposterous to compare a young country like Australia with England, where 500,000 poor people recently partook of the dinner provided for them by the King.

Mr. TUDOR.—What about the United States.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The United States obtained most of her unfortunate people from England. In the latter country old-age pensions could have been provided with the interest which is payable upon the moneys spent in conquering the Boers, although some apparently have not sufficient intelligence to appreciate that fact. In my opinion the adoption of the penny-postage system would mean the sacrifice of the multitude for the ideal benefit of the rich few.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—There has been an ad misericordiam appeal made in connexion with this discussion, and now we are told that the whole question resolves itself into whether the poor should bear the burden of the rich few. That is an appeal which ought not to have been made in connexion with a proposal of this kind, because it is absolutely absurd on its face. I claim that the man in an office can better afford to pay 2d. upon his correspondence than can the poor miner, of whom the honorable member for Tasmania has spoken. Indeed, the men in the offices to whom he has referred, do not pay anything—they make other people pay for them. I venture to say that the poor miner is the individual above all others who would benefit most from the adoption of a system of penny postage. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has pointed out that if a loss occurred through the introduction of that system it would have to be paid. But if a loss did occur, even if it totalled the sum predicted, I venture to say that the miner would not be called upon to pay 3d. a year more than he does at present. We have been told by one Minister that the loss sustained by Victoria consequent upon the introduction of penny postage was £11,000 per annum. Now, however, the Minister representing the Postmaster-General comes down with a brand-new estimate which has been furnished to him by his officers. I say that that estimate has been supplied for the express purpose of defeating this proposal. The figures in Canada show that when the penny-postage system upon letters was introduced in that country there was a corresponding increase in the number of registered letters passing through the post. There may be even an increase with a decreased postage rate, because letter writing often leads to the sending of telegrams. I challenge the Minister to give any data on which the estimates have been prepared. I have controlled the Postal department, and I know that when I have asked on what data similar reports have been made, I have always been told: "Oh, they are only estimates." We here in Parliament are just as well able as are the officials to guess the results of a reform like that now proposed. In New South Wales one-half of the business is at present done at the penny rate, and the estimated loss was £83,000; and, in Victoria, where there was no penny rate, the loss was estimated at £53,000. Is that not absurd? The estimates carry their own refutation; and I decline to regard them as of the slightest value.

Mr. MAUGER.—At the time the estimate was made, letters left open were carried at the penny rate in Victoria.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not letters.

Mr. MAUGER.—Letters, and open envelopes containing even promissory notes, were sent in tens of thousands at the penny rate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are now talking of closed letters, and I remind the honorable member for Melbourne Ports that even a newspaper, which is three or four times the weight and size of a letter, is carried at a less rate than is the latter. Canada, and not New Zealand, presents a case similar to our own. But even in New Zealand, where the change was complete and not partial, the loss has not been a great one. In Canada the loss for the first year was only £10,000, but now the revenue is greater than ever it was before the reform. In the Commonwealth the loss for the first year would be very small, and within a few years the letter postage would pay us handsomely, as it does to-day. Last year's operations in Victoria represent a time which, according to the Treasurer, was one of stress and commercial depression such as had never before been experienced in the State. And in New South Wales we are suffering depression such as we have not felt for very many years, and yet during the whole time our revenue is expanding. Are we not to count on continued expansion of the revenue? No argument has been advanced to make us hesitate to adopt the reform, and any temporary loss in connexion with it is not worth considering side by side with the enormous advantages which would be gained. As to what I consider the rather silly appeal made on behalf of the miners, I contend that they will benefit more than those interested in big offices. We all know that those in the big offices, unlike the miner, can pass the postage on to some one else; and, therefore, the reduction would mean so much money left in the miners' pockets. If I thought that the reform would benefit only those interested in the big offices, I should take no further trouble in the matter; but my concern is for the man in the back country, who feels, in this connexion, a disability simply because he is compelled to live there, away from the communal advantages of civilization. It is because I believe that the man in the back country will primarily, and to a greater extent than any one else, benefit by a reduction in the charge for postage that I shall vote for the new clause.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth). — I am very sorry to be obliged to vote against the proposal of my colleague, the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. I have no doubt that penny postage is a popular cry, and that in my own electorate such a reform is possibly waited with a certain amount of impatience. But that does not influence me against my better judgment, and cause me to vote for a proposal which I regard as premature. I cannot follow the honorable member for Parramatta when he urges that a twopenny postage is a tax on the miner, to whom the reduction would be an advantage. I cannot conceive that there is any considerable proportion of the people of Australia who would write more letters if the reduction were made, and I feel quite sure that if we institute the system of penny postage at the present juncture we must, as a necessary corollary, demand from the mass of the people more in the way of indirect taxation than the reform would give them. I can speak with some knowledge of the miner and his circumstances, seeing that I spent many years on the western gold-fields; and, in my opinion, what is wanted is not so much penny postage as increased postal facilities. The miner would be much better pleased to continue to pay 2d. for his letters than to be deprived of extensions and improvements, which are being asked on all sides on behalf of those people in the back-blocks, in regard to whom the honorable member for Parramatta is so anxious. I have several requests before the Postal department as to the extension and improvement of postal facilities in my own electorate, and if we resort to the alleged reform, those extensions will receive a set back for many years.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why?

Mr. FOWLER.—Because there will be no money to carry them out. I believe that in the main the contention of the Minister is correct, namely, that the condition of New Zealand furnishes a better parallel for us than does Canada. As I have said, there are very few people in Australia who refrain from writing a letter now, because the charge is 2d., and who would write more if the postage were 1d.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How is it that in every country where penny postage has been established the letters have increased by tens of millions?

Mr. FOWLER.—Where the size of the community and the closeness of population justify the reform, it can be undertaken with advantage, but under our present circumstances I am very much afraid it may mean a set-back to development of postal facilities in remote parts where those facilities are frequently the only link which binds the people there to civilization. I utterly fail to see how we can expect any advantage from a proposal which gives to the masses penny postage for their comparatively few letters, and which will mean, in order to make up the shortage, the extraction of a far larger amount in the shape of indirect taxation. Until the book-keeping period is over at least, this matter ought to remain in abeyance. I am glad that the question has been brought up, and I hope it will be kept before Parliament, so that the reform may be carried out, when it will mean an actual benefit to the community.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton). — The honorable member for Perth has anticipated a good deal of what I intended to say. I agree with that honorable member that it would be much better to allow the residents of the back-blocks to pay 2d. for their letters and be provided with adequate postal facilities, than to grant penny postage to settled communities for whom facilities are already provided. No doubt penny postage is a success where the population has been long settled, and the mail routes long established; but, in a country like Australia, where new farming and mining settlements are continually being opened up, extended postal facilities must be provided; otherwise the settlers will be dissociated from the life of the community. I, like the honorable member for Bourke, have preferred several requests to the Postal department, and have received the answer that they would be willing to carry out the desires of my constituents, as represented by me, if they had the necessary funds at their disposal. At the present time there is a loss of something like £100,000 a year upon the working of the Postal department in Queensland, and if it is found impossible to provide postal and telegraphic facilities for many new settlements under present conditions, the difficulty will be increased if, by the adoption of the penny postage system, the loss is allowed to mount up to £150,000. It may be said that the administration of the Queensland Postal department has been somewhat loose in the past; but honorable gentlemen must remember that the distances to be traversed in Queensland are much longer than the distances to be traversed in Victoria, because Queensland covers a much larger area than Victoria, and its settlement is much more scattered. Thousands of miles of wire are stretched across Queensland to complete the telegraphic system of Australia, and all this adds to the cost of working the department there. But in new countries like Western Australia and Queensland, where settlement is proceeding apace, new communities are being created almost every day. To many persons living out in the back country, a fortnightly mail service would be a luxury. It would be cheaper for them to pay 2d., or even 1s. in postage upon their letters, if they could get a post-office established near at hand, than to have to take a day's journey, and perhaps a still longer journey to get to a post-office, as they must at present. It would be much more in the interests of the Commonwealth, as a whole, to provide some sort of postal convenience for those who are settled out on our waste lands, than to add to the facilities possessed by those who are already well served. While I am in sympathy with the amendment, I believe that this is an inopportune time to make any reduction in rates. Most of the States Governments anticipate larger deficits during the current year than they had last year, and as the adoption of a uniform penny postage for the Commonwealth would result in a still further loss in administration, I think it would be calamitous to adopt it at the present moment; and that its adoption would bring federation into greater disrepute than even some of its erstwhile friends wish for. I do not think that we can have absolute uniformity until the bookkeeping period is ended. While each State has to make good any loss upon the working of the Commonwealth department within its borders, it would be unjust to, by reducing her postage rates to make them uniform with those of Victoria, compel Queensland to make good a loss of £150,000 a year. We, who know that State, believe that in a very few years she will take her place pretty well in the front in Commonwealth affairs, because her resources are as great as those of any other part of Australia. Although we are suffering at the present time, we are not pessimistic in regard to the future. When the right time comes, we shall be glad to adopt penny postage; but we do not wish to prematurely adopt a system which will either increase our own debt, or compel New South Wales or other parts of the Commonwealth to take some of our burdens. I hope, in the interests of the State revenue of Queensland, and of those who are engaged in developing our back country, and now suffer so severely from the want of proper postal conveniences, that the amendment will not be carried.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—The difference between the proposal of the Government and that of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, is, I take it, that the Government, in aiming at uniformity, wish to level up the postal rates of the Commonwealth to a uniform rate of 2d., while the honorable member wishes to level them down to a uniform rate of 1d. The advisability of reducing postage rates is a subject which has been very often debated. The ideal which all postal reformers have had in view has been, not the levelling up, but the levelling down of rates. It is contended, and I believe rightly, that by levelling down you give compensating advantages which tend, not only to prevent permanent loss to the Postal department, but to transform any immediate loss to a still greater gain than would have been obtained by the retention of the original rates. The general tendency during the administration of the Postal departments by the States was, not to restrict postal facilities and increase charges, but rather to give greater postal facilities and to reduce charges. Victoria, for instance, reduced her State rate from 2d. to 1d., and although there has been a loss consequent upon that reduction, it must be remembered that the new system has scarcely had a fair trial yet. It was introduced when the State was, if I may use the term, suffering a recovery from a very severe commercial depression, which affected its resources as severely as those of any other part of the Commonwealth. While there is not a penny postage system throughout New South Wales, that State was progressing in the direction of the adoption of such a system, and a great deal of the correspondence transmitted through her post-offices is carried for a postage of 1d. The metropolitan and suburban area, comprising all the country within 15 miles, or more, of the General Post-office, enjoys the advantages of penny postage, so far as the transmission of letters within that area is concerned, while many populous country centres enjoy a similar privilege, and others can be established by proclamation. I am very strongly in sympathy with the scheme foreshadowed by the honorable member for Parramatta. He has practical knowledge of this subject, as the result of his experience while Postmaster-General of New South Wales for a number of years, and he did yeoman service in the direction of extending and popularizing her post and telegraph system. I agree with him that it is desirable in the interests of federation, in order to show to the people some tangible benefit accruing from the union, that a uniform penny postage should be adopted. The Government policy of levelling up rates, if agreed to, will deprive the population of the more wealthy and progressive States of benefits which they have hitherto enjoyed, and place them back in the position which they occupied many years hence. The Government are regarding the proposal from a penny-wise pound-foolish standpoint. If the facilities extended to the public are curtailed and the charges are increased the volume of business transacted by the Postal department will become smaller. At the same time it will be necessary to maintain a full staff of postal officials and to carry on the mail services in all parts of the country as at present. Therefore, if the volume of postal business is reduced a serious loss must result. Experience in New South Wales has shown that the greater the facilities offered to the public, the larger the volume of business, and the greater the revenue derived by the department. I do not think it is unreasonable to claim that in postal and telegraph matters New South Wales is ahead of all the other States. In making a comparison between Victoria and New South Wales, it must be remembered that the latter State has the larger area and the more sparsely settled population, and that the earning possibilities of the postal service are therefore smaller in comparison. These remarks apply with even greater force to the case of Queensland. Still, the return of the postal earnings in New South Wales shows to the best advantage, and the receipts in New South Wales represent one-half the total earnings of the Postal department of the Commonwealth. Coghlan shows that during a series of years there was a steady increase in the volume of the postal business throughout the Commonwealth in keeping with the additional facilities that were given from time to time. From 1861 to 1871 the increase amounted to 12,000,000 letters; between 1871 and 1881, to 46,000,000; between 1881 and 1891, to 96,000,000; and between 1891 and 1900—a period of very serious depression—to 57,000,000. A comparison between the figures for New South Wales and Victoria discloses that in 1891 New South Wales showed an increase over Victoria representing 2.56 per cent. per head of the population. After this, the penny-postage system was extended throughout Victoria, and, as a result, her postal business in 1900 exceeded that of New South Wales to the extent of 7.77 per cent. per head of the population. This tends to prove that by extending the facilities afforded by the Postal department the volume of business is increased. By offering additional facilities to the public we should be able to so increase the business of the department as to establish it on a self-supporting basis, and we should be well advised to adopt the penny-postage system with this object in view. The loss estimated by the Minister is £295,000 per annum, but the accuracy of that calculation is seriously questioned by the honorable member for Parramatta, who thinks it should be considerably less. All progressive communities have shown a disposition to reduce charges and increase facilities, and we should make a bold step forward in the path of progress by extending to all parts of the Commonwealth the privileges which have been hitherto enjoyed the centre of which must be the place of publication, or some point not more than 30 miles distant therefrom according to the choice of the publishers.

(b) Posted for delivery to subscribers at the office at which they are posted, except in cities specially exempt by proclamation of the Governor-General.

Provided that not more than one copy of each such newspaper or periodical shall be so transmitted to each regular subscriber.

This will permit of the free postage of newspapers in country districts within a radius of 30 miles from the centres in which they are published, under certain conditions which are set forth. This provision is adopted to some extent from the Canadian legislation, and the concession asked for is a very small one. I am not advocating the interests of the newspaper proprietors so much as those of the subscribers, because I know the eagerness with which the newspapers are looked for in outlying districts. At the same time the country newspaper proprietors are very severely handicapped as compared with their more wealthy competitors in the large cities, and they are deserving of every consideration.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I am opposed to this proposed new clause. I was under the impression that I was voting against this clause when the last division took place. I had intended to support the proposal which has just been disposed of. I am quite in favour of extending every facility for the carriage of newspapers in bulk, but I do not think that they should be delivered to subscribers free of any charge for postage.

Proposed new clause negatived.

FIRST SCHEDULE. NEWSPAPERS.

On all newspapers posted (without condition as to the number contained in each addressed wrapper), by registered newspaper proprietors, or by newsvendors, or returned by an agent or newsvendor to the publishing office—One penny per lb., on the aggregate weight of newspapers so posted by any one person at any one time.

On all other newspapers posted within the Commonwealth for transmission therein, for each newspaper—One halfpenny per eight ounces, or fraction of eight ounces, avoirdupois weight.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP Fysh) agreed to—

That the words, "for delivery within the Commonwealth," be inserted after the word "posted," line 1.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I move—

That the word "lb." be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty ozs.;"

and that the word "eight" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

It is well known that some magnificent weekly journals, which weigh more than 8 ozs., are published within the Commonwealth. They weigh 10 ozs., and it would not be fair to unduly tax these publications, which are essential to the well-being of the farmers of the community. Under this schedule, if a person desired to post, say, two copies of the Sydney Mail or of the Australasian to a friend, he would be unable to do so for 1d.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—The first portion of the schedule is specially intended to deal with bulk parcels posted by newspaper proprietors.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I wish to provide that if a person desires to post two copies of weekly newspapers such as those I have mentioned, he shall be able to do so for 1d. I desire to substitute 20 ozs. for 1 lb., because it will prevent a lot of complication in the future.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I can assure the honorable member that his proposal, if adopted, will have an effect different from that which he desires. I perfectly understand the object which he has in view, and am sure that it can be accomplished by amending the second portion of this schedule. His desire is that two newspapers contained in one wrapper, and weighing not more than 20 ozs., shall be carried by the Postal department for 1d. But I would point out that the first portion of this schedule relates entirely to newspapers posted in bulk by registered newspaper proprietors.

Mr. WATSON.—But the two matters are related.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was under that impression at the first glance. But it does not necessarily follow that, because we extend a concession to private individuals who wish to send one or two newspapers through the post, we should adopt the same course in regard to registered newspaper proprietors. The two things do not hang together—the one is not a necessary consequence of the other. The difference in loss to the Post-office is great. All that the honorable member for Tasmania desires can be accomplished by an amendment of the second portion of the schedule.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—After the debate that has taken the proposed experiment in two or three years' time. In the meantime let us watch the result of the operation of the system in Victoria. I am satisfied that the adoption of penny postage would mean a considerable loss to South Australia, where a twopenny rate is charged, even in connexion with the metropolitan and suburban areas. I am convinced that the State which I have the honour to represent does not desire this system, and I will not support it until I know more of its financial results.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie). — Originally it was my intention to support this proposal, but certain information which I have gathered during the course of the debate has caused me to alter my opinion. Under the circumstances, I cannot see my way to vote for penny postage, although I am a strong believer in the advisability of cheapening means of communication in every possible way. This, however, is scarcely the time when we can afford to do that. If the Commonwealth as a whole had to bear any loss resulting from the adoption of the system—and I am satisfied that there would be a loss—I should be prepared to support the proposal of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. But for four years to come that loss will fall upon the separate States, and, necessarily, those States which are the least able to bear it will have to pay the greater proportion of it. In Victoria, we introduced the penny postage system under favorable conditions, and the result was a large increase in the number of letters forwarded by the department. But experience has also shown that the officers of the department really had some knowledge of the business which they were conducting. It was felt in the Victorian Parliament that the estimate of a loss of £55,000 for the first year was outrageous, but, after twelve months, the total loss was ascertained to be £50,000; and, under the circumstances, the estimates of the officers should be treated with great respect. There are several points to which I should like to allude, but at this late hour I refrain from doing so. I regret very much that I cannot support the new clause, but I trust the financial position of the States, at no distant date, will warrant our extending the boon of penny postage to the Commonwealth.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—I listened with great interest to the speech of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, who certainly made out a good case, and has my entire sympathy. On the present occasion, however, my vote will not be controlled by sympathy, but by financial considerations. The effect of the Bill, supposing it be passed as introduced by the Government, will be a substantial loss in revenue so far as South Australia is concerned, and under the circumstances I shall at the present time have to oppose penny postage throughout the Commonwealth. I sincerely hope, however, that the day is not far distant when that reform may be adopted.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa). — Several honorable members oppose the motion owing to the financial conditions which prevail in their own States. I wish they would carry the principle a little further. While they do not propose to diminish taxation in their own States, they are willing to increase taxation in at least three of the States. All newspapers under the Bill have to pay postage, and that means increased taxation in New South Wales, Tasmania, and Western Australia. I am not arguing whether it is right or wrong to charge postage rates on newspapers; but such a charge in New South Wales means increasing taxation in one direction without giving corresponding advantages.

Mr. SAWERS.—Is it taxation?

Mr. CONROY.—Perhaps it ought to be called payment for services rendered, but the term "taxation" has been used throughout the discussion, and the Bill proposes to increase the demands made on the people.

Mr. FOWLER.—The new postal rates will be an advantage in Western Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—Unless there is better administration than we have had under the present Postmaster-General it will not really matter whether the rates are high or low. If it be a sound argument that we ought not to reduce the postage, because it will diminish taxation, surely we ought not under the Bill to increase taxation in certain of the States. If penny postage were adopted, it would be possible to tell the people of New South Wales, on whom the heavier burden would fall, that they were left much in the same position that they occupied before. Increased postal facilities are part of the educational advantages which ought to be given to the people, and the expense of these facilities ought not to be counted as a mere matter of loss, in view of the resultant gain to the community. Every argument used against the proposed new clause is an argument in favour of postponing the Bill until the expiration of the bookkeeping period. I support the new clause in order that some of the advantages which arise from federation may be given to States on which, under the Bill, we propose to impose disadvantages.

Mr. PATERSON (Capricornia).—I regret very much that I do not feel disposed to support the new amendment. I should like to see penny postage throughout the continent, but I cannot understand how the States can afford it. Queensland is at present suffering terribly from drought, and great contraction of business, and in connexion with postage that State has the enormous deficit of £101,000. That deficit arises from the payments under a large number of mail contracts, which have to be carried out, no matter what number of letters are conveyed; and the taxation of the people is not added to as it would be if, in the case of insufficient postage, the cost had to be met out of the general revenue. It would be a blow to Queensland to subject her to more loss of revenue, and for that reason I cannot support the new clause.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Proposed new clause negatived.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted:—
“The rate for bulk parcels of newspapers of more than 1 lb. each, such parcel posted by the publisher for carriage to post towns only, within a radius of 20 miles from the nearest railway station or port, or such other distances as the Governor-General may from time to time determine, and not for delivery by letter-carriers, shall be as set out on the first schedule of this Act.”

In my opinion, it is necessary to insert some such provision as that in the Bill, to provide for the distribution of newspapers to the various agents in and about the place at which they are published.

Mr. POYNTON.—Is the honorable member prepared to make a similar arrangement for the carriage of other kinds of merchandise?

Mr. BROWN.—I leave it to the honorable member to move for the application of the provision to such other kinds of merchandise as he may think it should apply to.

Mr. POYNTON.—We have already provided that newspaper proprietors may import their paper and machinery free of duty.

Mr. BROWN.—This is a matter in which the readers of newspapers are interested as much, if not more than, the publishers. The carriage of newspapers ought to be treated upon somewhat different lines from the carriage of other commodities. Special provisions are made for the transmission of correspondence through the post, and in some of the States facilities are given for the postal transmission of general merchandise, and the educational advantages conferred by newspapers ought not to be lightly estimated.

Mr. SAWERS.—They are very doubtful sometimes.

Mr. BROWN.—That remark may apply in some instances, but I may reasonably claim that the press of Australia will compare favorably with that of any other country in the world, and that its general tendency is to elevate rather than to demoralize. It is a vehicle for the distribution of valuable information, and I believe that our community is all the better for the education which it obtains from its newspapers and magazines. Therefore, instead of placing embargos upon the distribution of newspapers, we should increase the facilities for their distribution. One result of the greater distribution of newspapers will be that honorable members will have more enlightened and intelligent constituents to appeal to.

Mr. McCOLL. — That may be all the worse for them.

Mr. BROWN.—It would be a bad thing for a member if it were so. I think that an intelligent constituency will always appreciate the work of an able and conscientious representative. While some newspapers may be biased in their political views, I think that as a whole they treat politicians reasonably. It does not matter to what party a politician belongs, if he says anything worth hearing the newspapers are ready to publish it. I have sometimes felt that I have not received fair play from the press, but, on the whole, I cannot complain of the treatment which has been meted out to me. I do not know what better educational agent is likely to supplant the newspapers. I do not think that even the amalgamation of the Government Gazette with Hansard, which is sometimes talked of, will do that. In New South Wales the number of newspapers sent through the post in bulk parcels is very large, representing as it does something like 51,000,000 newspapers per annum. In Victoria, however, where the postal arrangements have been more restricted, only about half as many newspapers are sent through the post. Seventy-five per cent. of the newspapers sent in bulk parcels to different parts of Victoria are distributed, not through the post, but by arrangements made between the publishers, the Railways Commissioner, and various coach and mail contractors, and thereby the Postal department loses a very large amount of revenue. Moreover, though that system is possible in Victoria, because of the compactness of the State, and the closeness of its population, it would hardly be possible elsewhere. I am informed that in New South Wales it would be necessary, to carry it into effect, for the newspaper publishers to make arrangements with no fewer than 1,300 mail contractors. I think that my request is a reasonable one. It applies only to bulk parcels of more than 1 lb. in weight, posted for transmission to post towns within a radius of twenty miles from the nearest railway station or port. But, to meet the case of new communities springing up at a greater distance than twenty miles from a railway station or port, it is provided that the Government may, by proclamation, extend the advantage to them. The carrying out of this arrangement will not require the employment of additional officers, or the providing of facilities other than those which are already paid for; but by increasing the number of newspapers carried, it will considerably advantage the revenue. I should like to hear the Minister representing the Postmaster-General on the subject.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Proposed new clause negatived.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted—

Newspapers and periodicals published within the Commonwealth shall be allowed free transmission through the post subject to the following conditions:—

- (a) Posted within 24 hours of publication to regular subscribers residing within a circular area of 60 miles in diameter

the centre of which must be the place of publication, or some point not more than 30 miles distant therefrom according to the choice of the publishers.

(b) Posted for delivery to subscribers at the office at which they are posted, except in cities specially exempt by proclamation of the Governor-General.

Provided that not more than one copy of each such newspaper or periodical shall be so transmitted to each regular subscriber.

This will permit of the free postage of newspapers in country districts within a radius of 30 miles from the centres in which they are published, under certain conditions which are set forth. This provision is adopted to some extent from the Canadian legislation, and the concession asked for is a very small one. I am not advocating the interests of the newspaper proprietors so much as those of the subscribers, because I know the eagerness with which the newspapers are looked for in outlying districts. On all newspapers posted (without condition as to the number contained in each addressed wrapper), by registered newspaper proprietors, or by newsvendors, or returned by an agent or newsvendor to the publishing office—One penny per lb., on the aggregate weight of newspapers so posted by any one person at any one time.

On all other newspapers posted within the Commonwealth for transmission therein, for each newspaper—One halfpenny per eight ounces, or fraction of eight ounces, avoirdupois weight.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP Fysh) agreed to—

That the words, "for delivery within the Commonwealth," be inserted after the word "posted," line 1.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I move—

That the word "lb." be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty ozs.;"

and that the word "eight" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

It is well known that some magnificent weekly journals, which weigh more than 8 ozs., are published within the Commonwealth. Mr. O'MALLEY.—I wish to provide that if a person desires to post two copies of weekly newspapers such as those I have mentioned, he shall be able to do so for 1d. I desire to substitute 20 ozs. for 1 lb., because it will prevent a lot of complication in the future.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I can assure the honorable member that his proposal, if adopted, will have an effect different from that which he desires. I perfectly understand the object which he has in view, and am sure that it can be accomplished by amending the second portion of this schedule. His desire is that two newspapers contained in one wrapper, and weighing not more than 20 ozs., shall be carried by the Postal department for 1d. But I would point out that the first portion of this schedule relates entirely to newspapers posted in bulk by registered newspaper proprietors.

Mr. WATSON.—But the two matters are related.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was under that impression at the first glance. But it does not necessarily follow that, because we extend a concession to private individuals who wish to send one or two newspapers through the post, we should adopt the same course in regard to registered newspaper proprietors. The two things do not hang together—the one is not a necessary consequence of the other. The difference in loss to the Post-office is great. All that the honorable member for Tasmania desires can be accomplished by an amendment of the second portion of the schedule.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—After the debate that has taken place, I certainly think that the Minister might agree to increase the weight limit in connexion with the carriage by the department of newspapers in bulk. It is proposed to charge $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for 8 ozs. for newspapers posted in the ordinary way, and yet to charge 1d. per lb. of 16 ozs. on the aggregate weight of newspapers posted "without condition as to number, by registered newspaper proprietors, or returned by an agent or news-vendor to a publishing office."

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a special arrangement for the benefit of newspaper proprietors.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I say that the arrangement is not liberal enough, and I do not see why the charge should not be $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—There was a similar regulation in each of the States; but this is more liberal.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—In one State newspapers were carried absolutely free. While ordinary newspapers ought to pay a certain fee, we should do all we possibly can to encourage the distribution of newspapers throughout the Commonwealth. I think we deal very fairly with the country newspapers, but no doubt the great metropolitan journals are eagerly sought for as the literary food of the mass of the people. In order to test the feeling of the committee, I should like to move that the charge be reduced to a halfpenny per lb.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I ask permission to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN) proposed—

That the word "penny," line 5, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "halfpenny."

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—There is one point which I think the committee will appreciate. At the present time newspaper postage prevails in certain States, and neither the people nor the newspaper proprietors in those States raise any objection. But the Bill contains proposed charges which are less liberal than the charges now in existence; and under the circumstances that is scarcely fair.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In what respect is the Bill less liberal?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—At the present time a newspaper weighing 10 ozs. can be sent for a halfpenny, but the Acting Prime Minister seems to distinguish between a single newspaper and newspaper carried in bulk.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I contend that the distinction cannot be drawn. If a single newspaper of 8 ozs. is charged a halfpenny, and papers in bulk are charged 1d. per lb., what is the difference?

Mr. DEAKIN.—This is a special arrangement for the benefit of newspaper proprietors.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—If no one is taking exception to the existing arrangement it would be hardly fair for the committee to adopt a less liberal proposal.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I trust the committee will not adopt the suggestion of the acting leader of the Opposition. The proposal in the Bill seems fairly liberal, and if papers weighing 10 ozs. are carried for a halfpenny, it will follow that ordinary bulk parcels must be carried at the same rate, namely, 1d. for 20 ozs. as suggested by the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley. A great deal is said about the immense work newspapers are doing, and I admit that they do a great deal in purveying news, although that news is generally coloured by the particular ideas of the proprietors. After all a newspaper is just like any other commercial concern, and the whole basis of the charge imposed on them should be the amount of service rendered. I cannot, therefore, follow the Acting Prime Minister in saying that it is sufficient to charge the big newspapers one halfpenny for each copy of 10 ozs., and to charge the smaller newspapers 1d. for a lb. of 16 ozs. I admit that the matter of delivery may enter into the service rendered.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Eight newspapers are got through for the penny.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—And those eight newspapers may be delivered at eight different centres.

Mr. WATSON.—That may be so, but a bulk parcel of eight country newspapers are equivalent to one or two papers of large size. I do not think the committee will be acting wisely or equitably if they decree that the big newspapers in the capital cities shall be carried singly at the charge of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for 10 ozs., while other newspapers are called upon to pay 1d. for 16 ozs. I should prefer to see the proposal to charge $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for single newspapers of 10 ozs. put first, so as to allow a separate decision as to bulk parcels. Whatever is done I am prepared to vote for a charge of 1d. for 20 ozs. all round, rather than for a separate proposal of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for 10 ozs., but I should not like to go as far as is proposed by the honorable member for Wentworth. The honorable member for Canobolas, a little earlier, stated that the country newspapers had to submit to a great deal of competition from the metropolitan press, but so far as I can see there are very few country newspaper proprietors who are not prepared to pay a reasonable amount of postage. It is admitted that the service rendered is worth paying for, and any objections raised are not worth a great deal of credence.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—The Acting Prime Minister has omitted to recognise the fact that if an Australasian, for instance, which weighs 10 ozs., is allowed to go through the post for $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and the charge per lb. is 1d.——

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to order, and I only do so that we may not have a second discussion on this question. The point with which honorable members are now dealing will inevitably arise later on, and there is now before the committee a specific amendment to reduce the charge from 1d. to $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Mr. THOMSON.—I may put myself in order by supporting the suggestion of the honorable member for Bland to first deal with the question of single newspapers. On the charge for the single newspaper will depend the charge for the bulk parcel.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am unable to see any reason why the two items should not be dealt with separately. Evidently they are inserted here to provide for two separate purposes, the one being solely for the accommodation of newspaper vendors who send their parcels to the railway stations, those stations being recognised as receiving offices, from which the papers can be sent in bulk to the various townships.

Mr. McCAY.—Even if the two are separate, the committee wants the second paragraph to be taken first.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—A suggestion has been made which, it seems to me, is conducive to the despatch of business. Let the Minister take the second paragraph first, and then let us decide upon the weight of the single newspaper, as some honorable members think the one rate ought to affect the other. Perhaps the Minister will be able to say whether he will accept 10 ozs. instead of 8 ozs.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am not prepared to accept 10 ozs., but I am prepared to take the second paragraph first. There is a verbal amendment to be made in that paragraph.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP FYSH) agreed to—

That the word "transmission," line 9, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "delivery."

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I move—

That the word "halfpenny," line 10, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "farthing," and that the word "eight" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "six ounces and under."

The effect of this amendment will be to make the rate for each newspaper $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for 6 ozs. I shall propose that the rate be $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for over 6 ozs. That is only a fair rate, because a good many of our country publications are under 6 ozs. in weight.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I move—

That the word "eight," line 11, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

I think it will be admitted that we want to have as many good magazines as possible circulating throughout the Commonwealth, and do not want to do anything to limit their circulation. The rate proposed by the Government will interfere with the circulation of many excellent publications. I see no object in that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Before honorable members vote upon the proposal of the honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, it is just as well that they should understand to what an extent his amendment will affect newspapers that already circulate throughout the Commonwealth. In Victoria there are between 290 and 300 registered newspapers. The average weight of them is $2\frac{1}{2}$ ozs.

Mr. WILKS.—They are all very heavy publications!

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—They may be, so far as concerns their matter, but their weight avoirdupois is scarcely ever up to 8 ozs. I see that there is one newspaper which weighs 9 ozs., namely, the Australasian, but the price of that is 6d. The Mining Standard weighs 8½ ozs. In the information supplied to me these are the only publications that I can detect the weight of which is above 8 ozs. The amendment therefore would simply have the effect of giving an advantage to two or three newspapers.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It puts them all on a level.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—If the Australasian is sent to Brisbane in bulk, it will be carried, under the proposed rates, at an immense advantage, as compared with present rates.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—If we do not reduce the rate, the Australasian will have to be printed on Chinese or Japanese paper.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I must impress upon the attention of honorable members that there are about 1,300 mail contractors throughout the Commonwealth, and the heavier we make the weight of the newspapers which they have to carry the higher will be their contract rates on the next occasion when tenders are called for.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—The newspapers are carried for ½d. now.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes; within a State, but this rate is to be for the whole Commonwealth.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—If the mail contractors have to carry a heavier weight of publications, it can easily be seen how much higher their tenders will be. The proposed reduction amounts to asking the department to carry these newspapers for one-fourth of the return which they would receive under the rate proposed.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I think that, whatever limit of weight we agree upon, it should include the great weeklies of Australia. They contain every class of news—not the mere gabble of the town, but information of a substantial character, relating to all sorts of subjects; and they are of great importance to those in the interior. It would be a shaveling policy to exclude some of these papers from the ½d. rate merely because they slightly exceed 8 ozs. in weight.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I should like to know why the Government propose to reduce the limit of weight from 10 ozs. to 8 ozs. A return which has been circulated amongst honorable members gives the rates of postage at present levied upon newspapers posted in the respective States for transmission within the Commonwealth, and I find that in Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia, papers weighing up to 10 ozs. are carried for ½d. Why should we penalize certain important weeklies?

Mr. SALMON.—It is not the newspaper proprietors who would be penalized, but the country readers.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Yes. Those in the bush who depend upon these newspapers for their news will be called upon to pay the postage.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—As honorable members are so much opposed to any reduction in the limit of weight, I will give way.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I think that the charge for the carriage of newspapers in bulk should not be excessive. It must be remembered that in New South Wales all newspapers have hitherto been carried free, but in future the Commonwealth will receive ½d. from every newspaper that is posted. Newspapers, as literature, are different from ordinary merchandise, and while a certain amount should be paid for their carriage, that amount should not be excessive. I move—

That the word "penny," line 5, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "halfpenny."

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I would point out that, under the proposals of the Government, ten newspapers, each weighing 2 ozs., would be carried for 1d. If that is not a reasonable rate, I do not know what is.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—If the newspaper proprietor forwards to a country town as a bulk parcel 200 or 300 copies of an issue, separately addressed to the subscribers in that town, will he have to pay for them at the rate provided for bulk parcels, or at the rate provided for separate papers?

Mr. DEAKIN.—They will be paid for as a bulk parcel.

Mr. BROWN.—I understand that the acting leader of the Opposition wishes to reduce the rate for bulk parcels from 1d. for 20 ozs. to ½d. for 16 ozs. I am in favour of that proposal.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—The theory held by some honorable members is that newspapers should be carried in just the same way as any other kind of merchandise. I should like to know, in the first place, of any commercial firm that would charge as much for carrying a ton weight 20 miles as for carrying it 3,000 miles. Is that a commercial proposal?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. It is done under the zone system on railways on the Continent.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is not done here. If newspapers are to be regarded as ordinary merchandise, the rules which ordinarily apply to merchandise should apply to them; but we are proposing to charge over £9 per ton for carrying them for 30 miles, and then we are prepared to carry them for 3,000 miles for the same amount. Any proposal to apply the same rates as are applied to ordinary merchandise is ridiculous on the face of it. We are doing no such thing. I shall support the proposal of the honorable member for Wentworth. I do not think it is an outrageous proposal even in view of what we have agreed to already in regard to the single newspaper rate. I cannot see that the bulk parcel has any necessary relation to the single newspaper, because the bulk parcel of newspapers may mean anything between two and 1,000 newspapers. If we have two newspapers in a parcel, it is a bulk parcel, and the same rate is proposed for two as for 1,000, while an entirely different rate is proposed for one.

Mr. WATSON.—Will the honorable member support the zone system in connexion with this matter?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No. I am only showing the absurdity of applying a commercial rate to it. No railway or carrying company will carry goods 3,000 miles for the amount for which they will carry them 3 miles.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—The honorable member for Parramatta seems to be annoyed because some of us, who are not prepared to give the earth to the newspaper proprietors, are prepared to give them some consideration. He thinks that we should carry their merchandise absolutely free, and when we do not carry a counter proposal to the utmost extreme, the honorable member is still dissatisfied. I cannot understand the extent to which the honorable member wishes we should go.

• Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I point out that the rate charged in every one of the States in the past upon newspapers carried in bulk was 1d. per lb.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are now reducing the rate to 1d. for 20 ozs.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN. — I think the Ministry are wrong in that, because 1d. per lb. is a fair rate. I desire to point out that the New South Wales authorities established a difference between the rates charged upon papers published in Victoria and those published in their own State. They charged $\frac{1}{2}$ d. on 2 ozs. for newspapers published in Victoria, and 1d. for anything over 2 ozs. and up to 8 ozs. Under the circumstances, the Government are extremely liberal in proposing a rate of 1d. for 20 ozs.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—In reply to the honorable member for Melbourne, I would point out that we should have got into an absurd position if we had not adopted some concession on the first item in the schedule, if we agree that a single newspaper weighing 10 ozs. should be carried for a halfpenny. Again, the honorable member's statement as regards the differentiation of the rates by the New South Wales authorities is, I think, incorrect to this extent: that the charge was made because Victoria would not reciprocate by agreeing to carry newspapers posted in New South Wales free. If Victoria had been willing to reciprocate, there would have been no differentiation in the rates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Victorian authorities could not carry New South Wales newspapers free, and charge postage upon their own.

Mr. THOMSON.—They could, of course, because, if they got the same advantage in New South Wales, where would be the difference? That would surely have been a natural exchange. I can quite understand the policy that would be supported by the Victorian authorities, that they should accept free carriage of newspapers in New South Wales and charge postage upon them in Victoria; but the fair exchange was for New South Wales to treat the Victorian newspapers as they treated their own. They would do unto their neighbour as they did to themselves. It appears, therefore, that the differentiation all came from the other side. I consider this matter upon commercial lines, and I have always, in the New South Wales Parliament, supported the payment of postage by newspapers. The question is what difference should the Commonwealth make as between the delivery of every individual newspaper through the post to the person to whom it is addressed, and the receipt and delivery of newspapers in bulk—the receipt from one person or firm, and delivery to one person or firm in bulk.

Mr. McCAY.—The difficulty is that there is a bulk delivery at certain offices, and an individual delivery to the recipients at the bulk rate.

Mr. THOMSON.—What we are dealing with now is described in the schedule as the charge to be made upon all newspapers posted for delivery within the Commonwealth—without condition as to the number contained in each addressed wrapper—by registered newspaper proprietors or by newsvendors, or returned by an agent or newsvendor to the publishing office. Newspapers are sent in bulk for delivery by agents. I think that the charge for delivery should be that proposed by the honorable member for Wentworth, and I shall support his amendment.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—The honorable member for Melbourne has led the committee to believe that there is a considerable difference between the treatment meted out to the newspaper proprietors of New South Wales and Victoria. New South Wales has hitherto had free postage.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—New South Wales has had to pay 1d per lb. for the carriage of newspapers in bulk in this way.

Mr. BROWN.—Prior to federation, the carriage of parcels in bulk was a matter of arrangement between the Postal department and the railway people. The Federal Postmaster-General, however, has declined to continue that arrangement, and the matter is one of special agreement between the Railways Commissioners and the newspaper proprietors. I have before me a report of the evidence taken on the 2nd July last by a committee now sitting in Sydney to deal with the carriage of newspapers on Government railways. On that occasion, Mr. Harper, Chief Traffic Manager of the New South Wales railways, was examined, and the following question was put to him by the chairman, Mr Dacey—

If the Argus or the Age, published in the adjoining State of Victoria, sent 1 cwt. of papers over here, full rates would be charged?

To this, Mr. Harper replied—

No. In such a case we should charge quarter published rates—that is a matter of Inter-State arrangement. The Victorian authorities charge their reduced rates on all registered newspapers leaving here, and we do the same with all registered newspapers from their State. That does not apply to books and periodicals which are registered outside Australasia.

It will thus be seen that the daily newspapers published in Melbourne obtain the same concessions on the New South Wales railways as those given to the Sydney dailies on the Victorian lines.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—If the honorable member's statement be correct, the return from which I have quoted must be wrong.

Mr. BROWN.—I have not had an opportunity of examining that return, but I presume that the Chief Traffic Manager of New South Wales would not give sworn testimony of this character if it were not correct. I think that the objection raised by the honorable member for Parramatta is a good one, and that it is ridiculous to impose this heavy charge upon newspaper publishers. If it is persisted in it will lead to a repetition of what has occurred in this State. That is to say, fully 75 per cent. of the newspapers in bulk will be dealt with privately. Instead of the department receiving the benefit of this revenue, the money will go into the hands of mail contractors, who will be able to undercut the department if this high rate is adopted. It seems to me that there is a disposition on the part of some honorable members to deal with newspapers as ordinary articles of commerce, so far as their carriage is concerned, and to place prohibitive charges upon them to such an extent that they would not receive the fair play accorded to ordinary merchandise. I think that the desire of some honorable members is to prevent the transmission of newspapers. I am not in sympathy with that desire, and I am prepared to support the amendment moved by the honorable member for Wentworth.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP Fysh) agreed to.

That the word "lb." be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "20 ozs."

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I move—

That the House at its rising adjourn until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

By meeting at the earlier hour it is hoped we may deal with the remaining schedules of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, and thus enable honorable members, who so desire, to return to their homes by the afternoon train. According to present appearances we shall have the Customs Tariff Bill returned from the Senate by the close of this week, for consideration when the House meets next week; and, having regard to the serious issue that lies before us, it is desirable that the consideration of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should be completed before we adjourn to-morrow.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 28 August, 1902.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

CUSTOMS DUTIES : DISPUTES.

Senator DOBSON asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. How many cases are there in which the amount of duty payable under the Customs Act 1901 is in dispute, which now remain unsettled, owing to the Minister for Customs having not yet settled the dispute or decided what course shall be adopted?

2. Have not many of such cases remained undecided for long periods, and have not some importers complained of the delay?

3. Has the Minister refused, and, if so, in how many cases, to settle such disputes, as he is empowered to do by Part 15 of the Customs Act, and has he determined that such disputes must in most cases be decided by a court of law?

4. Has the Minister adopted any uniform practice with regard to the matters mentioned in question 3, and have importers been informed of such practice?

5. In cases of disputes as to the duty payable, are importers allowed to obtain their goods on depositing amount of duty claimed or giving a bond, and has the Minister adopted a uniform practice in this respect, and have importers been informed of such practice?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow :—

1. Cases of dispute as to duty are of frequent occurrence, and must be so till the Tariff is settled, and during its earliest administration some delay is inevitable. Great efforts have been made to prevent this, and not more than about a couple of dozen cases of dispute as to rate of duty now remain for Ministerial decision, and these will be disposed of during the week.

2. Yes.

3 and 4. The Minister is not aware of any application having made to him to hold a public inquiry under the part of the Act referred to, and he favours no withdrawing from courts of justice of matters properly coming before them in relation to contraventions of the Act.

5. Yes. By repeated order, and by issue of the attached circulars.

CIRCULAR WIRE TO ALL STATES.

Minister instructs as follows:—I do not wish merchants to be in any way harassed, say, by unnecessary detention of their goods. Section 167 applies to enable the owner to get his goods on deposit of duty claimed in any bond fide case of dispute as to duty. The public may be reminded as to this in any such case or generally.

Memo.

GOODS UNDER SEIZURE AND IN DISPUTE.

In order to avoid unnecessary detention of goods under seizure, or detained by reason of errors in declarations and entries, the Minister directs that—

Except when the possession of seized goods is necessary for the purposes of the proof of any case, or fraud or smuggling is believed to have been committed, seized goods may be delivered on compliance with section 206.

Where seized goods are necessary for purpose of any case, and a sample will suffice, the balance may be delivered in terms of paragraph (1) on taking a sample.

The security is preferred to be a cash deposit, but so long as clearly sufficient bond or guarantee will suffice, if approved by the department.

This does not limit the duty of the department to deliver on deposit of duty under section 167 where it is a simple case of dispute as to duty.

The terms of the security under section 206 to be for payment "of their value in case of their condemnation or their forfeiture in any way," and when there is no dispute as to value this may well be stated.

In addition to the security referred to above in all cases the amount of duty involved must be deposited in cash.

The Collector of Customs,
All States

TOBACCO MANUFACTURE.

EXCISE REGULATION.

Senator PULSFORD asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Referring to the regulation issued by the Minister for Customs by which tobacco manufacturers are permitted to use free of duty the following articles, viz.:—Glucose, spirits, glycerine, liquorice, sugar, spice, starch, starch flour, cigarette paper, cork manufacture for tips, flavouring essences, essential oils, and tags—is this regulation issued under the clause in the Tariff schedules authorizing the Minister to grant the free use of "minor articles" in certain cases?

2. What aggregate amount of revenue is lost by these remissions over the whole Commonwealth; or, if this cannot be given, what is the aggregate amount for New South Wales and Victoria, or for either of them?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. No. It is issued under the Excise Act 1901, section 24.

2. It is considered that nothing is lost, unless it is desired that these goods shall pay double duty, for underweight is added to and included in the weight of the manufactured tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, and snuff, for the purposes of duty. This is similar to the practice which for many years has obtained in New South Wales and Victoria, and, it is believed, in all the States which have tobacco factories.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of House of Representatives' message resumed from 27th August, vide page 15448):

Item 63. Hats and caps, viz:—Men's, women's, boys', and children's felt hats, per doz., ad valorem, 30 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 25 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

When the Tariff was introduced, a duty of 3s. per dozen was proposed, but the other House decided that it should be 30 per cent. ad valorem, which the Senate desired to be reduced by 5 per cent. On the one hand, it is urged—and on the best possible evidence it has been shown—that a duty of 30 per cent. is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the industry. In Victoria the specific duty on a number of these items was very considerably more than 30 per cent., so that there has been a very great reduction in that State. Since the Tariff was introduced, not only have the Victorian factories continued their operations, but in New South Wales a factory has been started on an enlarged plan, and the opinion on all hands seems to be that unless the duty of 30 per cent. is maintained, it will be impossible to carry on the industry satisfactorily. There is a difference of 5 per cent. between the Houses, and as the issue now is not only whether the duty should be what is proposed, but whether there should be an agreement come to by the Senate, I ask honorable senators not to press the request.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—From the silence of the Opposition I should imagine that there is some hope of getting this item disposed of quickly. I desire to refer to some quotations which have been used to influence honorable senators. One quotation is dated 1st January last, and reads as follows:—

This document was quoted by an honorable senator, whose name I do not desire to give, to show that the natural protection amounted to about 50 per cent. It was not fair to include the duty in the natural protection. We understand that term to include oversea charges.

Senator PULSFORD.—Is the honorable senator using some figures which I showed to him?

Senator HIGGS.—Yes.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable senator is not quoting me correctly.

Senator HIGGS.—I shall be very glad to compare notes with the honorable senator. These goods were brought out by the Perthshire—a most expensive method of bringing out goods, and no criterion as to the competition with which the hat manufacturers have to contend. That competition is that of the hat manufacturers of the old country, whose products are brought out here by tramp steamers and sailing vessels, by cheap freight vessels, such as the French and German subsidized steamers, and by ships such as those of the White Star line. Having given these figures to the Senate, I invite Senator Pulsford to point out in what particular I have misrepresented him. I think that what I have quoted is almost an exact copy of his quotation. It was as exact as I could make it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I hope the committee will adhere to its request in this case. This duty of 25 per cent. was arrived at practically by way of compromise. It is only a reduction of 5 per cent. on the duty that came up to us. From the point of view of revenue, and of being careful not to do anything but what is reasonably fair and right to existing industries, the duty was fixed at 25 per cent. There was a very high duty in Victoria, which no doubt had the effect of benefiting the hat factories here. The products of these factories were regarded in the other States as an illustration of the injurious effects of protection, because their hats were sold at a lower price in South Australia than in Melbourne. It was felt that the Victorian rate was extravagantly high and everyone, without any desire suddenly to cut away every shred of protection, felt that a comparison might fairly be instituted with the duties in the other States. In Queensland and South Australia the duty was 25 per cent. The Tasmanian duty was 20 per cent., and the Western Australian duty was 15 per cent. We accepted 25 per cent. as not only a fair but a generous measure of protection to the existing industry, which has been established for 30 years in Victoria, and which now, having the enlarged market of Australia open to it, should be able to compete on advantageous terms with the hat factories which have been established in other States. It would only have been a fair thing for the House of Representatives to accept our request, and I believe that on re-consideration they will do so. I mentioned yesterday, with regret, that we have not before us the reasons why the House of Representatives has declined to accept our suggestions. Certainly in regard to this item they might fairly have looked upon what we requested as a compromise. The duty on this item was carried in the House of Representatives by a majority of two, and the duty on the next item, sewn hats and caps, was carried by a majority of four. The majority in the House of Representatives which declined our request was four. I cannot help feeling that our request in this instance was treated somewhat cavalierly. I do not say that in a spirit of complaint, but certainly it is to be remarked that the majority in another place was only the same as that which carried the request in the Senate—a House with only half as many members. I feel sure that on reconsideration the members of the House of Representatives will see, if they turn to the debates, that the request was tendered in a conciliatory spirit.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I ask the indulgence of the committee while I quote a few words which have a considerable relation to our proceedings, and also to the general discussions on the Tariff. The quotation appears in London Truth, of July 7th, 1902. The passage I wish to quote is this—

I once asked the first Sir William Hayter, so long the chief Liberal whip, whom in his experience he thought the best leader of the House. "Johnny Russell," he said. "You had only to pull his coat tail, and to tell him that we were ready for a division, when he sat down in the middle of a sentence." This was perhaps going a little too far in a natural desire to make progress. I have always thought, myself, Mr. Disraeli the best leader that I have known. He never left the House. He very seldom interrupted in debate, but if matters got somewhat tangled, he set them right with a few words.

I urge the honorable and learned senators who are leading both sides to make a note of this paragraph and see whether they can not arrange to let us get through this schedule rather more quickly than we are likely to do if they make such long speeches as the last speaker has done.

Question — That the request be not pressed—put. The committee divided.

The only point which I desire to mention in addition to what I have already said, is that a large portion of the material which is used in the making of these sewn hats and caps has to be imported and pays a duty of 15 per cent., so that in regard to all sewn hats and caps made from imported material only a margin of 5 per cent. would be left for the manufacturer, if the request were adopted.		Question so resolved in the negative.
Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—That is 5 per cent. more than the Government allowed for apparel.		Item 68. Socks and Stockings, cotton, 10 per cent.
Senator O'CONNOR.—That is not an answer to my statement. Five per cent. protection is certainly not enough. The whole matter has already been before the committee, and, in the interests of a settlement of the Tariff, I hope that honorable senators will abandon this request.		Senate's Request. —That the word "cotton" be omitted, and the words "except silk or containing silk" be inserted.
Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I desire only to say that on this line the majority before was twice as large as what it was when our request was refused. We should really stultify ourselves if we abandoned this request, because the margin allowed to the manufacturer of hats and caps is 5 per cent. greater than that extended to the manufacturers of apparel. It only shows what a remarkably good time the manufacturers must have had in Victoria under the higher duty.		House of Representatives' Message. —Amendment not made.

Ayes 12		That the request be not pressed.
Noes 15		I think that a short explanation is necessary in order that honorable senators may understand how this matter stands. Under the Tariff as it came up here, woollen and silk socks and stockings were subject to a duty of 25 per cent. under the heading of apparel. It was intended to treat cotton socks and stockings in an exceptional way by imposing upon them a duty of 10 per cent. The effect of the Senate's request, however would be to make all socks and stockings except those made of silk or containing silk liable to a duty of 10 per cent. Thus, the local maker of woollen socks from imported yarn would have no protection whatever, because a duty of 10 per cent. is fixed upon imported yarns, as honorable senators will see by referring to that item. The two items must be taken together. The committee resolved that the House of Representatives should be requested to reduce the duty on yarns from 10 to 5 per cent., on the ground that there were only a very few manufacturers of yarn in Australia; that those manufacturers made them principally for their own use; that it was very difficult for the smaller manufacturers of woollen socks to obtain yarns from them, and that if the duty were allowed to remain they would be placed in the hands of these manufacturers or else compelled to pay a duty which would be very hard for them to bear. I find on making some inquiries, however, that the manufacture of yarns is really a larger industry than was supposed. In a memorandum from the Collector of Customs at Sydney the following statement appears :—

On the approach of federation, and in a certain anticipation of a reasonable duty, a complete plant for the manufacture of yarns, worsted and woollen, was imported into this State, and is now in full working order, the number of hands directly employed being above 40. A 10 per cent. rate is considered the lowest at which it would be profitable to manufacture; and should the suggested reduction be adopted, any further development of the industry could not be thought of; in fact, it is doubtful if present operations could be continued.

I invite the special attention of honorable senators from New South Wales to this statement. They have often expressed a desire to benefit the manufactures of that State, and they have now an opportunity to do so. There can be no doubt, from this statement, that a duty of 10 per cent. is the lowest which can be imposed if we are to give any protection to the yarn-making industry. I hope that we do not desire to destroy such an industry as the making of yarns from our own wools, which not only gives employment, but utilizes our own raw material. I take it that we desire to give some protection to the manufacturer if we can do so, and that we also desire to give a protection to the manufacture of stockings from these yarns. The only way in which that can be done is by leaving the duty on woollen and silk stockings at 25 per cent., and the duty on yarns at 10 per cent. That will leave a margin of 15 per cent., and the manufacturers of yarns and stockings in both these branches will be served. On the other hand, if we do adopt the expedient of cutting down the duty on these socks to 10 per cent., and reducing the duty on yarns to 5 per cent., we shall leave the very miserable protection of 5 per cent. to the maker of woollen socks, and give no protection whatever to the manufacturer of woollen yarns. It seems to me that both these matters have to be considered, and I hope the duties will be allowed to stand.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Leave the duty on yarns at 10 per cent.?

Senator O'CONNOR.—Yes. If we leave the duty at 25 per cent., it will give the maker of woollens a protection of 10 per cent., which is the least he can do with, and it will give the maker of stockings a protection of 15 per cent. I hope that in this matter I shall have the assistance not only of protectionists, but those of my free-trade friends of New South Wales, who are willing to realize that we have entered upon a new condition of things. I was very much struck by the way in which the matter was put some time ago by my honorable friend, Senator Neild. The honorable Senator spoke as a free-trader, but I think I am quoting the substance of his remarks when I remind the committee that he said that he recognised that under this Tariff industries were being protected, that protection was part of the policy of the country, and he would therefore take care that wherever a New South Wales industry might be benefited by a reasonable amount of protection, he would see that it got it.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I did not go as far as that.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The honorable senator will remember that he was speaking upon the tobacco duty at the time, and it appeared to me that he put the matter very fairly indeed.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—The honorable and learned senator will perhaps permit me to say that in the speech to which he referred, what I said was simply this: That as, in common with other free-traders, I was compelled, in connexion with this Tariff, to vote for a great deal of protection for many industries, I was not prepared to overlook the claims of industries suitable to the circumstances of my own State.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is practically what I have said, only the honorable senator has put it in a very much better form. I say that that is a sensible position for any honorable senator to take up, whatever his views may have been before. In the same way many protectionists here would like to see very much higher protective duties imposed, but they recognise that there must be revenue, and they are therefore willing to come down from the standard of duties to which they have hitherto been accustomed in several of the protectionist States. Under all the circumstances, I say that the best way to adjust matters will be to leave the duties as they were when the Tariff was first introduced into the Senate, leaving the duty at 25 per cent. in this case, and when we come to yarns agreeing to a duty of 10 per cent. I hope that the committee will not press the request.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I do not intend to enter into the controversy which may be initiated by reference to the expressions used by Senator Neild in connexion with the tobacco industry. I point out that the difference between the two sides is, that whilst we on this side from a feeling of kindness and a desire that no immediate injury should be done to any existing industry, are prepared to agree to a reasonable amount of protection, we find that honorable members on the other side, whilst quite willing to impose protective duties, are never prepared to approach the views of free-traders by expressing any willingness to reduce duties. I am sure that Senator Barrett must have been delighted to hear the views expressed by the Vice-President of the Executive Council in connexion with yarns, and which seemed to me to support Senator Barrett's views in favour of a reduction of the duty on yarns to 5 per cent. and to utterly cut the ground from under the apparent objection on the part of the House of Representatives to accept what, I dare say Senator Barrett thought, was a very reasonable proposal. However, we can deal with that when we come to it. With respect to this particular item, I propose to do exactly what Senator O'Connor has himself suggested—to give the margin of 10 per cent. protection, which he thinks is fair to the makers of socks and stockings. I propose to move a modification of the motion for two reasons, which I shall mention. I propose to strike out the words, "except silk or containing silk," and to increase the duty to 15 per cent., so as to make the rate on these items uniform. The two reasons which operate are these: First of all, there is always a difficulty where exceptions are made; and if the result of securing revenue without doing injustice to any industry can be achieved without complicating the work of administration, it should be done. We know that there are difficulties in the administration of the department of Customs which have caused a great deal of irritation and discontent. It is possible that a difficulty will be created if a discrimination is made by the introduction of these words, "except silk or containing silk," and it will be better under all the circumstances to have a uniform duty of 15 per cent. The proposal will be somewhat against the views held by my honorable friends and myself, but we are prepared to make a liberal concession in order to secure a compromise. Fifteen per cent. represents about the mean of the duties applicable to the different kinds of socks and stockings. As the Vice-President of the Executive Council has mentioned, the duty as proposed in the Tariff when introduced in the Senate was 25 per cent. on silk and woollen socks and stockings, and 10 per cent. on socks and stockings made of cotton. The Senate carried a request for a uniform duty of 10 per cent. That is rather low if we take a fair mean of the duties all round. Fifteen per cent. is a fair mean all round, and will afford exactly the measure of protection which Senator O'Connor has said is sufficient for the local makers of socks and stockings. If Senator Barrett's proposal that the duty on yarn should be 5 per cent. is agreed to, and the committee agree to the modification I suggest—that the duty in this case should be 15 per cent. all round—there will be a 10 per cent. margin of protection provided, and we shall have the advantage of a uniform duty. If, on the other hand, the duty on yarn is increased to 10 per cent. and the duty upon socks and stockings is left at 20 per cent., the same margin of protection will be afforded. I think the House of Representatives will agree that it will be a great advantage to put the whole thing on a uniform basis. I do not myself see why poor people should be compelled to wear only cotton goods, and if discrimination is made between cotton and woollen goods, we shall have difficulty introduced, as we have had in the case of flannelettes. I am informed by experts that it is impossible sometimes to tell whether goods are woollen or cotton goods. I therefore move—

That all the words after the word "be" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "modified by omitting the words 'except silk or containing silk' and by requesting the House of Representatives to make the duty 15 per cent."

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do not think that honorable senators quite realize the effect of the amendment proposed by Senator Symon. Our proposal under the Tariff is that cotton socks shall be dutiable at 10 per cent. My honorable and learned friend desires to raise the duty upon cotton socks to 15 per cent. Our proposal is that silk stockings and socks shall be dutiable at 25 per cent., as they should be, and my honorable and learned friend desires to bring them down to 15 per cent.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable and learned senator proposes to reduce the duty upon woollen socks, too.

Senator O'CONNOR.—This proposal will reduce the duty on woollen socks by 10 per cent. If Senator Clemons thinks that that should be done he will, no doubt, vote for the amendment. I say that the effect of the amendment will be altogether contrary to the principles upon which we have been acting all through. Surely silk stockings and socks should pay a duty of 25 per cent. as a matter of revenue? On the other hand, we consider that all these cotton socks should be put on a special footing, the same as cotton piece goods are, because, although they are all imported, they are principally used by those who have not a great deal to spend on dress. The position I have put ought alone to be enough to prevent the amendment being carried. My honorable and learned friend is quite mistaken in supposing—he must have misunderstood what I said—that I indicated that I thought 10 per cent. would be sufficient protection for the makers of yarns. What I said was that I thought the difference between the 10 per cent. duty which ought to be paid on yarns, and the 25 per cent. duty which was imposed on woollen socks was a sufficient margin. Of course, if you take the suggestion of the Senate as being accepted, and leave the duty on cotton yarns at 10 per cent., the margin will be only 10 per cent., but I did not advocate that. We ought to return to the position from which we started. Several attempts have been made to change the burden of this tax from the back that ought to bear it to the back which ought not to bear it, and in the case of woollen socks it will have the effect of injuring two industries. I hope the committee will leave the duty as it stood in the Tariff.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Although Senator O'Connor was courteous enough to afford me an opportunity to explain the attitude I took up in reference to a matter which he mentioned, I think I am justified in reading a few lines from the report of my speech on that occasion. I said—

The moral of my observations is that the free-traders from New South Wales have to accept a policy which is so highly protective that we have been deliberately proposing duties of 20 and even 25 per cent. ad valorem, and 300 per cent. specific. When free-traders will advocate and vote for duties as high as 300 per cent., what paltry nonsense it is to profess that we are now to be seized with a spasm of free-trade virtue, and hack to pieces the few industries that are left to a State which has suffered more than any other by the reversal of its fiscal conditions and the destruction of its traditional policy . . . I have had taken from me the policy in which I believed, and now it is a question of degree, and not a question of principle. I shall not vote in favour of protection for the industries of Victoria and the other States, and deliberately set to work to take away every shred of fiscal advantage from industries which flourish in New South Wales.

I have never been a theoretical free-trader. I have never pored over books on free-trade. I do not think that I ever read such a book through, as I found them too dry. My views have been based on that which I thought was best for the country. I do not take any particular interest in the question of socks from the manufacturers' point of view, because I do not think that any are made in New South Wales. My only anxiety is not to place upon the consumer 1d. more of taxation than is needful.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Does not the honorable senator hope that these articles will be made in New South Wales?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I shall have no objection so long as the industry comes into existence under rational conditions. Surely the duty, which this side of the Chamber is supporting, is high enough to satisfy the most greedy of protectionists! Surely the duty, which is unwillingly agreed to by this side, ought to be high enough to enable any factory to flourish in New South Wales, if factories ever do flourish under fiscal conditions, which I seriously doubt. I think that the duty is eminently a high one. I cannot vote in the division, because I have paired, but my voice is given in favour of the lower rate of duty, believing it to be sufficiently high for revenue purposes, and if the manufacturing aspect is to be considered, abundantly high for manufacturing purposes.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—Unlike Senator Neild, I take a large interest in this proposal. The result of the vote on this item will to a very large extent determine the attitude I shall take in regard to the duty on yarns, which at my instance it was decided to ask the other House to reduce from 10 per cent. to 5 per cent. The position is largely affected by the action which the committee took on a previous occasion. Originally this line was included under the item of apparel, dutiable at 25 per cent.; but of course the effect of Senator Symon's proposal to strike out the word "cotton" was to subject socks and stockings to a duty of 10 per cent. I intend on this occasion to support the Government, in the hope of obtaining the higher duty of 25 per cent. I think that Senator Symon has made a mistake in this instance. If, instead of making a separate line of these articles dutiable at 15 per cent., he had proposed their inclusion under the head of attire, they would have been subject to a duty of 20 per cent. I desire to emphasize the position I took up previously in regard to yarns. No hosiery yarns are made in Australia. It is quite true that the Ballarat Worsted Company manufacture yarns, but their yarns are made for the sole purpose of manufacturing cloth. So far as that company is concerned, the manufacture of yarns does not affect the item of hosiery which is involved in the present proposal. It has been stated by Senator O'Connor that, since the duty was imposed, a yarn factory has been started by a company in New South Wales. The statement I have made in regard to the Ballarat Worsted Company applies equally to Messrs. Vickers and Company, of New South Wales, who only make yarns for the manufacture of cloth. I am informed on the best authority that their plant is not up-to-date. On a previous occasion I desired yarns to be made duty free, and, if the Government proposal is not carried, I intend, as far as possible, to adhere to the position I then took up. I desire, if possible, to give some relief to the hosiery manufacturers, who will have to pay, under the present proposal, the high duty of 10 per cent. That duty will not encourage the manufacture of yarns, because it is too low. Extensive machinery is requisite—not one plant alone, but a dozen sets of plants—for the manufacture of the many classes of yarns which are necessary, not only for the hosiery makers, but for the cloth manufacturers. For the purposes of protection a 10 per cent. duty is utterly useless. Consequently, the proposal of the Government will not help the hosiery makers. If Senator Symon had proposed a duty of 20 per cent. instead of 15 per cent., it would have brought the articles under the head of attire, and it would have been in conformity with his original proposal, because, under the circumstances in which we are placed, even supposing that he had proposed the higher duty of 20 per cent. on hosiery and a duty of 10 per cent. on yarns were carried in the Senate, it would have given an effective protection of only 10 per cent.

Senator CLEMONS.—We shall carry the 10 per cent. duty on yarns all right.

Senator BARRETT.—If that statement is correct, the result will be, if the proposal is for a 20 per cent. duty, an effective protection of 15 per cent.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator was content with a 5 per cent. duty when the duty on woollen socks was reduced to 10 per cent.

Senator BARRETT.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator moved for a 5 per cent. duty.

Senator BARRETT.—Owing to the peculiar position in which we found ourselves I wish to get the higher duty, and I believe that the result of the division will show that the committee is in favour of the higher duty, because in the previous division three of our supporters could not vote, and, if I remember aright, the proposal was carried by a majority of only one or two. But in the present case the position, I admit, is rather involved, and I intend to vote for the higher duty of 25 per cent. If that be carried I shall withdraw my opposition with regard to yarns. If, on the other hand, Senator Symon carries his proposal, I intend to attempt, as I did on a previous occasion, to keep the duty on yarns at 5 per cent.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD (Victoria).—We must all have listened with considerable interest to the statement made by the last speaker, who has placed the facts of the case before us fairly and accurately. There is, however, one point which I should have liked him to emphasize rather more, and that is that this duty on yarns is absolutely in the interest of only one firm of manufacturers in Victoria, and one small manufacturer in New South Wales. Those are manufacturers of yarns. If the duty proposed by the Government is passed it will mean that the manufacturers of woollens at Ballarat will have a handicap against all their competitors in the woollen trade. All the other manufacturers of woollen piece goods will have to pay 10 per cent. on their yarns, because they are not made here. May I also add that the Ballarat machinery, costing £9,000, was practically paid for by the Victorian Government in the shape of a bonus. It is well that these facts should be known. The Vice-President of the Executive Council made a great point about silk stockings, and asked how it was that they were to be taxed at the same rate as cottons.

Senator STYLES.—How long is it since the bonus referred to was paid?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Comparatively recently. It is probably not known to many honorable senators that, taking silk stockings and cotton stockings together, the cottons are as expensive as, and often more expensive than the silks; while the cotton goods are often much more expensive than the mixtures of silk and cotton. I also want to dwell upon the strong argument that was used both in another place and here, with regard to the difficulty of administering the Customs Act in regard to these mixed goods. When the duties on apparel were originally introduced by the Government, the duty on goods made partly of wool and partly of silk was 25 per cent., and the duty on goods made partly of other material was 20 per cent. In this form the Tariff was passed in the first instance by another place. As soon as this came to the notice of the merchants, and the difficulty in regard to passing entries at the Custom-house began, it was found practically impossible to distinguish between woollen goods and goods partly of wool and partly of silk. Consequently the House of Representatives made the duty 25 per cent., in the same way as we have now agreed to make the duty on both items 20 per cent. The leader of the House very properly pointed out that it was almost impossible fairly to administer the Tariff in this respect at the Custom-house if there was a different duty in regard to yarns. It is exactly the same with regard to woollen socks and stockings and cotton socks and stockings, except that here the difficulty is felt to a greater extent. Even experts in the trade have been deceived as to whether or not there has been a certain amount of silk in some so-called cotton or woollen stockings, and it is because of the absolute impossibility of administering the provision with justice that it has been proposed from this side of the Chamber that the duty should be 15 per cent. In passing, I may say that Senator Barrett suggested that 20 per cent. might be better. We objected to 20 per cent. for the reason that if we placed that rate of duty both on cotton and silk stockings we should be raising a larger amount of revenue than was required. A duty of 15 per cent. will give absolutely the same revenue as duties of 25 and 10 per cent. will give. Since this Tariff came into operation it was found that difficulties constantly arose, and as a matter of fact the whole trade in every one of the States petitioned that all socks and stockings should be taxed at the same rate, whatever it might be, in the same way as all gloves are taxed at the same rate. We do not make any distinction in this Tariff between cotton and silk gloves. Not only in Melbourne, but also in Adelaide, Sydney, Perth, and Hobart, the trade has urged, as a matter merely of convenience in administration, and in order to prevent evasion, that all socks and stockings shall be dutiable at the same rate. A deputation waited upon Mr. Kingston in reference to the matter. I saw him and placed all the facts and figures before him. I showed him that the revenue would not suffer in the slightest degree. We were sanguine that we had convinced him, but that was not so. Then we were thrown back on one of two courses—either to agree to the perpetuation of the 25 and 10 per cent. duties, with the consequent difficulties at the Custom-house, and the danger that traders would be forced to appear at the police-court charged with trying to evade the payment of duty when they were absolutely innocent; or to propose a lower uniform duty. It was because of that that we proposed that the duty be 15 per cent. We were quite willing to increase the rate on the cotton goods and decrease the rate on the woollens. That, I can assure honorable senators, is the only way in which that branch of the softgoods trade can be administered with justice to the honest trader and with something like comfort in the Custom-house. We ought to give a fair amount of protection to the manufacturers of woollen hosiery. It is not a large trade, but it is an increasing trade, and we hope that it will further increase. It concerns itself entirely with the lower category of goods. The finer duty on yarns, which at my instance it was decided to ask the other House to reduce from 10 per cent. to 5 per cent. The position is largely affected by the action which the committee took on a previous occasion. Originally this line was included under the item of apparel, dutiable at 25 per cent.; but of course the effect of Senator Symon's proposal to strike out the word "cotton" was to subject socks and stockings to a duty of 10 per cent. Senator BARRETT.—If that statement is correct, the result will be, if the proposal is for a 20 per cent. duty, an effective protection of 15 per cent.

A deputation waited upon Mr. Kingston in reference to the matter. I saw him and placed all the facts and figures before him. I showed him that the revenue would not suffer in the slightest degree. We were sanguine that we had convinced him, but that was not so. Then we were thrown back on one of two courses—either to agree to the perpetuation of the 25 and 10 per cent. duties, with the consequent difficulties at the Custom-house, and the danger that traders would be forced to appear at the police-court charged with trying to evade the payment of duty when they were absolutely innocent; or to propose a lower uniform duty. It was because of that that we proposed that the duty be 15 per cent. We were quite willing to increase the rate on the cotton goods and decrease the rate on the woollens. That, I can assure honorable senators, is the only way in which that branch of the softgoods trade can be administered with justice to the honest trader and with something like comfort in the Custom-house. We ought to give a fair amount of protection to the manufacturers of woollen hosiery. It is not a large trade, but it is an increasing trade, and we hope that it will further increase. It concerns itself entirely with the lower category of goods. The finer class of goods is not concerned. I have had interviews with the manufacturers, and I can say this absolutely: that so long as they get their yarns at 5 per cent., whilst the manufactured article is taxed at 15 per cent., leaving a margin of 10 per cent., they will be satisfied. Of course they would prefer to get their yarns, which are their raw material, free, but they are quite content with what I have stated. I have seen them and explained to them exactly what this side of the Chamber intended to propose. It must be borne in mind in connexion with this margin of 10 per cent. that the natural protection has also to be added. That natural protection will range from 8 to 15 per cent., so that the actual protection of the local manufacturer will run up to at least 25 per cent. I think that will be sufficient. In the interests of the trade, and also in the interests of the Custom-house and of the revenue, I strongly urge the committee to agree to Senator Symon's proposal.

Question—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the motion—put. The committee divided.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Senator Sir Frederick Sargood.

Item 71, Yarns, ad valorem, 10 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 5 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

I have already explained this matter in dealing with the last item. There are very strong reasons why the duty on these yarns should be 10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent., for at the latter rate no protection would be afforded. If any protection is to be given, surely it should be something which will have a beneficial effect and will help an industry, instead of being merely a delusion and a snare.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I should like to point out to the committee that if this duty is allowed to remain there will be an effective protection of only 5 per cent.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The honorable senator is assuming that ultimately the duty on the previous item will be fixed at 15 per cent.

Senator BARRETT.—I am assuming that we have agreed that the duty shall be 15 per cent.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is only a request.

Senator BARRETT.—If it is modified we shall have again to review our vote on this item, but I am assuming for the time being that the committee have effectively dealt with it. I have, therefore, to face the question of what should be the effective protection given to this industry. I desire my attitude to be clearly and distinctively understood. If any information can be brought forward to disprove the statements which I have already put before the committee, I shall at once vote for the retention of this duty.

Senator PLAYFORD. — What about the Sydney mill?

Senator BARRETT.—That factory only manufactures yarns for cloth.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is contrary to the information which the Collector of Customs has obtained.

Senator BARRETT.—I have obtained my information from Thos. Murray and Co., of Richmond, who are the largest manufacturers of this class of goods in Australia. They tell me that Mr. Vickers, who has erected the plant in New South Wales to which reference has been made, recently paid a visit to their factory, and explained the extent of his plant, and the work upon which he was engaged. I do not desire to strike a blow at any industry that exists in Australia, and if any one can disprove the statement I have made, and the authority which I have given for it, I shall vote with the Government. But honorable senators will see at once that if that statement is correct, the establishment of the New South Wales factory does not affect the manufacture of hosiery, and a duty of 10 per cent. upon the raw material is altogether too high. Having endeavoured without success to support the position taken up by the Government with reference to the last item, and seeing that the committee is against my views, I have to adopt the next best course, and that is to assist in obtaining a reduction of the duty on yarns to 5 per cent. I was originally in favour of the free importation of these yarns, but on the ground of revenue I sank my convictions for the time being, and split the difference with the Government. In the circumstances, if this duty stands, the manufacturers of hosiery will have a protection of only 5 per cent., which is totally inadequate; but if we are successful in reducing this duty to 5 per cent., those engaged in the manufacture of hosiery will have an effective protection of 10 per cent. I frankly place before the committee the reasons for the attitude taken up by me.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Item 78, Manufactures of Metal, viz.:—Agricultural, horticultural, and viticultural machinery and implements, u.e.i., . . . ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 10 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

I take it that all the items relating to machinery and manufactures of metal stand upon the same footing, and it, therefore, becomes very important when considering the first of them that the matter should be fully placed before the committee. I do not intend to repeat the arguments, and the facts which have been fully stated upon other occasions. There is no necessity to do so, because I am certain that every honorable senator is fully aware of everything that could be said upon the merits. What we have to consider now is whether the views which have been held before by honorable senators should be modified, as I think they ought to be, by the position in which we now find ourselves—a position in which it is necessary to come to an agreement. I urge that the request should not be pressed upon the ground that the experience of Australia and other countries where these industries have been successful, has invariably been that they cannot flourish without a substantial amount of protection. In these circumstances, I say that the duty proposed by the Government is the lowest at which anything like real protection can be given. The Customs officers in New South Wales have made a report setting forth that, so far as that State is concerned, no reduction in this duty can be made without injury to these industries.

Senator PULSFORD.—In a matter like this, is it right to introduce quotations from reports of Customs officers?

Senator O'CONNOR.—Why not?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think it is right for a Customs officer to express an opinion upon a question of policy.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It is right for him to make inquiries as to whether the conditions of an industry are such that it can be successful with or without a certain duty. It may be a question of policy whether a duty should be increased or reduced, but it is a question of fact whether an industry can succeed under a duty. That is a question of fact upon which a Minister can cause inquiries to be made by his officers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is not for the Customs officers to determine.

Senator O'CONNOR. — The Customs officers have not determined it. They have reported upon the facts just as any other fact might be reported upon by a Government officer.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is an opinion, not a fact.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Is it not the case that a Government has frequently to obtain the opinions of its officers? If a question of policy were involved, the Government would not be justified in doing so.

Senator DAWSON.—Supposing the officers in this case had expressed an opinion in favour of free-trade?

Senator O'CONNOR.—That opinion certainly would have been given. We shall very much restrict the operations of the Government if we say that no Government officer ought to make a report which involves an expression of opinion.

Senator Major GOULD.—On a matter of policy.

Senator O'CONNOR.—But that is not involved, and the honorable and learned senator's interjection shows the confusion of mind into which he and some other honorable senators have fallen. It is, first of all, a question of fact whether a certain duty is sufficient to enable a manufacturer to prosper. That fact is made up of a number of other facts, and the ascertainment of those facts is a mere matter of inquiry, which any officer should be able to carry out. The comparison is a mere matter of arithmetic. It is extremely hypercritical of an honorable senator to attempt to discount the value of this report by asserting that it involves a matter of policy. I shall have to hear a great deal more than I have heard by way of interjections on the part of my honorable friends before I shall be convinced that there has been anything more in the obtaining of this report than there is in obtaining a report upon any other matter for the information of the Government. I do not intend to go into the merits of this matter. If we are to have a settlement at all upon these matters, there must be some concession on the part of the Senate, and the Senate can only take that course by carrying the motion I have moved.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is only right at the outset to say that I entirely dissent from the view expressed with so much animation by Senator O'Connor in respect of the propriety of inviting Customs officers to report as to what measure of protection will be necessary to continue an existing industry, or establish a new one. In my view that is utterly outside the scope of the duties of a Customs officer, and I think moreover that any Minister who invites a Customs officer to enter upon any such investigation is doing a grave injustice to the officer, and is placing him in a position of embarrassment which he ought not to occupy. A Customs officer's functions are to administer the law. He is an administrative officer, and is not an advisory officer as to the extent to which a duty of 10 or 15 per cent. will encourage or maintain a particular manufacture. The difficulty we have had throughout in this Parliament has been to settle that knotty problem. Honorable members on the opposite side differ from honorable members on this side, and the whole controversy throughout the prolonged discussions of this Tariff has been, from the point of view of protection, as to whether 10, 15, 20, or 25 per cent. affords a fair and reasonable measure of protection. Yet we are asked to bring into the arena Customs officers who are in the pay of the Government of the day, in a sense, and who, by their report, may place themselves in a position of antagonism to one set of manufacturers, and in a position of favoritism to others. I do not desire to enter upon a discussion of this kind unduly, but I say I do regret that in a debate in this, or in any other Chamber, a report of a Customs officer has been mentioned in any way with a view to influence the debate as to the extent of protection necessary to maintain an industry. On this particular line I feel there is nothing of which the Senate may be more proud than in having reduced this duty to 10 per cent. So far as I am concerned, I intend to stand by this loyally, and I say that personally I shall never be found consenting to any further burden being imposed upon the agriculturists in respect of the machinery they have to use. If there is one item in the Tariff in connexion with which the producers, the men upon the soil of this country, may fairly look to have some degree of generous remission extended to them, it is this item of agricultural machinery. I say that if the Senate never did another thing in connexion with this Tariff than the lowering of this duty to 10 per cent., the rate suggested by our request, we shall have done the greatest possible service to the producing interests of this country. I do trust that the duty will be maintained exactly as the committee of the Senate, after a most prolonged and exhaustive debate, have agreed to fix it. The history of the matter shows that the greatest possible care was taken to do justice and to be moderate, to be fair to the agriculturist, and to be at the same time fair to those who are embarked in the machine-making industry. It was first proposed that the duty should be $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that was only lost by an equal vote. But for the constitutional rule, $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. would probably have been the rate fixed. I am not prepared to say that wiser counsels in that particular did not prevail. At any rate, the spirit of moderation prevailed, and practically another compromise was adopted when the 10 per cent. duty was imposed, and was carried by a majority of four votes. I mention that for this reason: Even in the House of Representatives there is a spirit abroad in relation to this matter that bodes well for the treatment that the agriculturist will receive. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether the duties upon produce which have been referred to are merely illusory; whether they are, I will not say galls to the farmer, but a means adopted for deluding the farmer; but here there is a substantial concession, about which there can be no particle of doubt. In the House of Representatives a feeling of fair play in this respect is abroad, and I welcome it and rejoice in it. I find that this request of the Senate, which was agreed to here by a majority of four votes, was declined by the House of Representatives by a majority of only three. I say that the House of Representatives, having displayed this spirit of moderation as indicated by that insignificant majority, will probably feel that it would have been better to have accepted the request we made. The attitude of honorable members of that House, and their language used in regard to our requests, have shown a regard for the constitutional position which the Senate occupies. I believe myself there is spirit of conciliation there. The reasons for the requests of the Senate were either not discussed at all, or were discussed in a most perfunctory way, and it is possible that honorable members in another place overlooked the considerations which were most exhaustively dealt with in the committee of the Senate. I feel certain that, if they have an opportunity to consider them by the light of a comparison, if honorable senators please, between the majorities in the respective Houses, they will be found to agree with our views, and to admit that the rate of duty at which we arrived after an exhaustive debate, and in a spirit of wise moderation, is a fair one, and should be accepted. That is all I desire to say. Read by the light of what was done here, and by the light of the voting as shown in the records of the two Houses, the motion of Senator O'Connor that we should not press our request in this matter is, from my point of view, indefensible.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I do not think the honorable and learned senator is quite correct in saying that this request of the Senate was discussed in a perfunctory manner by the other Chamber. I have no fault to find with his statement as to the numbers in the division, but if the honorable and learned senator will turn to Hansard, he will find that our request was very fairly discussed in the other House. It is perfectly true that honorable members of the other Chamber did not repeat all the arguments previously used. Why should they? What earthly good could result from a repetition of arguments which have been urged over and over again? They did not do that, it is true, but they discussed the matter very fairly, indeed, in the light of the request made, and they deliberately came to the conclusion that the duty should not be less than 15 per cent. We can see clearly, from the debate, that the reason which animated them was that they considered it highly important and beneficial to the country that the agricultural implements required to be used, should be manufactured in Australia in preference to being obtained from Germany and America. The debate in another place, if read fairly, brings one to the conclusion that that was a consideration which weighed with honorable members in another place. Apart from that, the quality of the implement should enter into the consideration of the subject, and we know that the quality of implements made in Australia is equal, if not superior, to that of the imported article. It must be a very great advantage to a young community like this to have industries of this kind established in its midst in preference to obtaining these implements from outside. I think that that consideration which weighed so greatly with members of the House of Representatives should have equal weight with honorable senators. This is a matter in connexion with which we certainly ought to meet the House of Representatives by declining to press our request.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I do not intend to take up the time of the committee at any very great length. When this question was before us on a previous occasion, I dealt with it as well as I could, and I desire now, before we again come to a decision, to place before the committee certain information which I have obtained in the hope of inducing honorable senators who are prepared to listen to it to alter the decision previously arrived at. Some honorable senators smile at the statement, but if they are not prepared to weigh evidence, and if they have blindly made up their minds in such a way as to destroy a certain industry, I do not desire that they should listen to me. Honorable senators who appreciate the gravity of the responsibility which rests upon them, should be prepared to listen to any information which may be presented to them, and to weigh it carefully before coming to a decision. It is because I feel very earnestly upon this matter, and because I know that this proposal of honorable senators opposite will utterly wipe out the agricultural machinery industry of Australia, that I trouble the committee with further facts which have come under my notice. Those who know anything of the subject know that there never was a more serious position facing the workers in this industry than that facing them at the present moment. The factories are almost idle, and workmen for months past have been walking the streets, because of the uncertainty that exists in regard to this Tariff. Agricultural implements are being imported wholesale, and if we are not prepared to give a substantial amount of protection to the men engaged in this industry, the result must be that they will be compelled to walk the streets. Again I ask honorable senators, who treat this matter very lightly, what are these men to do?

Senator CLEMONS.—They will leave Victoria like the rest.

Senator BARRETT.—Let me tell the honorable and learned senator that they will not only leave Victoria, but they will leave the Commonwealth.

Senator CLEMONS.—They will go to Western Australia where other Victorians have gone.

Senator BARRETT.—It has been stated here before that this is a Victorian industry, but I intend to submit the united statement to all the agricultural implement makers in Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Queensland. These gentlemen, who know something about their business, say that the industry is in peril, that if the 10 per cent. duty is carried they will have to become importers, and their men will be thrown out of employment.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is 10 per cent. more than they ever had in New South Wales.

Senator BARRETT.—Has the honorable senator made any inquiry as to the condition of the industry in New South Wales? Although he is a representative of that State he does not know what is going on there.

Senator PULSFORD.—I know that there is a terrific drought there.

Senator BARRETT.—The honorable senator does not know what the local manufacturers in this case desire. On several occasions he has asked—"What are they doing in Sydney? What is the Clyde Engineering Company doing? What are we doing in regard to agricultural implements? We have brought our manufactures to a state of perfection without a duty, and we do not need a duty." Let us hear the views of the Clyde Engineering Company, which, I may say, is the largest company of the kind in New South Wales, and possibly all the people engaged in this industry have not the great interests at stake which it has. In the first telegram I received from its manager, Mr. Walter M. North, he says—

Require 20 per cent.; unable as manufacturers of harvesters to compete with importations.

In a later telegram he says —

We have not absolutely withdrawn from manufacturing harvesters, but 20 per cent. is wanted to enable us to compete with importations. Would go to Melbourne on Monday or later if I would be of service.

Senator Major GOULD.—So that the 15 per cent. duty proposed by the Government will be useless?

Senator BARRETT.—Fifteen per cent. is not useless. There is a great difference between 20 and 10 per cent.; the mean between 10 and 20 per cent. is 15 per cent.; and if possible, we wish to give a protection of 15 per cent., and by that means save their industry, and wait for future events to give them the protection which they need. If honorable senators had only studied the question in the light of what was done in Canada, they would see at once the possibilities which lie before us in the case of this industry. But what do they say? They turn round and tell us that, if a high duty is imposed, the result will be that the farmers will have to pay more for their implements, that protection enhances the cost, and, consequently, that low duties mean low prices. In order to convince them that they are wrong in making that statement, I propose to quote from the price-lists of Massey-Harris and Co., of Melbourne and Sydney. My point is that protection does not increase the prices.

Senator PULSFORD.—What is the good of it, then?

Senator BARRETT.—I know that I am touching the honorable senator in a sore place, but if he is not impervious this afternoon, I shall prove conclusively to him that the importers have robbed the New South Wales farmers in the past, when they had a free port; and speaking in the light of experience, I believe they will rob the farmers in the future if Parliament gives them the opportunity to do so. I make that strong statement in cool blood, and I shall proceed to prove its correctness. It is very difficult to get the price-lists of firms operating in Sydney and Melbourne. The price-lists of Massey-Harris and Co., which I am about to quote, are for the year 1899. It was not possible for me to get their price-lists of a later date, but that does not affect the point I am making, which is, that notwithstanding that Sydney was a free port and the terminus of the steamers—which of course cheapens the freight—that firm charged exactly the same price to the New South Wales farmers as to the Victorian farmers. According to the price-lists, in some cases the firm charged more for the same article in New South Wales than in Victoria, while in many instances exactly the same price was charged in the two States. For instance, in certain cases their charges were as follow:—

	Victoria.	New South Wales.
13 Hoe and grain fertilizer ...	£35, £37	... £35, £37
13-tooth cultivator	£16, £17	... £16, £17
17-tooth cultivator	£18, £19	... £18, £19
Diamond harrow, No. 3 ...	£4	... £4
Diamond harrow, No. 4 ...	£5 10s.	... £5 10s.
Diamond harrow, No. 5 ...	£7	... £7
Disc harrow — 13 discs marked G (reversible) ...	£11, £11 10s.	... £11, £11 10s.
Disc harrow — 14 discs (not reversible) ...	£11, £11 10s.	... £11, £11 10s.
Jubilee two-furrow plough...	£17, £18	... £17, £18
Jubilee three-furrow plough	£23 10s., £25	... £23 10s., £25

These are only a few instances which I have picked out for my own convenience. If my free-trade friends in New South Wales are open to conviction, they can take the two price-lists and see numerous examples of the kind, showing conclusively that in the past the farmers of their State have been robbed by the importers. Whether you impose a duty of 15 per cent. or 20 per cent., or have a free port, they are prepared to ask the same price for the articles they manufacture. I have also another document which I am going to read.

Senator DAWSON.—Has the honorable senator never heard of rings and combines among manufacturers?

Senator BARRETT.—That sort of argument will not do here. These facts are too clear and patent, and if my honorable friends can explain the position, they are at perfect liberty to do so. I have given the facts and drawn my deductions from them, and if I am wrong I shall be very glad if honorable senators opposite can prove that to be the case. But I believe that the position is of such a character that it cannot be shaken. I now wish to bring forward another document in support of the position which I advanced on a previous occasion. I am going to let the manufacturers of Australia speak for themselves. I hold in my hand a circular letter that has been drawn up by the following firms:—

May Brothers, Gawler, South Australia; Martin and Co., Gawler, South Australia; Bagshaw and Son, Adelaide ; Shearer Brothers, Adelaide ; Clyde Engineering Company, Sydney ; Meadowbank Manufacturing Company, Sydney ; Henderson and Son, Corowa ; T. Robinson and Company, Melbourne ; Nicholson and Morrow, Melbourne ; H. V. McKay, Ballarat ; Hugh Lennon Company, Melbourne ; Mitchell and Co., Melbourne ; Cliff and Bunting, Melbourne ; Beard and Sisson, Melbourne ; Braybrook Implement Company, Melbourne ; S. Gibson, Melbourne.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator spoke of a Western Australian firm.

Senator BARRETT.—These firms which I have quoted are practically all the firms of implement makers existing in Australia who carry on business to any large extent. I may explain that originally this document came to me in the form of a petition, but as it was not jointly signed by all those interested in it, it could not be presented as a petition. It was simply signed by three or four people on behalf of the firms. As it was not in order in the form of a petition, I will give it to the committee as information for their use. These firms put the case better than any one else could have put it in their behalf. They say—

Sir,—With reference to the Tariff Bill now before the Senate for further consideration, and more particularly that portion dealing with the duty on agricultural, horticultural, and viticultural machinery, we, the undersigned, being a committee of the trade representing the following manufacturers of agricultural machinery in the Commonwealth—desire to point out that the proposed rate of duty on agricultural machinery, namely, 15 per cent. is a reasonable one and should receive the support of honorable senators. During the debate on this item which took place in the Senate, many statements were made which we think require explanation, and we will now briefly refer to them.

1. It was stated that in the colony of New Zealand the manufacturers of agricultural machinery were enabled to carry on business there without a protective duty. This statement is hardly correct, as it is a well-known fact in the trade here, and, indeed, the statement has been made by one of the leading manufacturers in New Zealand, that when the duty was taken off agricultural implements there some years ago, the local manufacturers had to relinquish manufacturing as they could not compete with the foreign made articles, and they were forced into becoming importers of these goods instead of making them in the colony as they did formerly.

I should like also to inform the committee that this is exactly the position that is taking place now in Victoria. I know a very large firm in Elizabeth-street, Melbourne, who are being forced into the position, because of the condition of the trade, of becoming importers and agents for American firms, and as sure as the duty is reduced to 10 per cent. that will be the result which will follow in regard to all the other firms in the Commonwealth. We cannot compete with the Canadian firms because they have been long established and are able to send their goods all over the world at a very cheap rate.

In Australia the vast majority of crops of grain are garnered by the complete harvester or stripper and winnower, which machines have been invented and perfected by Australian manufacturers to suit the requirements of the Australian farmer. New Zealand is a country where the reaper and binder is exclusively used in the process of harvesting, and the complete harvester and stripper and winnower are practically unknown machines, because of their unsuitability to the climatic conditions of the country. The reaper and binder has always been admitted free of duty into all the States of the Commonwealth prior to federation. The relative cost of garnering grain by the reaper and binder is 9s. per acre, and by the complete harvester 1s. 6d. per acre, and it will be conceded that the Australian farmer has a great deal to be thankful for to the Australian manufacturers, because but for this machine he could not have made wheat-growing a profitable industry owing to the low prices which prevail. It will be seen, therefore, that the New Zealand manufacturers have not been called upon to use their inventive faculties for the purpose of producing a machine for the economic garnering of grain for the reason already given ; consequently their case is hardly on all fours with ours. The same remark applies to ploughs and other important farming implements, as the farmer knows the locally-made article is the best and most durable, but it is in the underselling that the foreign manufacturer gets the advantage, as we will now proceed to show.

(2) The statement has been made that implements admitted free of duty cheapen their cost to the farmer, and that a protective duty relatively enhances their cost, but we submit that whatever may be the theory it is not worked out by fact.

Unfortunately that is the case when we apply many of the theories of honorable senators opposite to our actual experience. These theories are often very nice in themselves, but when they are reduced to practice we find that they prove impracticable, and very often totally useless.

Take the case of the reaper and binder to which we have previously referred. This implement has always been admitted duty free, and yet it is an absolute fact that a few years ago it was sold to farmers at £65, whereas now the same machine can be purchased at from £25 to £35. What is the cause of this great difference in the price ? Certainly not the cheaper means of manufacturing in America, as the ruling wholesale price there has always been about £19 to £21 per machine, but the reason of the reduction is the extraordinarily keen competition existing between the various American firms and combines which have come amongst us during the past few years, each with a seeming determination to monopolize the trade in Australia.

That is where the cheapness will come in. But protect our local agricultural implement manufacturers, and the competition between them will reduce their prices to the lowest degree.

Some years ago the manufacturers of New Zealand used to make reapers and binders under a protective duty, and notwithstanding the fact that at that time the same machines were admitted duty free in Australia, they were sold at a much lower price in New Zealand. This continued to be the case until the duty was removed, when the local manufacturers were obliged to cease manufacturing, and, as a result, almost immediately afterwards, the price of the machines was raised by the importers to that obtained in the Australian markets.

That is a very old game. Crush out the local article, and then the price of the machine goes up, as it will do if honorable senators opposite are successful on this occasion in imposing only a revenue duty upon these machines. The local manufacture will be strangled, and at once the price of all these articles will go up. The farmer will not be benefited, but on the contrary will suffer severely.

It will thus be seen that the competition keeps the prices right for the farmer, and the rate of duty we ask is to enable us to compete in some measure with the foreign manufacturer, whose object is to monopolize trade, and create combines which when established have no consideration whatever as regards prices for the consumer. The American manufacturers have of late years exploited our markets, they have sent to their works samples of our locally made implements of all descriptions, and have copied them, and they are now competing with these imitations of our goods. This, we submit, is unfair competition, and as our factories have been established in the Commonwealth at a very great expense, we are entitled to some consideration. The decision of the Senate will materially affect the interests of some thousands of work-people in the Commonwealth, and we trust they will agree to allow the duty of 15 per cent. on agricultural implements to remain.

This letter is signed by the firms which I mentioned at an earlier stage in my speech, and they comprise the whole of the agricultural implement manufacturers in Australia of any note. I regret that there has not been a larger attendance of honorable senators to hear what I have to urge at this critical stage of our proceedings. Many honorable senators appear to have made up their minds, and they are not prepared to listen to reasonable arguments which may be advanced to induce them to retrace their steps.

Senator PEARCE.—There are four protectionists and seven free-traders listening at the present time to the honorable senator.

Senator BARRETT.—That accounts for only eleven out of 36 honorable senators. My remarks apply equally to free-traders and protectionists alike, and the result of the division on this item, together with any other which may take place in these circumstances, will guide me in determining what attitude I shall adopt when the critical moment comes to consider the Tariff as a whole. This is the first occasion during the present week upon which I have spoken, so that I have not inflicted myself upon the committee. I am here to-day to discharge a public duty—to plead for the working men of Australia, and those who have embarked their capital in this industry—and I do hope that, even at this late hour, honorable senators opposite will agree not to press this request. I suppose, however, that the matter has already been determined in caucus. Where is the leader of the Opposition, and where are his supporters? If they have already made up their minds upon this question, it is hardly worth while bringing forward evidence to show why the committee should not press this request. I have, however, discharged my duty. I feel just as keenly upon this question as if I were personally affected by it, because I am in sympathy with those who earn their living in this industry. Most of us have been workmen. Most of us have worked in shops and factories, and we know what has been the effect of a change of Tariff upon our industry.

Senator DAWSON.—We know what has been the result of our failure to make a change on finding out that we have made a mistake.

Senator BARRETT.—We shall make a mistake if we press our request to reduce this duty. I trust that the committee may be led to see the wisdom of retaining the duty of 15 per cent., and giving some protection to Australian workmen and those who have embarked their capital in this industry.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I regret very much that there was not a larger attendance of honorable senators to hear the speech just delivered by Senator Barrett, for he really succeeded in showing very clearly that our request should be affirmed. The honorable senator produced his authorities, and drew from them the deduction that under a free-trade Tariff in New South Wales the importers have robbed their customers. Even if we admit that the New South Wales importers are brigands and thieves of the first water, and that they will continue to be thieves—that it is in their nature, and that they cannot help it—the honorable senator has not shown that by retaining the duty of 15 per cent. upon this machinery, we shall make honest men of them, and lead them to deal fairly with their customers. The experience of the civilized world is that more honest dealing is secured under free and open competition than it is possible to obtain in countries where trade is restricted—that if there is any set of fiscal circumstances which lends itself to rings and combines, it is that associated with a high protective policy. So far as this argument is concerned, I think that Senator Barrett completely answered himself, and a proper consideration of his statements should lead him to change his opinion.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Where there is a monopoly of a market either by manufacturers or importers the same thing occurs.

Senator DAWSON.—Surely Senator O'Connor will realize that it is easier for monopolists to operate in a highly protective State—because of the comparative smallness of their numbers—than it is for them to do so with an open port.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It works both ways.

Senator DAWSON.—But not with the same facility. The honorable and learned senator must see that it would be much easier to form a combine within the Commonwealth, to work disastrously against the interests of those who deal with it, than to form a combine extending throughout the rest of the civilized world to operate within the Commonwealth.

Senator O'CONNOR.—We know what has actually taken place.

Senator DAWSON.—We do not know that there is a ring existing in the rest of the civilized world to fleece the consumers in the Commonwealth. We have seen a manifestation of the operation of a ring on a small scale in a highly protective State in Australia.

Senator STYLES.—Will the honorable senator give one instance of a combine in Victoria?

Senator DAWSON.—I think that the honorable senator mentioned one when the Tariff was previously before us.

Senator STYLES.—That was a ring of coal importers in New South Wales.

Senator DAWSON.—I notice that those who favour a high Tariff have on every possible occasion put forward the idea—whether it has been apropos or not—that it is utterly impossible for anything Australian to compete with manufactures from abroad. They seem to consider that the people of Australia are like helpless babes. It appears to me that we are often afraid to try to compete with importations from abroad; and that we anticipate failure almost before we make a start. I fail to see why we should not be able to succeed in any direction. We have been considering what duty, if any, should govern the importation of food-stuffs produced by the very class which will benefit by the reduction of this duty. It has been urged by Senator O'Connor, and those who support him, that it is absolutely necessary for the salvation of our farmers to impose high protective duties upon agricultural products, because it is impossible for them to produce, in open competition with the producers of other parts of the world, a sufficient quantity of foodstuffs and of the right quality to feed our own people. If that statement be true, and if it be true, as asserted by Senator Stewart, that it is our bounden duty to do all that we can to enable our farmers to stand upon an equal footing with those of other countries, I would remind those honorable senators that they have now a suitable opportunity to give the farmers of the Commonwealth the advantage of the best brains, not only of Australia, but of the whole of the civilized world. Whatever machinery is necessary to till the soil and to reap the produce should be in the hands of our farmers as speedily and as cheaply as possible. Instead of urging that we cannot compete with foreign competitors, we should strive for a maximum of production at a minimum of cost. We have the rich soil, and we have the area. We have an industrious and an intelligent people, who compare favourably with the people of any other country, and with our natural protection, I think we can stand against any one who may seek to compete with us.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It would be a shame to say anything else.

Senator DAWSON. — I think too much of my fellow Australian citizens to say anything to the contrary.

Senator DE LARGIE. — Then why is the honorable senator afraid to allow the Chinese to enter into competition with the people of Australia?

Senator DAWSON. — Surely there is a difference between the standard of civilization of the Chinese and the white man? Senator Barrett dilated this afternoon upon the harvester, or some agricultural implement of great benefit to the agriculturist. He told us that it reduced the cost of production, and that it was a purely Australian invention, but a smart Yankee appears to have got hold of it, and is manufacturing it largely in America, and selling it with great advantage to himself here in Australia. I should like to know what that has to do with the question of whether the duty in this instance should be 10 per cent. or 15 per cent.? It appears to me that the man who had brains enough to invent this particular implement did not possess enough everyday horse sense to secure himself against the Yankee. Senator Barrett seems to think that this has been due to the laxity of the patent laws of America, but surely we have our own patent laws, and this instrument could not be palmed off as an American patent if it had been properly patented in Victoria.

Senator PEARCE.—The American patent laws are the best in the world.

Senator DAWSON.—They have always been supposed to be, but I understood Senator Barrett to claim that it was because of their laxity that this mischief had been done. Another matter to which I think immediate attention should be directed is the present condition of this industry in Australia, and particularly in Victoria. Senator Barrett informs us that the position of affairs is so bad that a large number of the factories and foundries are closed, and that many men who ought to be working full time and earning ample wages are in consequence unable to do so. While the honorable senator and those who think with him, or at least vote with him, do not explicitly say so, they leave it to be understood, and I believe they understand it to be so themselves, that the reason why these factories are closed, or are not working full time, is because a particular percentage of duty is proposed under this Tariff, 10 per cent. instead of 15 per cent. as collected now. I say emphatically that that has nothing whatever to do with it. I should like to have a plain and unmistakable statement from these honorable senators that it is because the House of Representatives cannot secure a duty of 15 per cent. rather than of 10 per cent. upon this item that these factories are closed in Victoria. Surely no one has the temerity at this hour of the day to doubt the truth of what appears in our daily newspapers? Yet when we read them we find that it is not the difference between 10 and 15 per cent. duty upon agricultural machinery which is causing these factories to be closed. I am sure that Senator Barrett has not only read it, but has also heard from respectable citizens of Victoria, that it is the fact that it is the Factories Act which is in full operation in this State that is responsible for everything, including the drought. I am given to understand that the great depression existing in Queensland, and the closing of factories there, has been brought about because the Commonwealth Parliament has passed an Anti-Kanaka Act, and in New South Wales people are satisfied that all existing evils are due generally to federation. We have had all these reasons given to account for depression, and now Senator Barrett wishes us to believe that the depression in this industry is due to a possible difference between 10 per cent. and 15 per cent., and to the fact that the Senate appears to be determined that the duty on agricultural implements shall be 10 per cent.

Senator DRAKE.—That was not his argument. He says that a duty which will keep importations out will stimulate the trade.

Senator DAWSON.—The reduced duty is not yet in operation, and yet we are told that the factories are closed. What warrant is there for believing that an extra 5 per cent. of duty will cause an additional hand to be employed in Victoria or any other State?

Senator BARRETT.—It will stop importations from America. At present the manufacturers are afraid to manufacture implements because they fear that they will be swamped by American importations.

Senator DAWSON.—How is it the market is not swamped now? The 15 per cent. is still collected. My opinion is that if the Australian farmer is to supply the local market, and to meet the demands of those engaged in other occupations at a reasonable rate and at a profit to himself, and if at the same time he is to stand healthy competition from outside the Commonwealth, the first thing we must do for him is to afford him every opportunity of getting the most he can possibly get out of his land at the lowest possible cost. One of the best methods of doing that is to put into his hands the most modern, up-to-date, and cheapest implements it is possible to give him. If we say that he is not to use implements made outside of Australia, our duty is not to carp and haggle over a difference of 5 per cent. If that is the idea, honorable senators should not contend for a duty of 15 per cent. They should make no mistake whatever about it, but should bring about total prohibition by imposing a duty of 500 per cent. If the farmer is to have a plough we should make it as easy as possible for him to get it, and if we can do so, while at the same time having a kindly consideration for the revenue, by pressing the request of the Senate, and by fixing the duty at 10 per cent. we shall strike the happy medium.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—I had nothing to say on the items of machinery when they were previously before the committee; but as this is one of the most important of the items remaining in dispute between the two Houses, I desire to say a word or two upon it. In voting for a duty of 15 per cent. when the matter was previously before us, I was guided by several reasons. One was that I believed that before a uniform Tariff for Australia could be passed in the Commonwealth Parliament, there must be a great deal of give and take. Under this head the duty as first proposed in the House of Representatives was 25 per cent. After a long fight it was reduced to 20 per cent., and after a second long fight it was further reduced to 15 per cent., and under the circumstances, I think the duty as adopted by the other House might be considered a very fair compromise as between free-traders and protectionists. I do not suppose that there is a member in either House of the Federal Parliament who has had more to do with extensive mining undertakings than the honorable member for Kooyong, Mr. Knox. No member of either House has been more deeply interested during the last 25 or 30 years in the biggest Australian mining concerns, and yet he was prepared to accept the motion finally reducing the duty upon mining machinery to 15 per cent.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is there a member of either House who knows less about politics?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We do not accept Mr. Knox's guidance.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Honorable senators seem to be perturbed by the mention of Mr. Knox's name. That gentleman was satisfied that bed rock had been reached at 15 per cent. As a man personally interested in the imposition of the lowest possible duty for mining machinery, Mr. Knox was satisfied to accept a duty of 15 per cent.

Senator DAWSON.—He spoke of mining machinery only, and he had no warrant from any public body for what he said.

Senator O'KEEFE.—He had the warrant of his own pocket and his own interests, and that is a pretty good warrant for any man.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that Mr. Knox was actuated by a consideration for his own interests?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Men are often actuated, to a certain extent, by a consideration for their own interests. I should not, of course, like to say that any honorable senators in this committee would be so actuated, but reductions of duties have been supported here in the case of articles in which some honorable senators have been interested. If we are ever to get finality, and to pass a uniform Tariff for the different States, there must be some give and take; and I believe that 15 per cent. is as low a duty as we can reasonably expect the makers of machinery in Australia to accept. Speaking for myself, almost since I was as high as the table, I have been interested in mining and mining fields; and, in a small way, a reduction of the duty from 15 to 10 per cent. might favourably affect me.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We are dealing now with agricultural machinery.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is so, but I take it that the whole of this discussion relates to machinery, and whatever is said upon the first item will apply to those which follow, seeing that the Senate has already made a uniform request in connexion with the duty upon all machinery.

Senator CLEMONS.—There is a little place called Tasmania where this machinery was admitted free.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Agricultural machinery was admitted free there, but there was a duty of 10 per cent. upon mining machinery. Why the difference? I believe that agricultural machinery should not be placed on a better footing than mining machinery.

Senator PEARCE. — We do not propose that.

Senator O'KEEFE. — The Opposition propose to adhere to the request for a 10 per cent. duty all round. I would deal with the machinery duties as a whole. I submit that the other House had arrived at a very fair compromise when it reduced the duty from 25 to 20, and eventually to 15 per cent. Although I am interested in the mining industry, and have no interest in the manufacturing industry, I consider that Parliament will be doing a very bad thing for the workers of Australia if it reduces the duty to a point which will injure the latter. The machinery manufacturers cannot suffer, and their men be thrown out of work without indirectly injuring the workers in the mining industry. If men are thrown out of the machinery factories, to what places will they go? They will go to the mines as unskilled labourers and bring down the rate of wages, as has been done over and over again. I know that it has been done in Tasmania. I do not think that any representative of Western Australia will deny that when men are thrown out of work and cannot get employment at their own trade, the tendency is for them to go to the mining fields. I am satisfied that, from the Australian point of view, it will be better to fix this duty at 15 per cent. It has been clearly shown that nothing less than that rate will allow very many of these factories to be carried on. It will be very difficult, indeed, for any honorable senators to controvert the figures and the facts which were submitted by Senator Barrett. If we are going to hold out the olive branch let it be done in connexion with some item on which the other House has compromised to a very large extent. Surely no one will deny that in this case a very big compromise has been made between two sets of opinions. If there is no chance of the other House accepting our request—and I do not believe there is—what position will honorable senators be in then? They will be in exactly the same position then as they are in now. If they wish to get a uniform Tariff they might as well give way now as yield then.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why? The request was carried by a majority of four, and in the other House it was dissented from by a majority of only three.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable and learned senator ought not to ask that question, because, as leader of the free-trade party here, he knows perfectly well that an enormous compromise was made between the free-traders and the protectionists in the other House.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; the statement is absolutely without foundation.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That statement is only in accordance with many others which the honorable and learned senator has made. If honorable senators on the other side are prepared to agree to a duty of 12½ per cent., why does not one of them stand up and propose that the request be modified in that direction?

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I should not have risen, only that I think Senator Dawson was rather severe upon Senator Barrett. Senator Dawson cannot understand why 5 per cent. should make any difference in a protective duty. He thinks that it would make very little difference whether the duty was 10 or 15 per cent.

Senator DAWSON.—I said that if your reasons were correct, I could not see why 5 per cent. should make a difference.

Senator STYLES.—It makes a great difference. A 10 per cent. duty would not enable the manufacturers to carry on, but a 15 per cent. duty would enable them to compete with importers. I apprehend that one of the objects we should have in view is to set the importer against the manufacturer and the manufacturer against the importer to some extent, in order to protect the users of the articles. The honorable senator spoke of rings and combines in Australia. I asked him to name a ring or combine which has been the outcome of protection in Victoria or in Australia, and he could not cite one case. He said that he thought he had heard me refer to one. He alluded to the coal importers' ring, from which I suffered many years ago. It can be easily understood why a ring or a combine can be formed much more readily by importers than by manufacturers. In most cases manufacturers start in a very small way. As there is a great number of them—I believe that in Victoria alone they number 400 or 500—it is a difficult thing for a ring to be formed. It is not so difficult for half-a-dozen wealthy importers to combine. If we are to suffer from combines, I would rather have a combine in Australia than outside. We should have no control over a combine formed outside the Commonwealth, but a combine formed inside the Commonwealth might be subjected to control. I was rather surprised at the gibe of Senator Clemons against his fellow free-trader, Mr. Knox, who has had the honour of an interview with the President of the United States, because I am quite sure that it has added lustre to the free-trade party in this Parliament. Senator Dawson talked of prohibition in connexion with this item. Supposing that there was prohibition, there would be sufficient manufacturers to compete with one another, as they do in the case of hats. Senator Symon told us only yesterday that in his State Victorian hats compete with imported hats, showing that it is a good thing to have manufacturers in Australia. Without such competition there could, and no doubt would, be combines. The bigger the trade is the more likely are those combines to be outside the control of the Commonwealth. I have the greatest respect for a consistent free-trader, but not for a free-trader like Senator Dawson, whom I find one day voting for protective duties, and next day ridiculing a protective duty of only 15 per cent. One day he votes for a protective duty on articles produced in Queensland. He also supports a duty of £6 a ton on sugar produced in Queensland, and in order to favour the white men there, he said—"We shall impose on sugar an excise duty of £1 a ton when grown by white labour, and £3 a ton when grown by black labour." The people of Victoria and the other States where sugar is not grown pay that duty ungrudgingly. The working men who pay the bulk of the duty do not complain, though, of course, the Argus will always complain as the mouth-piece of the persons who are well off. What I wish to point out is the inconsistency of a free-trader, and a labour representative too, who will consent to impose this enormous duty on sugar for which I voted, but who, in the case of agricultural implements, thinks that a 15 per cent. duty may be prohibitive. These implements are not made to any great extent in Queensland, but they are made to a great extent in Victoria. That is some more of the geographical free-trade of which we have heard so much. Harvesters, he says, are made in America. The pattern was taken from Victoria, and the machines are turned out by the thousand in America. Senator Dawson approves of the importation of the machines, otherwise he would not vote for a 10 per cent duty. His argument is—"Let the money go away to employ the artisans of America, and not the artisans of Australia, where the machines were first invented and made, and where they can be made in any number, though at the present time not so cheaply as in America." The demand here is not large enough to induce the manufacturers to turn out the machines by the thousand every year. But with a bigger population settled on the lands, the time will come when they will be made as cheaply in Australia as in America. It is the same with reapers and binders. In America, some of the establishments turn out tens of thousands of these machines in one year, or more than are required in Australia altogether. Senator Dawson says—"Let us get the machines from the cheapest place. We shall send our money to America instead of employing our own people to make the machines here."

Senator DAWSON.—Did the honorable senator hear me say that?

Senator STYLES.—I understood that that was the drift of the honorable senator's argument.

Senator DAWSON.—I am not responsible for Senator Styles' understanding.

Senator STYLES.—I am delighted to hear that. Certainly the drift of the honorable senator's argument was that he did not want these machines to be made here. What other inference can be drawn when the honorable senator says that a duty of 10 per cent. is enough?

Senator DAWSON.—I believe that it is too much.

Senator CLEMONS.—Senator Styles knows that the local maker will live up to the duty whatever it is.

Senator STYLES.—The competition amongst the manufacturers keeps down prices.

Senator BARRETT.—What about the price lists which I read?

Senator STYLES.—I have no doubt they were correct.

Senator PEARCE.—Perhaps they were like the statements of Messrs. Lewis and Whitty.

Senator STYLES.—We have heard enough about the starch question. I am surprised at the young free-trade authority from Western Australia bringing up starch again. What has it got to do with agricultural implements? I like to see a man consistent. Senator Dawson voted for protection only yesterday, when it was a question of protecting commodities produced in Queensland.

Senator PEARCE.—Even the gods nod.

Senator STYLES.—I can understand a consistent free-trader. I have the greatest respect for my honorable friend Senator Pulsford. But yesterday one of the free-trade gods nodded when he voted for high duties.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator was a low-tariffist last night.

Senator STYLES.—Another god nodded then. The object of these remarks is to show that Senator Dawson is rather inconsistent in not assisting the agricultural implement makers, and in being a protectionist on one occasion and a free-trader on another.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—Senator O'Keefe opened up a phase of this discussion that we ought to follow. We ought not at this stage to go into the merits of the duty so much as the reasons why we press for our request being agreed to by the House of Representatives. Senator O'Keefe says that what is proposed is in the nature of a compromise with the duty sent to us by the House of Representatives. The compromise we should endeavour to effect is one with the people outside Parliament. We ought to ascertain what the will of the people is in regard to these duties on agricultural machinery. They expressed their opinion by means of the duties in the State Tariffs. Through four of the State Tariffs the people said—"We will not tax mining and agricultural machinery." In two of the State Tariffs the people imposed a duty on these goods. We should, therefore, endeavour to ascertain what would be a fair compromise as between the four States which had no duties on agricultural machinery, and the two States which imposed duties.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator has not been in the habit of agreeing to compromises of that kind.

Senator PEARCE.—But if we are going to look at this matter from the point of view of compromise, what I have indicated is what we ought to take into consideration. As two States had a duty of only 15 per cent., we cannot say that 15 per cent. is a compromise duty. Surely 10 per cent. is more in the nature of a compromise than 15 per cent. Senator Styles has asked Senator Dawson to mention some articles in regard to which a combine has been formed as the result of duties. Our experience in Western Australia has been sufficient to supply an answer to that demand.

Senator STYLES.—I said in a protectionist State.

Senator PEARCE.—In Western Australia we had a Tariff imposed for protectionist purposes. There were duties on stock, on meat, and on flour. We very soon had a ring formed by the dealers in meat and by the flour millers. We should look at the question of the manufacture of agricultural implements in a reasonable light. Does any one find the American manufacturer competing successfully with the Australian manufacturer in regard to any machinery the patent rights of which are held here? Does the American compete successfully with the Australian in the manufacture of stump-jumping ploughs? Of course not, because in that case there is an Australian patent and practically an Australian monopoly in manufacture. But when we come to machinery that is used in America as well as in Australia—such as the cultivator—it stands to reason that the American manufacturer can beat the Australian, because he has a wider market. One factory can turn out enough machines to supply the demands of all Australia, and when there are half-a-dozen factories in Australia, how can they expect to compete with one big American factory, capable of turning out an enormous number of machines? A duty of 15 per cent. would not be sufficient for that purpose. But, in my opinion, we should look not so much to the interests of the manufacturers as of the consumers, because it is the people who use these goods—it is the farmer and the miner—upon whom the prosperity of Australia must rest. If the miners, and the farmers, and the pastoral community are prosperous, manufactures will follow in the wake of their prosperity. The experience of Western Australia has proved the truth of that statement. Senator Styles always seems to think that if there are no protective duties there can be no manufactures. But we have had manufactures established in Western Australia without protective duties for their benefit. Our experience as a young community proves that when the primary industries are prospering, the manufacturers who supply their wants will also prosper without any artificial stimulus. The great fallacy of the protective policy is in attempting to give an artificial stimulus to industries. That causes the establishment of a greater number of manufactures than are needed, and we quickly have a condition of over-production. Then follows the unemployed trouble. Notwithstanding the high Tariff in Victoria, I defy any one to prove that protective duties were a cure for the unemployed trouble.

Senator HIGGS.—Free-trade is no cure.

Senator PEARCE.—I know that it is not; but Senator Barrett claims that by imposing high protective duties, we shall be giving employment to artisans, when he knows as well as any member of this Senate that all the high protective duties of Victoria have failed to find work for the unemployed.

Senator BARRETT. — Let the honorable senator ask the Agricultural Implement Makers' Society what they think, and he will get a warm response.

Senator PEARCE. — Because they are under the same delusion as Senator Barrett. I suppose he means that they would try to impress their views upon me by force. These very same men only a few days ago passed a resolution to the effect that the State should not make its own railway trucks, but should leave their manufacture to private employers. Is that any reason why I should say that the State ought not to make its own railway trucks? I have quite as much sympathy for the unemployed as has the honorable senator.

Senator BARRETT. — The honorable senator's votes do not show it.

Senator PEARCE. — My votes are not cast in the same direction as those of Senator Barrett upon this Tariff, because I recognise that the cure he offers for the unemployed trouble is simply a delusion and a snare, and that is proved by the history of the State he represents. Protection has not cured, but has accentuated the unemployed problem in Victoria, and I am not going to cast a vote to perpetuate that policy. Will any one say that if we imposed a duty of 15 per cent. on agricultural implements, work would be found for the unemployed? Of course, it would not be. I again urge that if honorable senators desire to compromise they should recollect that there was no duty on agricultural implements in four of the States before federation. Notwithstanding this fact, however, there were 8,650 employes engaged in this industry in those States, whereas in the States which had protection there were only 8,410 employes. On these grounds I urge that 10 per cent. is a fair compromise and should be accepted by the Senate.

Senator EWING (Western Australia).—There is a great deal in what Senator Pearce has said, that if we are going to compromise we should consider the needs of all the States. We are here as representatives of all the States, and it should be our endeavour to compromise with a view to their interests. As to the unemployed trouble, the real cure for it is the development of our mines, of our farming, and of every natural industry we possess as far as possible. If the miners and the farmers are prosperous there will be a large demand for mining and agricultural machinery. Senator Baker admitted that the duties, which were imposed ostensibly for the benefit of the farmers, would confer no real good, and no one ever pretended that the miners would derive any advantage from the imposts levied under the Tariff. The duties are framed with a view to benefit the workers and manufacturers of the large cities.

Senator STYLES.—Those are the men who mainly keep the mines going.

Senator EWING.—Has the honorable senator taken leave of his senses? Nothing could be more ridiculous than to say that the manufacturers of Victoria keep going the mines of Western Australia and Queensland. The only benefit we can confer upon the farmers is that which may be derived by them from the facilities offered for obtaining the most modern machinery at reasonable prices.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I cannot allow this important item to pass without saying a few words. Senator Symon remarked that we should not take any notice of opinions expressed by Customs officers. He further stated that it was most embarrassing to Customs officials to be called upon to express opinions regarding matters of policy, and Senator Fraser concurred in that view. Both these honorable senators, however, accepted the opinion of Dr. Maxwell, a gentleman who was employed by the Queensland Government, upon another matter which was recently under discussion in this Chamber.

Senator FRASER.—He was an expert specially brought here to give us the benefit of his opinion.

Senator HIGGS.—He was just as much a public servant as is a Customs officer, and the only difference between them is one of salary. They are both experts in their own departments. Senator Symon stated that the Customs officer from whom the opinion was obtained, was a creature of the Government, but the same term might with as much justice be applied to Dr. Maxwell. I have some information showing how the reduction of the duty upon machinery is affecting the manufacturers within the Commonwealth. Messrs. Nicholson and Morrow, of Melbourne, have practically closed their works; Mr. H. B. McKay, of Ballarat, discharged 70 men fourteen days ago; Messrs. Mitchell and Co., of Melbourne, have reduced their staff, and are working their employés for half-time. Messrs. T. Robinson and Co. have been working their men for half-time throughout the year. Mr. Hugh Lennon has reduced his staff, and those who remain in the works are employed only half-time, and the Clyde Engineering Works of New South Wales have not turned out any harvesting machines this year owing to the unsettled state of the Tariff and the reduction of the duty. The same remarks apply to the Meadow Bank Works near Sydney. Messrs. Cliff and Bunting have been working their hands half-time only for the last three months. These firms directly employ painters, tin-smiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, fitters and turners, bolt and nut makers, and iron-rollers; and indirectly they afford employment to coal-miners, timber-getters, railway employés, leather-belt makers, foundry-men and printers. These facts should weigh with honorable members. The manufacturers have found their operations hampered owing to the attacks made upon the duties by the free-traders, who are engaged in a conspiracy to ruin their business. I do not consider the attitude of the free-trade party at all fair, in view of the fact that we are protecting the farmer to a very considerable extent. I have here a publication containing a series of articles which appeared in the Melbourne Age some time ago. The contributors to that paper have carefully studied the question of free-trade and protection, and show a more intimate acquaintance with the subject than do the writers for any other of the Australian newspapers, except, perhaps, the Sydney Bulletin. One of the paragraphs reads as follows:—

It is not difficult to track the trail of this pretence, and show just where it leads to. The farmer is told that when he pays 15 per cent. duty, or 15s. to 40s. on his plough, he is weighted with an unjust burden. That 15s. is to be reduced to 5s. and 10 per cent. added to the tea and coffee duties. We can easily see how this will work out. A plough will last fifteen years at least. That is a colonial-made plough. Not an imported one—which will not last half as long. The present duty on the plough, spread over fifteen years, means from 8d. to 2s. per year, according to the cost of the article. But if the free-trader is permitted to take the 10s. off the farmer's plough, and put 10 per cent. extra on his tea and coffee, instead of costing him 8d. per year, it would increase the cost of his living by at least 1s. per month. This would save the farmer 8d. a year, and tax him 12s. a year. A free-trade method of relieving him.

The members of the free-trade party, with few exceptions, endeavoured to impose duties upon kerosene and tea. Senator Pearce and one or two other enlightened members of that party were, however, in favour of the admission of those articles free of duty. We afford protection to the farmer by imposing duties upon grain of all kinds, cattle, pigs, sheep, butter, cheese, eggs, fresh and preserved meats, provisions, green and preserved fruits, potatoes, flour, jams, chicory, broom-corn, cider, pulse, malt, hops, tobacco, sugar, wine, ale and beer made with malt and hops, biscuits made of prepared grain, leather, preserved milk, grass and clover seeds, olive and other oils, pickles and sauces, and canary seed. All these articles are protected by the imposition of duties higher than 15 per cent. In order to further assist the farmer, we admit free of duty kerosene, tea, manures of every kind, cream separators and testers, sewing-machines, sheep-shears, sickles, horses, adzes, cattle, sheep, pigs, and poultry, for the improvement of breeds; axes, bones, bran bags, garden shears, grindstones, minor articles for making whips, &c., hay-knives, rabbit-traps, scouring machinery, scythes, and spades. Surely, under the circumstances, we may fairly ask those engaged in agricultural and similar pursuits to pay 15 per cent. duty on any imported machinery they may wish to use. It has been explained that the price of the machinery required by the farmer is not likely to be raised on account of the duty, because the importer will, without doubt, reduce his prices. There has been no demand on the part of the farmers for a reduction of the duty upon machinery. Not one public meeting has been called to advocate such a change, but, on the other hand, farmers who have spoken on public occasions have expressed themselves in favour of protective duties. That should weigh with those honorable senators who appear to have some motive, other than a question relating to the Tariff, in pressing these requests.

Senator PULSFORD.—What is the hidden object?

Senator HIGGS.—To endeavour to glorify the free-trade party at the expense of the Commonwealth; to snatch a victory because there have been some accidental appearances in the Federal Parliament so far as the fiscal question is concerned. In some contests that question was not mentioned, but if the elections were fought again, possibly the free-traders might not have the majority of one or two, which they find so invaluable at the present time. Honorable senators have heard of the very lengthy discussion which took place in the House of Representatives upon this item. The Government originally proposed a duty of 25 per cent., but that rate was ultimately reduced to 15 per cent. Honorable senators of the Opposition, appear to be willing to compromise only when they have counted heads—when they know that Senator Dobson or Senator Baker or some other honorable senator is not going to vote with them. I have here a letter written by the secretary of the Victorian Protectionists' Association, Mr. Mauger, M.P., which contains an important statement made by a leading machinery firm. The statement is as follows:—

We cannot compete against the foreigner successfully, for the following reasons:—The price of labour with him is much cheaper than with us. They have a longer working day, immense supply of all kinds of raw material close at hand, at much lower rates. He has the world's markets close to his own ports, and the fact that he can turn out his machines in thousands to our hundreds, enables him to erect expensive and up to date machinery, and thereby lessen the cost of production. The goods are invoiced to the branch houses of Australia at manufacturers' cost price, as they are only dealing among themselves, and the duty paid here is not a fair calculation. The distance of Australia from the other parts of the globe is not very much protection as far as freights are concerned.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is a very great protection.

Senator HIGGS. — The letter continues—

These are cut so low by subsidized companies that machines can be landed in Australia from America for the same amount as it would cost to send them from, say, Melbourne to any port in other States of the Commonwealth. At the present time, there is not one firm in the country that is making any money in the business, and it is merely a question of who will last the longest. With the immense wealth behind the foreigners, there can be little doubt as to the result, and when once they have the local manufacturers out of the way, they can fix their own prices. Once local industries have been destroyed, it will be a hard matter to rebuild them, as it is much easier to destroy than to establish.—

That is a truism which the free-trade iconoclasts of the Opposition should paste up in their bedrooms.

Throughout the year we employ between 80 and 100 hands all told, and pay annually over £6,000 in wages without taking into consideration the cast and malleable iron foundries and numerous other industries which are partially dependent upon this trade for their existence. It is only during the past few years that the Americans have copied the local articles, and to show the harm they have done us, we give our turnover for the last four years as follows:—1898, £21,167; 1899, £19,100; 1900, £19,052; 1901, £17,834.

Senator GLASSEY.—What firm is that?

Senator HIGGS.—An important Australian machinery firm whose name is not disclosed. The statement continues—

To show which way the wind blows, we may say that we have now secured the agency for one line of American machinery, and are arranging about others, as we find that it will pay us better to import than to manufacture under existing circumstances.

Who can blame this large manufacturing firm if, finding that they cannot compete with the American firms, they become importers' agents? In other protected industries, such as the clothing trade, we find that great importing free-trade firms are becoming manufacturers. The firm of Messrs. McArthur and Co., of Sydney, of which Sir William McMillan is one of the chief members, has extended its operations in this direction. It has actually sent to this benighted State to secure, as a manager for its factory, Mr. Fotheringham, who threw up his seat in the State Legislature in order to go to Sydney.

Senator PULSFORD.—They are prepared to work without duties.

Senator KEATING.—Why have they not done so before?

Senator PULSFORD.—They have.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator knows that these extensions to Messrs. McArthur and Co.'s business have been made only since the introduction of the uniform Tariff. We should at least give these machinery manufacturers the protection that we have given to that firm. Senator Pulsford suggests that the freight charges are a very great deterrent to importing, but we are all aware of the changes which have been made in this direction during the last 25 years. At one time the voyage from England to Australia occupied five or six months. Nowadays a steamship travels between England and Australia in a few weeks, while sailing vessels occupy only a very few months. We have also to remember that the subsidized steamships land commodities here at very low rates. Once the importers secure possession of the market, we know what they will do. We have only to look for example to Senator Sargood's especial friends, Messrs. Colman and Co., starch manufacturers, who retail starch in London at about £10 per ton above the price at which they are selling in this country.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—That is not a fact. I explained the position last night.

Senator HIGGS.—I have a statement to the effect that—

Mr. Harper has shown that Colman's starch is quoted wholesale in bond in Melbourne at 2½d. per lb., and his own 3 1-7d., or exactly ½d. per lb. extra. The British Grocers' Association has resolved that the London retail price of Colman's starch is to be 5d. per lb. Now, if the suggested starch duty of ½d. were added to Colman's 2½d., it would still leave the selling price slightly above Harper's. —

The ACTING CHAIRMAN.—Does the honorable senator think that is relevant to the question before the Chair?

Senator HIGGS.—I was only endeavouring to show what will take place when the importer succeeds in stamping out the local manufacturers of machinery. It is very easy for an honorable senator to deny that Colman's starch is sold cheaper here than in London, but documentary evidence can be produced to the contrary. I do not happen to have any such evidence at hand just now, for I did not think that honorable senators of the Opposition would be so unwise as to press this request.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—In replying to some previous remarks of mine Senator Styles, a short time ago, evidently found a special delight in taxing me with inconsistency by declaring that last night I voted for protection, whereas to-night I am advocating free-trade. So far as the present proposal is concerned, I wish to say at once that I fully recognise that we are now discussing these items for the second time. Consequently they are in an altogether different category from that in which they were when the Tariff made its first appearance in this Chamber. In this connexion, I say unhesitatingly that it ought to be the endeavour of honorable senators to meet those who are opposed to them upon each particular item in the House of Representatives if they can do so without doing great violence to their own opinions. The Tariff to become law must be a matter of mutual agreement between both Houses. If upon the second appearance of the Tariff in this Chamber, I vote contrary to the direction in which I voted when the measure was previously under consideration, I do so for the reason I have stated. In advocating what I did formerly, I am sorry that I angered Senator Styles, and I trust that before to-morrow he will have recovered. In the meantime, I recommend that when he undertakes the task of chastising and correcting another senator he should endeavour to be accurate, or at least as accurate as he can be, for even a protectionist can be accurate if he only takes sufficiently long to think about it. I have in my hand an advance copy of the journals of the Senate, which records exactly what took place at a previous sitting. It is a very great pity that these journals are not circulated amongst members daily, so that should any such question arise, as was raised by Senator Styles this afternoon, a member may by reference to these official documents learn exactly what occurred. In looking over the journals in question, I find that my votes are recorded against the Government in every instance save one which had reference to the duty upon rice. Upon that particular item I consulted some of my protectionist friends—I am not sure that I did not even consult Senator Styles himself. My difficulty on that occasion was in deciding which of the two proposals submitted was likely to yield the most revenue. I received an assurance pretty well all round that the Government proposal would probably produce more revenue than would that of Senator Symon. Believing that protectionists could occasionally tell a doubting fair-trader the truth, I voted with them in that particular instance. Upon the divisions which took place regarding the duties to be levied upon foodstuffs, I voted with the majority, because I thought it was better for all concerned that articles which enter into universal consumption should be placed within reach of the poorer classes at as cheap a rate as possible. I believe in reaching the largest number of people and the most deserving. Concerning the item under consideration, I am in favour of Senator Symon's proposal for exactly the same reason. I believe that by its adoption we shall benefit the farmer, the revenue, and the consumer. As I voted for cheap foodstuffs for the consumer, so I shall vote in favour of cheap machinery for the farmer in order that he may produce as cheaply as possible with profit to himself. The farmer wants a market. Give it to him. I am satisfied that if we unduly tax him we shall be doing everything that we can to ruin his industry. In this connexion I would remind honorable senators who talk about the ironfounders that the user of machinery is the individual who should receive their first consideration. What is the use of a foundry making all sorts of agricultural machinery if there is not a sufficiently large and well-to-do public to purchase it? The circumstances surrounding each case must be considered. This afternoon Senator Higgs quoted a number of extracts, and assured us, in a solemn tone which is peculiarly his own, that the authority from which he quoted could not be gainsayed. It was the one authority, he said, that could not be questioned by any reasonable person. I refer to the Age, and I ask Senators Higgs and Styles to read to-day's issue of that journal, which contains a well-thought-out article dealing with a particular duty which will shortly claim our attention. The Age strongly urges that fuel oil should be admitted free. Why? Because by doing so we shall enable the manufacturer to secure a fuel that is cheap and within easy reach with which to carry on his manufactures.

Senator STYLES.—But it cannot be produced in Australia.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Oh, yes; it can.

Senator Dawson.

Senator DAWSON.—But its competitor, coal, can. That is exactly the position which I take up in regard to the duty upon agricultural machinery. Senator Styles has twitted me with having agreed to a duty of £6 per ton upon sugar. Surely by no stretch of imagination can it be said that the two cases are analogous. The rebate upon sugar is practically a bonus which is paid to cultivators of cane who employ white labour only in the production of their sugar. Honorable senators have been referred to the Age for instruction, and in this connexion I wish to quote what that indisputable authority has to say. He says—

Protection cannot be given in external markets, and the farmers not only supply the home market completely, but export a large surplus. The greatest consideration which can be given to the farmers is to protect them in whatever department their produce has yet to compete with imports in the local markets. About the only item in which this competition takes place is stock, and it is only natural that, in respect of this, the farmers should demand and receive effective protection.

Mr. A. McLean, a prominent protectionist in this State, also made a similar pronouncement. In counselling the committee to adhere to the 10 per cent. duty, I do so, not as was suggested by Senator Styles because I wish to deny to Australians the opportunity of obtaining employment in the manufactory of machinery which is used locally, but because I think we are affording them the best opportunity to do well by giving them the benefit of the widest possible market in which to obtain that machinery. Moreover, all the calamities which protectionists have predicted will accrue under the operation of a 10 per cent. duty will not be warded off by the imposition of a 15 per cent. rate. Those factories in our midst which have closed their doors, or reduced the number of their employes will not be active if we agree to a 15 per cent. duty, as is evidenced by the fact that that rate is now in operation. If our farmers are to use machinery, let them obtain it under the best terms possible, so that they in turn may supply their customers with produce as cheaply as possible. I think that a 10 per cent. duty will fairly meet the whole case.

Question—That the request be not pressed—put. The committee divided.

Item 78. Manufactures of metals, viz.:—
Horseshoe nails, 5s. per cwt.

Senate's Request.—Add to special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

I should like, in the first place, to call attention to the anomalous position in which this matter has been left by the request of the Senate. The Senate requested that horseshoe nails should be put upon the free list, but wire nails have been left dutiable at 5s. per cwt. Wire nails are dealt with cold, and are put through machinery, and as one man can watch a couple of machines, the labour employed in their manufacture is very small compared with the labour employed in the manufacture of horseshoe nails. These require to be heated to a welding heat, and have to pass through two or three processes. Their manufacture gives employment to two or three times the number of hands required in the manufacture of wire nails. If there is to be any justice or any equality in the incidence of these protective duties, surely some consideration should be given to this industry for the manufacture of horseshoe nails. I ask the committee to recognise that a mistake has been made here, and to leave horseshoe nails dutiable as proposed in the Tariff as it came up to the Senate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I quite recognise the anomaly to which my honorable and learned friend has directed attention, and I think it is only fair that it should be set right. At the time that the committee carried the request that horseshoe nails should be made free, wire and other nails were left dutiable at 3s. per cwt. ; and an anomaly was certainly created in that way. I propose to yield to what the Vice-President of the Executive Council has said, and modify the request by proposing that the duty upon horseshoe nails should also be 3s. per cwt. That will place all nails upon the same footing. I move—

That all words after the word "be" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "modified by requesting the House of Representatives to make the duty 3s. per cwt."

Senator O'CONNOR.—I should like to point out to the honorable and learned senator, who, I assume, wishes to do justice in this matter, that he does not remedy the anomaly by putting horseshoe nails in the same position as wire nails. As I have pointed out, what we desire to do is to protect the labour employed in these manufactures, and there is no comparison between the amount of labour employed in the making of wire nails and in the making of horseshoe nails. If we once admit the principle and agree to give protection to the manufacture of horseshoe nails, let us do it in a way that will be substantial. I hope that the honorable and learned senator, having admitted the necessity of doing something to remove the anomaly, will go as far as is necessary for the purpose.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—If Senator Symon persists in the course he has taken, I shall be compelled to take up some time in discussing this matter. A duty of 3s. per cwt. will be no protection whatever for the manufacture of horseshoe nails. There is a great deal of difference between horseshoe nails and wire nails, which are made principally by machinery. I hope the committee will agree to the original proposal for a duty of 5s. per cwt.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Senator O'Connor has suggested with more feeling than we usually expect to find imported into a horseshoe nail, that I ought to go a little further. I think that a proposal to agree to a duty of 3s. per cwt. is a substantial concession, in view of the fact that the Senate by a considerable majority has already requested that they should be free. I do not see why 5s. per cwt. should be given as a bonus to the makers of horseshoe nails. However, in the spirit of concession, and with a desire to see, as we shall very soon, a settlement of the Tariff, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment I have moved. I am quite willing that all those who use horseshoe nails shall pay an extra 5s. per cwt. for them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Item 78. Manufactures of metal, viz., Engines, gas and oil, and high-speed engines and turbines, water and steam, ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 10 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

In this case the Senate carried the request to reduce the duty from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent. I think it is generally regarded, and properly so, that all the items of machinery stand upon the same footing. As there has been a very full discussion on the first of these items, and as the committee has voted upon it, I think it is not only not necessary, but that we should not be justified in taking up public time in debating the matter any further. I therefore propose to adopt the course of allowing the question to be put in each of these cases. I shall give my vote with the "Ayes," but I do not propose to ask for a division, being satisfied that the division in the last case will apply to all these items of a similar kind.

Motion negatived.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 10 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) negatived—

That the request be not pressed.

Item 78. Special exemptions.

Senate's Request.—That linotype, monotype, monoline, and other type composing machines be omitted.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

This matter is not in the same category as the others, but I do not propose taking up time in repeating arguments which have been used before. I hope that so far as the merits of the question are concerned, each side is perfectly satisfied with its own view. With regard to the new view, which must be taken, that we must come to an agreement, I am quite certain that honorable senators feel the responsibility that they have in giving a decision. I am afraid that nothing I can say will alter that. I hope that in this instance the committee will see the advisability of not adhering to the request.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—We do not like to put our colleagues in an unfortunate position; and I understand that the House of Representatives being, I suppose, afraid of the press, has declined to tax linotypes. Members of the other place probably expect to be "wiped out" if they vote for a duty on linotypes, and, therefore, I suppose we ought not to press the request of the Senate. It is a great pity, however, when an opportunity is offered to make all classes in the community bear a fair share of taxation, that a call is not to be made on the big newspaper proprietors. It may be true that for the large newspapers, linotypes have already been imported, but the machines may have to be renewed or increased in number. I know of certain proprietors of big newspapers who have not yet got these machines, but who intend to get them; and the advantage to them of being able to throw a large number of compositors out of work is so great that some revenue might well be raised in this connexion. And there is a special reason why newspaper proprietors ought to pay a duty on linotypes, seeing that their paper is imported free, and that they do not appear to pay duty on any of the materials which they use.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Duty is paid on printers' ink.

Senator HIGGS.—Ink is a very small item compared with that of paper. There ought to be some "backbone" about politicians. I believe I have some reason to thank the press, though I certainly am of opinion that the greater portion of my struggle to a seat in Parliament was in defiance of its influence. I shall vote for pressing the request of the Senate, though I do not think it is of much use doing so. I am very anxious that we should send from this Chamber as few renewed requests as possible, so that we may get to the real business. I am thankful to Senator Symon for withdrawing his opposition to the duty on horseshoe nails, but I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without emphasizing my opinion that newspaper proprietors ought to pay their fair share of taxation. I do not refer to small country newspaper proprietors, like Senator Pulsford, but to big newspaper proprietors like those of the Melbourne Argus and Age, of the Sydney Daily Telegraph and Morning Herald, and the Brisbane Courier and Telegraph.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I intend to vote for adhering to our previous request.

Senator GLASSEY.—Does the honorable senator intend to call for a division?

Senator CLEMONS.—I do. This is a question on which we can vote irrespective of party and sides; it is not a matter of protective incidence. Linotypes are not made in the Commonwealth, and I suppose every honorable senator regards it as his duty to do something in order to provide revenue. An opportunity is here offered to raise a certain amount of revenue at a rate which is not exorbitant, and which owners and would-be owners of linotypes can well afford to pay. The revenue involved may be small, and the incidence of the tax limited, but there is no reason why such limitation should mean exemption.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—When this matter was previously before the Chamber, I supported Senator O'Connor for the reason that he was objecting to new taxation, and when he is in that humour it is "good enough" to help him. I shall help Senator O'Connor again to-night by supporting the motion.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—No revenue would result from a duty on linotypes. I have had to do with the press in some cases, and with the importation of such machinery, and I know that by imposing a duty we should be simply playing into the hands of the proprietors of the big newspapers, who have already supplied themselves with linotypes, and handicapping those who wish to enter the industry. We cannot have too many newspapers in a community like that of Australia. The leading newspapers of this country stand high when compared with those in any part of the world, and there is no doubt that they exercise an educational influence, even when they take sides, seeing that in time the truth must come out.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—This is an item which is fairly open to taxation. The smaller newspaper proprietors are not likely to be handicapped, for the simple reason that they cannot afford linotypes, and the larger proprietors are mostly wealthy, and ought to be called upon to contribute to the revenue. I am not here to dispute the usefulness of newspapers, and I do not quarrel with the opinion expressed by Senator Fraser. We have a very powerful press in Australia, and those proprietors who use linotypes ought to be placed on the same footing as other people who import articles for their own use. The proprietors of such newspapers as the Melbourne Age, the Argus, or the Sydney Morning Herald are too powerful to find fault with politicians who vote for such a duty as that now under discussion. But even if the proprietors do find fault, what is the use of politicians if the latter have not the courage of their convictions, even with the press against them? I do not think any of the larger newspaper proprietors will have any objection to paying a reasonable tax on any machine they may be called upon to import; and, from a protective point of view, why should not these machines be made in Australia, or, at any rate, encouragement given in that direction to manufacturers of iron and steel? Are we to be everlastingly at the mercy of importers from different parts of the world?

Senator FRASER.—Linotypes will not be made in Australia for the next 200 years.

Senator GLASSEY.—It will not say much for the genius and ability of the people of Australia if they are not able to make such machines long before then.

Senator MILLEN.—Does Senator Glassey shut his eyes to the limited market which Australia affords?

Senator GLASSEY.—I grant there is a limited market, but surely an article like the linotype is not beyond the genius of the people of Australia; and why should we not give encouragement to local manufacturers by imposing reasonable taxation?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—There is a great deal in the arguments used by Senator Fraser. There seems to be an opinion that by taxing linotypes we shall injure the large newspaper proprietors, or, at any rate, make them pay a certain amount of duty. I am of the contrary opinion. By allowing linotypes to come in free now we shall assist country newspaper proprietors. On most of the large newspapers in the cities and the country, linotypes are already employed. In Kalgoorlie alone, two, if not three, of the newspapers are produced by means of these machines, the use of which ought to be encouraged in country districts. Under these circumstances, the proposed duty will not affect the wealthy newspaper proprietors, who, in most of the States, have been allowed to import their linotypes free; and the only result will be to place country proprietors in an unfair position. It is absurd to say that linotypes can be manufactured in Australia, because the demand is not sufficient to justify the laying down of the complicated necessary machinery. Up to the present I have not voted for an increase in any duties except on narcotics, spirits, and luxuries, and I certainly shall not vote for a duty in this case.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—There is an important point to which the Senate should give attention. If these linotypes are struck off the free list, some question will be raised as to under which item they will become chargeable, and in my opinion they will fall under n.e.i. at 20 per cent. To levy a tax equal to at least £100 on a single linotype is absurd, and is a step which I do not think the Senate will favour.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There seems to be some misunderstanding, and I think it necessary to explain how the matter stands. This is not a question of small newspapers or large newspapers; it is simply a question of meting out to men who carry on the newspaper industry the same sort of treatment that is meted out to other persons who use machines which cannot be made in the Commonwealth, and which are used for manufacturing purposes of different kinds. On this ground there is a large list of exemptions, including knitting machinery, log-band saw-mills, machinery for scouring, washing, carding, spinning, weaving, and finishing the manufacture of fibrous materials, machinery for the manufacture of paper, and for felting, printing machinery and presses, and machinery used exclusively for electroplating and stereotyping. All this machinery employs a large number of people, and cannot be manufactured in the Commonwealth. It is of a comparatively simple character compared with the linotype. The linotype is not made here, and it was put on the free list simply because we wished to treat the proprietor of a newspaper business in the same way as a person who carries on any other business. We desire to put the linotype and the monoline in the same position as the ordinary printing press. Is it because the monoline is an expensive and complicated machine that it is to be treated differently from the ordinary printing machines which cannot be made here? That is the position, which I do not wish to elaborate. Although I quite agree that you should not treat the newspaper proprietor or the publisher better than a man who carries on any other business, is that any reason why he should be treated worse than any one else? It is because we think it is a simple act of justice to persons who carry on a printing business that we wish the committee not to adhere to its request.

Item 79. Rails, fishplates, fishbolts, tie plates, switches, points, crossings, and inter-sections for railways and tramways, ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 10 per cent.
House of Representatives' Message. — Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—
That the request be not pressed.

These articles are not in exactly the same position as the machinery items which have been dealt with. The reasons for the imposition of a 15 per cent. duty have been stated so often that I do not think it is necessary to do more than to say that if there is any protection to be given to the manufacturers of this kind of ironwork, it must be substantial, for the reason that the freight on the articles is exceedingly small under most circumstances. They are carried very largely as ballast—it is the cheapest kind of freight there is. The advantage which Australia gains by its distance from European and American centres of manufacture is not anything like so great in regard to these articles as it is in regard to others upon which the freights are higher. That fact ought to be taken into consideration. In view of the large amount of capital which is necessary for the laying down of a plant, and the reasonable certainty of a market, which there ought to be, the least we can do is to agree to a duty of 15 per cent. There is no industry which employs, comparatively speaking, so much labour as do the industries which are connected with the manufacture of iron. From the point of view of the competition, the low freight, the number of employés, the necessity for a large capital, I ask my honorable friends opposite whether, for the sake of 5 per cent., it is worth while to insist on the request?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is true that items 79 and 80—the remaining two items in this division on which we requested the other House to reduce the duty from 15 to 10 per cent.—are on a different footing from those which we have dealt with; but they are not on a very much different footing. When we remember that the use of rails, fish-plates, fish-bolts, and the other articles embraced in the item, except by the Government to construct railways and tramways, is by the great mining industry—and timber getting industry, too—it will be seen that it is absolutely essential that they should be treated in exactly the same way as the engines, electrical appliances, and other lines that have been dealt with. To my mind, there is no distinction between the articles. It is not under this item that the encouragement of the production of iron ore and the manufacture of iron is to be given. The Bonus Bill, which has been on the stocks for some time, is the source from which any encouragement is likely to be given to this manufacture. Therefore, it seems to me that, for the sake of the mining industry, the timber-getting industry, and the railways of the Commonwealth, the committee ought to adhere to its request.

Item 81. Iron and steel . . . Galvanized and tinned plate and sheet, ad valorem, 10 per cent.

Senate's Request.—Add to special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

It will be remembered that the Senate requested that this and four other items under the head of "metals and machinery" in Division VIA. should be placed on the free list. I desire very shortly to call the attention of honorable senators to the position in which the matter stands. Division VIA, as honorable senators will remember, is headed in this way:—

To come into operation on dates to be fixed by proclamation, and exempt from duty in the meantime, except as to iron galvanized, plate and sheet. Proclamation to issue so soon as it is certified by the Minister that the manufacture to which the proclamation refers has been sufficiently established in the Commonwealth, according to the provisions of any law relating to bonuses for the encouragement of manufactures or to the establishment of manufactures under the direct control of the Commonwealth or States

Governments, but no proclamation to issue except in pursuance of a joint address passed on the motion of Ministers by both Houses of Parliament, stating that such manufacture is sufficiently established.

The effect and purpose of this introductory paragraph is to impose certain duties on the articles which are mentioned in the division, after the expiration of the period during which the industries affected will be assisted by a bonus. The only exception to freedom from duty during the interval is iron galvanized, plate and sheet, as to which we have already agreed to a duty of 15s. per ton. The Senate dealt with this matter in what appeared to me to be a way that would create a great deal of anomaly. When they dealt with the first line in the item, which is certainly the most important, and the one in regard to which there would be the largest expenditure of money—that is, say, the line dealing with scrap-iron and steel, and pig-iron—they passed it. Ingots, blooms, bar, rod, angle, tee, sheet, and plate iron were also passed as subject to a duty of 10 per cent., ad valorem, when the bonus period has expired. The Senate then went on to deal with galvanized and tinned plate and sheet iron, when for some extraordinary reason a suggestion was carried that these goods should be put on the free list. Wire netting was also to be put upon the free list. Then iron and steel pipes and tubes not dutiable under Division VII. were left at 10 per cent., and spelter was put upon the free list. So that the only result seems to be that the Senate has adopted the view that there should be a duty as soon as the bonuses have ceased, but that that duty should apply only to the manufacture of iron and of iron and steel pipes and tubes not dutiable under Division VI. I think the comment is obvious that there is no reason whatever why the different kinds of iron, the manufacture of which is to be established by means of bonuses, should be treated differently. There is a reason which appears to me to be unanswerable why the Senate should not persist in its requests with regard to these articles. We are all agreed that one of the greatest benefits which we could confer upon the whole of Australia by legislation would be the bringing about of the establishment on a firm footing of the iron industry. It would be of great benefit to the country, not only in regard to the production of iron, and not only in regard to work which it would give to the men employed in it, but also on account of the numerous ancillary trades that always attach themselves to the iron industry. It is proposed in the Government scheme that there shall be bonuses extending over a series of years, and that when that period is complete the protection shall be continued in the form of these duties. If our bonuses are to be of any value they must be taken as part of a system which is not to endure for a few years only, but which will enable persons to embark their capital with some amount of certainty that their industry will be protected, and that the home market will be guaranteed to them for a certain number of years. We cannot interfere with the duties in accordance with the suggestions of the Senate without neutralizing to a very large extent the whole value of the principle of bonuses which the Government will seek to bring into operation. Under the circumstances it is not necessary to add anything to what I have said. I trust the committee will see its way not to press the suggestions which have been made in regard to these matters.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I feel quite sorry after the picturesque description of this great iron industry which has been given by Senator O'Connor to think that there is very little likelihood of it being established under cover of the chaotic provisions of the Bonus Bill which has been mentioned. I do not think that we shall ever see that Bonus Bill.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think that any one here expects to see it—this session, at all events.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Very soon it will be on the statute-book.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—This is not a place for making wagers, but I do not think that my honorable and learned friend would be prepared to back the Bonus Bill for a very large amount. But, in the spirit of concession which we have manifested throughout, and in order to meet the views not only of my honorable and learned friend, but of others who think that there is the slightest probability of these provisions aiding in any degree in the encouragement and establishment of the iron industry in Australia, I propose not to press the requests with regard to item 81. At the same time, I cannot allow the occasion to pass without entering my protest against the silliest form of all legislation, namely, that introduced with a view to the imposition of duties to come into operation some years hence. There is no worse form of legislation in the world than what is called prophetic legislation. It is of no earthly value in this case. Parliament may alter or repeal this legislation at any time. In the next place the proposal is for the imposition of a tax which, if it is to take effect at all, should take effect at once. As honorable senators will see, these impositions will only come into effect first of all upon the passing of the Bonus Bill, and in the second place on a joint address of both Houses of the Parliament. That being so we shall have an opportunity when that joint address comes before the Senate of voting against the imposition of these provisions. It is scarcely worth while to treat what is merely an abstract debating question as one possessing any reality, and therefore I do not propose to press the suggestions.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not propose to speak at any length on this subject, but I want to say a word in regard to the principle which is involved in the proposed Bonus Bill. While I could conceive it possible that I might vote for a Bonus Bill for the purpose of granting subsidies to an industry, which subsidies would be definite in their amount and limited to a term of years, I shall never vote for a Bonus Bill that is coupled with protection. I regard that form of protection as being the worst of all forms. It is a sort of double-barrelled protection, of which the bonus may be called the smooth bore, and the protective duty the choke-bore. If the Bonus Bill comes before the Senate I shall be unable to vote for it, although I could conceive it possible, if it were not encumbered with these protective duties, that I could vote for a Bonus Bill pure and simple. We are now going to ratify the action of the other House, but that ratification must not be taken as pledging our support to the Bonus Bill in any shape or form if it comes before us. I feel impelled to say so much, because I have said, I believe, in this Chamber that I could conceive it possible that I could vote for a Bonus Bill, but I never intended to vote for a Bonus Bill cum protection. I can only hope that the Bonus Bill will not reach this Chamber.

Item 87. Cement (Portland), plaster of Paris per cwt., 9d.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 6d.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

It will be remembered that this duty was originally fixed at 1s. per cwt., but that it was reduced to 9d. before the Tariff reached this Chamber. The Senate then requested that it should be further reduced to 6d.

When this item was discussed on a previous occasion, it was pointed out that cement was brought out from Europe so cheaply, particularly in sailing vessels, which carried large quantities of it practically a-ballast, and that it was contracted for in such a way in Germany that, in conjunction with the cheap, subsidized German freights, it could be landed here for almost next to nothing. It was further urged that a substantial duty ought to be imposed, in order to afford some real protection to our local manufacturers. I hope, therefore, that honorable senators will recognise that the amount of protection which ought to be afforded cannot be judged entirely from the percentage of the duty. The whole circumstances have to be considered, and if there was ever an occasion on which it was necessary to protect our manufacturers against the competition of the subsidised French and German industries, this is one. The extent to which the German steamers are subsidized tends to reduce the freight to almost nothing, and unless we impose a fair duty, our local manufacturers will have no protection against the introduction of cement in such large quantities as will disturb the local market. The local cement works cannot be carried on without the expenditure of a large amount of capital, and the employment of extensive plant, and success cannot be achieved unless a certain local market is assured. The cement manufacturing industry already flourishes in many parts of Australia, and there is no reason why it should not be successfully carried on in Tasmania and other places which possess every facility for the production of the article. This, therefore, is a case in which it would be well for us to impose a duty, not only in the interests of agreement between the two Houses, but also in order to assist a legitimate and important industry.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I should be very glad if it were possible to adopt the course proposed by my honorable friend, but he seems to have overlooked the interests of the consumers of cement. In the first place a duty of 6d. per cwt. is equivalent to 33½ per cent. on the value of the article, which is worth in Germany about 6s. per cask of 3½ to 4 cwt. Thirty-three and a third per cent. is a very high duty to impose upon an article which is so largely used in water conservation works, in railway construction and mining operations, on farms, in gardens, for making troughing, for constructing dams, and for an endless variety of other purposes.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I use it myself, but I am quite willing to pay the extra price.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator is willing to pay the extra price because he can afford it, but there are others who are not able to pay. I should be willing to pay the extra cost, but I do not see why I should be called upon to do so. Cement, which is very good for some purposes, but not so good as imported cement for other purposes, is manufactured in South Australia, and surely if we impose a duty of 33½ per cent. that is as much as anyone could fairly ask for. Reference has been made to the subsidies granted to German steamers, which enable them to bring cement here at low freights. I understand that the British Government has decided that the P. and O. and other lines of steamers shall be subsidized, so that in future there will be no difference between the advantages enjoyed by German manufacturers of cement and those in England.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There has been some talk about giving subsidies to British steamers, but they have not yet been granted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, it has actually been decided to grant them. Therefore we cannot use the fact that German steamers are subsidized as a special reason for changing the aspect of our Tariff in respect to cement, which is brought here at low rates of freight. In addition to the 33½ per cent. duty there will be the freight, import charges, and all the elements which go to make up what we call natural protection, and I do not think we are called upon to impose any higher duty than that suggested.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I hope Senator Symon will re-consider his decision. The discussion we had on a previous occasion showed conclusively that unless the duty upon cement were retained at 9d. per cwt. the local manufacture of the article must be wiped out. The whole of the cement makers of Australia—The South Australian Portland Cement Company, Adelaide; Messrs. Goodlet and Smith, Sydney; The Commonwealth Portland Cement Company, Portland, New South Wales; James Campbell and Sons, Brisbane; The Australian Portland Cement Company, Proprietary, Limited, Geelong, and the Victorian Portland Cement Company, Melbourne—agree that a duty of 9d. is necessary in order to enable them to carry on the industry. When this question was previously discussed some doubt was expressed as to whether Goodlet and Smith, and the Commonwealth Company of New South Wales, were in favour of the retention of the duty of 9d. per cwt. Since then evidence has been presented showing that they are, and if it were necessary I could read certain documents in proof of my statement. A day or two ago I had a petition signed by all the cement makers I have named in favour of the retention of the duty, but owing to an informality I was unable to present it, and there was not sufficient time to enable me to have the informality corrected so that the petition might be presented before the consideration of this item. I would remind Senator Symon that the Australian cement makers, as compared with the German manufacturers are severely handicapped in regard to the rates of wages and hours of labour. Recent tenders were invited by the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works for the supply of a very large quantity of cement. It was open to colonial and German manufacturers to compete, and notwithstanding the higher wages paid in the industry in Australia, and the fact that the men here are employed for only 48 hours a week, as compared with 70 hours a week in Germany, the local manufacturers were only 1d. per cask above the German tender. The German tender was accepted.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—For a portion of the supply.

Senator BARRETT. — Senator Symon will see at once the way in which our local manufacturers are handicapped. I should also point out that immediately after the committee decided to request another place to reduce the duty to 6d. per cwt., a cement factory at Geelong shut down. I do not say that the decision arrived at by us was entirely responsible for the closing of the works, but it was certainly one of the determining factors. In these circumstances Senator Symon and his supporters should not press the request. Those who ask for the retention of the duty have made out a good case. They have shown conclusively that the local manufacturers cannot compete with the German cement makers, who work under specially favourable conditions, and it is simply a question of whether we shall allow cement to be manufactured in Australia or imported from abroad. I trust that the request will not be pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—As Senator Barrett has invited my attention to certain figures, I should like to mention to him that the duty of 6d. per cent. proposed by us is exactly that which prevailed under the South Australian Tariff.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The duty in South Australia was over 7d. per cwt.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Was it really one penny more? Assuming that there is from $3\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. to 4 cwt. in a barrel the duty amounts to 2s. per barrel. Even taking it that the duty was 7d. per cwt., surely it cannot be said that an injustice would be done by fixing the rate at 6d.? In Queensland the duty was 2s. per barrel, and in Victoria it was 1s. per cwt.—a most monstrous duty. In Western Australia and New Zealand the duty is also 2s. per barrel. We have adopted what was substantially a uniform duty in three of the States of the Federation and that which prevails in New Zealand. As to the disadvantages under which the local producer labours, may I say that there is a wharfage of 5s. per ton on the imported cement, which is equal to 1s. per cask. Then the local maker in South Australia, at all events, effects a saving by using bags instead of the casks which exporters have to employ when they ship cement from Europe. Although the freight in certain cases is small, there is always some freight payable upon cement. I am not aware that even the subsidized steamers have been in the habit of carrying cement merely for the satisfaction of the producer or importer. I also find that imported cement can be sold, even with a duty of 9d. per cwt., at from 10s. to 11s. per cask. That being so, the advantage which the consumer must enjoy is obvious. Looking at the price which the local man obtains—and which I believe is about 11s. 5d. per cask—we find that he is nearly able to sell at the same rate as does the importer. So far as I can see, the advantages, in addition to the duty, are altogether on the side of the local cement maker. The duty which we propose would amount to $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent.,

and the consumer, instead of labouring under the disadvantage which he would otherwise have to suffer, will be able to get cement at this cheap rate.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I think that Senator Symon's figures are not quite accurate. The duty in Victoria was 3s. 4½d. per cask, and six casks go to the ton. Now a duty of 6d. per cwt. is proposed, and we are told that that is equal to 2s. per cask. The honorable and learned senator will find, however, that it is equal to only 1s. 8½d. per cask. There is another aspect to this question which has not yet been touched upon, and that is the price at which cement was selling before and after the establishment of the local works.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What has that to do with the question?

Senator STYLES.—It has everything to do with the man who buys cement. I purchased 20,000 casks of imported cement in Adelaide, and the lowest price at which I could obtain it was 18s. per cask. Here we are making cement, and selling it for 10s. and 11s. per cask, and the imported article can now be purchased at about the same rate. Senator Symon has said that the reduced duty would be equal to $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. Taking his own figures, it would be only 28 per cent. But surely he has not adopted the proper method by which to arrive at the true percentage. We must estimate the duty, not on the value of the cement in Germany, but on the value delivered here. Is there not 10 per cent. added to the value at the port of shipment? There are also various other charges which reduce the percentage to something like 24 or 25 per cent., instead of $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; it is nearer $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., and my figures are correct.

Senator STYLES.—With due respect to the honorable and learned senator, I assert that they are not. I have purchased many thousands of casks, and paid duty upon them, so that I ought to know something about the question. I was a member of the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works for many years, and, as chairman of the sewerage committee, I was in an admirable position to judge of the merits of the local and imported article. Time after time tests were made of British and German cements—and, I believe, Italian cements—with the result that it was found that our local cement compared very favorably with them. Like other honorable senators, I have no personal interest in this matter, but it seems to me that it will be a great pity, when the duty does not increase the price, if we do not fix a rate which will enable our local manufacturers to continue their operations. If the local manufacturers can carry on with a duty of 9d. per cwt. they will always be able to act as a check upon the importers. Directly the importer attempts to charge an extortionate price, the local manufacturer checks him; if the local manufacturer attempts to impose an extortionate price, the importer is able to check him. That would continue to be the case if the duty were allowed to remain.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I wish to produce some further evidence showing conclusively that, in order to obtain possession of the market, the German manufacturers have been losing money in connexion with the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works tenders. When this item was previously discussed, Senator Pulsford gave us certain figures showing the cost of importing cement, and if those figures are correct—and I believe that they are—they show that the German and English importers, whose tenders have recently been accepted by the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works, are selling at a loss. The honorable senator quoted an interesting letter from Messrs. J. Barre Johnston and Co.—which he said was a well known and reputable company in Sydney—giving the cost of importing the best brands of English or German cements, as follows:—Cement, per cask, f.o.b., 6s.; freight per sailer (present rate), 2s. 8d.; insurance, 1½d.; exchange, 90 days at 4 per cent., and stamps, 4½d.; wharfage at Sydney, 5d.; receiving into and delivery ex store, 2½d. or 3d., say 2¾d.; rent for storage, from 3d. to 4d. per cask, 3½d.; duty 9d. per cwt., 2s. 6½d.; making a total cost without profit to the importer of 12s. 7½d. These are the figures of Senator Pulsford himself, and, as against them, I wish the committee particularly to note the price at which tenders were recently accepted for the supply of cement by the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works. Upon Tuesday, 20th May last, the board accepted a contract for the supply of 5,000 casks of German cement at 10s. 11d. per cask, although, according to Senator Pulsford's own statement, it costs the importer 12s. 7½d. per cask to import it, and that without securing any profit. Again, in the Age of 16th May, and the Argus of 16th July, I find that other tenders were accepted for supplies of German cement at 12s. 4½d. per cask. The committee will therefore see that the contracts recently made must, so far as the German manufacturers are concerned, have resulted in a loss. Under these circumstances, how is it possible for the Australian manufacturers to compete? I hold in my hand a document which states that it is impossible for the Portland Cement Company in South Australia to compete with foreign manufacturers unless they obtain the benefit of a duty of 9d. per cwt. With these facts before us, we ought not to agree to a reduction of the impost to 6d. per cwt.

Item 114. Jewellery—Special exemption . . .
"Cameos and precious stones, unset."

Senate's Request.—Make dutiable as jewellery at 25 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) proposed—

That the request be not pressed.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria). — My views upon this question are the same as when I moved to make these articles dutiable at 25 per cent. I recognise that by adopting that course difficulties will arise at the Custom-house, but I hold that those difficulties are equally applicable to almost every other article. However, the sense of the committee is evidently against the proposal to make these goods dutiable, and therefore I do not intend to persevere with it.

Motion agreed to.

Item 116. Boots and shoes
Men's sizes above 5, ad valorem, 30 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 20 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

This is one of the items in regard to which I hope the Senate will abandon the position which it has taken up, if only for the purpose of bringing about something like symmetry in the division. It will be remembered that the duty upon men's sizes above 5, which was the first of some half-dozen items under the heading of "boots and shoes," was reduced to 20 per cent., whilst the others were allowed to remain at 30 per cent. The Senate ought not to insist upon its request, because it is obvious that its effect must be to render the administration of this portion of the Tariff very difficult. It would be necessary, in such a case, for every box of boots imported to be examined in order to ascertain whether it contained men's sizes or other sizes. There is no reason why, in regard to this line, a different rate should obtain from that which operates in the case of other classes of boots.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Certainly this is an unfortunate illustration of the possibility of anomalies that may arise in the administration of the Tariff. There is no doubt whatever that the request made by the Senate was the first of a series of others which were not carried, and which dealt with the whole set of items under the heading of "boots and shoes." It does seem a little peculiar that this item should have been reduced to 20 per cent., whilst the balance were allowed to remain at the extravagant rate of 30 per cent., especially as this line is the one above all others, which is most likely to be manufactured locally. That being the case, it is a fair subject upon which to meet the House of Representatives, and in order to bring the duty into harmony with that imposed upon other items under this heading, I do not propose to ask the committee to press the request.

Motion agreed to.

Item 126.—Vehicles, viz., "Hansom cabs, also single or double-seated waggons, waggonette and four-wheeled buggies, ad valorem, 25 per cent."

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 20 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) proposed—

That the request be not pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I hope that the spirit in which the Senate is prepared to meet the House of Representatives in connexion with this matter will be appreciated when the other requests for which we have pressed are being reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

Item 126. Vehicles, viz.:—Tilburys, dog-carts, gigs, Boston chaises, sulkies, and other two-wheeled vehicles on springs or thorough braces, ad valorem, 25 per cent; all parts thereof, viz., wheels, tires, and bolted bodies, undergears, undercarriages and tops, ad valorem, 25 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duties be reduced to 20 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendments not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) agreed to—

That the requests be not pressed.

Item 132. Brushware.

Senate's Request.—That the following new line be added, viz., "Painters and paper-hangers' brushes, ad valorem, 20 per cent."

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

It will be remembered that there was a long discussion, particularly on the item of painters' and paperhangers' brushes. It was proposed that the whole line should be dutiable at 25 per cent., and the Senate requested that a special line should be made, including painters' and paperhangers' brushes, and that the duty should be reduced to 20 per cent. I need not repeat the arguments which were used before, but the position really is that if we reduce the duty upon painters' and paperhangers' brushes from 25 to 20 per cent., we shall be taking away the most substantial and the most profitable part of the business, while we shall be adding to the difficulties of administration. On the ground, therefore, of simplicity of administration, and on the ground of a fair protection to every branch of the business, I ask the committee not to press the request. If there was any reason, from the point of view of the workmen or consumers, for a reduction of the duty, I could understand the proposal made. But the fact is that the workman can get his brushes actually at the same price, and there seems to be no reason for the reduction of the duty.

Senator CHARLESTON.—The painters do not say that.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I beg the honorable senator's pardon. On the last occasion when the matter was discussed here, a letter was read from the Painters and Paperhangers' Association, stating that they were quite satisfied that the duty of 25 per cent. proposed would not affect them prejudicially, and that the quality of the brushes locally made was equal to, and in many cases superior to, that of imported brushes. Is it really only for the purpose of carrying out a free-trade doctrine in the abstract, that the Senate's request should be insisted upon? I can tell Senator Charleston that if the advantage of the workmen engaged in the trade is to be his guide, he will satisfy them best by adhering to the duty as introduced in the Senate.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—When I interjected that the painters did not hold the views which the honorable and learned senator was expressing, I spoke from information given to me by painters in Adelaide. I met more than one of them, and they complained of the high price of brushes, and of the heavy duty imposed upon them.

Motion agreed to.

Item 132. Brushware, viz., n.e.i., including brooms, mops, crumb trays and brushes, ad valorem, 25 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be reduced to 20 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) proposed—

That the request be not pressed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I do not propose that we should press this request, because a difference of 5 per cent. upon a line like brushware would make very little difference to the consumer. If the reduction of duty at first requested had been considerable, I should have thought it necessary to press the matter. I personally think that a duty of 25 per cent. upon brushware is extortionate. I am informed upon good authority that there is a brush factory in Victoria employing comparatively few people, and yet it can produce sufficient brushes to supply Victoria and a good deal for export. Of course, it is always said that an opportunity is given to employ the blind in the manufacture of brushware, and it is held that it is reasonable to impose a duty to encourage their employment. This is another item upon which we have an opportunity of making an approach in the way of concession to the other Chamber.

Motion agreed to.

Item 134. Cordage and twines, n.e.i. Special exemption, "Cordage, viz., unserviceable."

Senate's Request.—That the words "used for paper-making" be added.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) agreed to—

That the request be not pressed.

Item 136. Explosives, viz., Ammunition and cartridges, n.e.i., free.

Senate's Request.—That the duty be 10 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

This is but a small matter. Honorable senators will, perhaps, remember that I moved the motion making the request myself. Upon fuller inquiry and information, I find it was a mistake. When I come to look at the number of items we have dealt with, I am only astonished that I have not made more mistakes.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—It is all very well for the Vice-President of the Executive Council to tell us that in moving this request he made a mistake. But from my point of view, and from the point of view, I hope, of a majority of the committee, it is his present motion which is a mistake. I do not desire to draw too much attention to the honorable and learned senator's change of front, but several reasons may be given to show that his original attitude was the correct one. Honorable senators will remember that there is a heavy duty upon shot, and when we discussed that duty it was pointed out that it was a mistake to have ammunition and cartridges free. It was admitted that one of two things must be done, either that we should take the duty off shot, or should impose a duty on ammunition and cartridges. Every protectionist agreed that it was obviously absurd to have a duty upon shot and allow shot contained in cartridges to be admitted free. To rectify the error, the Vice-President of the Executive Council very properly said that a duty of 10 per cent. should be imposed upon shot contained in cartridges. The honorable and learned senator said that it was a glaring error in the Tariff, but the error will be still more glaring if, with our eyes open, we do not press our request. There is no reason why ammunition and cartridges which are used by people who can well afford to pay something to the revenue should not be made dutiable at 10 per cent. I hope, therefore, that the committee will press the request.

Item 136. Explosives, viz., sporting powder, free.

Senate's Request.—That the line be made dutiable at 10 per cent.

House of Representatives' Message. — Amendment not made.

Senator Clemons.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

This item stands in the same position as that with which we have just dealt. When the matter was last before the Senate, the reason given for making cartridges free, was that a large number of persons living in the country used them as a means of gaining their livelihood, or for the purpose of destroying vermin. It was thought that for such people ammunition should be made as cheap as possible, and other exemptions have been made on similar grounds. Another element is that this item includes the raw material of the local cartridge manufacturer.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—So is shot the raw material of the local manufacturer.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Of course ; and I pointed out that there was an anomaly which might have been remedied ; but a proposal to impose a duty was not carried, and we cannot go back to that matter now. Powder is the raw material of the cartridge maker, and from his point of view, and also from the point of view of the man who principally uses cartridges, this duty ought not to be imposed.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I shall call for a division on this item for precisely the same reason which actuated me in regard to the last item. Senator O'Connor says that if the Senate insists on its amendment we shall be destroying protection; but it must be remembered that the margin we propose is precisely the same as that suggested by the Government.

Special Exemptions (Miscellaneous).—"Articles imported by and for the official use of the Governor-General or State Governor."

Senate's Request.—That the special exemption be omitted

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) proposed—

That the request be not pressed.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—I voted in favour of striking out this special exemption, and I shall do so again. My experience is that there is no more vicious principle than allowing any Governor to import goods duty free. In my own State of South Australia most disagreeable rumours were often spread abroad when a Governor had left. It was said that Governors imported quantities of highly dutiable articles such as wines and cigars, and that, at the expiration of their term, they were distributed amongst their rich friends, who thus enjoyed them duty free. It is much better that anything of that sort should be prevented. Only the other day we heard of a quantity of champagne, which, I suppose, had not paid duty, being distributed amongst the poor people of Melbourne, with the result that much of it found its way into the possession of publicans, who sold it. It is a great mistake to allow any dutiable articles to come in free, whether for a State Governor or a Commonwealth Governor. It may be possible for an exceedingly careful head officer of the Customs department to prevent abuse, but there is always danger of laxity. The Senate should adhere to its previous decision.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—We have no desire to reflect on the other House for the course which it has adopted, but a special exemption, under the circumstances, is absolutely wrong and unfair. The very poorest people in the community have to pay taxation on the articles which they use, and the same should be done by a Governor-General, who receives what is, at any rate, a fair salary. A great deal of revenue may not be involved, but this is a matter of principle.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I very much regret that this item has come up for discussion at a late hour, when honorable senators are anxious to get away to their homes. I apprehend that the trouble is not because of any difference of opinion as to whether the Governor-General or a State Governor should pay customs duty on an article, but because the members of the other House think that the Senate has no right to request any alteration in a Bill which would impose an additional charge upon the people. I heard the debate in that House upon our request that the linotypes should be taxed, and, from an interjection which was then made, I feel certain that it was opposed because certain honorable members thought that it had no right to be made, on account of this provision in section 53 of the Constitution Act—

The Senate may not amend any proposed law so as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

I take it that we have the power to request an alteration of this item under the next paragraph of the section, which says—

The Senate may at any stage return to the House of Representatives any proposed law which the Senate may not amend, requesting, by message, the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein.

An "amendment" may mean that a charge is increased or decreased. We may request that a duty be increased or decreased or abolished. Supposing that if, at any time, a free-trade majority in the other House should send up a low Tariff, would not a protectionist majority in the Senate have the power to request that an amendment be made so as to increase a proposed duty? If the contention of honorable members in another place is sound, we should have no power to make any such request. I should like to see this question fought out, not upon the arguments which can be offered against the Governor-General importing articles duty free, but upon our right to make a request for the increase of a duty. I agree with what Senator Playford said in regard to the habits of some State Governors. He spoke of wines which had been imported duty free being sent to the unemployed, and then being sold to various persons. In Queensland a Governor sent a considerable quantity of various kinds of wine—from champagne downwards—to an auction room to be sold, and they brought a larger price than he was entitled to get, because he had paid no import duties.

Special Exemptions. — (Miscellaneous)— Surgical and dental instruments.

Senate's Request.—That the word "optical" be inserted after the word "surgical."

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

It will be remembered that this request was made in order to make sure that the instruments used for dealing surgically with the eyes should be included in the item. On a more careful consideration it appears that the use of the word "optical" might include spectacles and other articles of that kind which it was never intended to exempt. All the instruments for operating on the eye are certainly covered by the word "surgical," and the introduction of the word "optical" might make duty free articles which were not intended to be put on the free list.

Motion agreed to.

Item 137. Photographic dry plates, sensitized films and paper, ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Senate's Request.—That sensitized films and paper be added to the special exemptions.

House of Representatives' Message.—Amendment not made.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I move—

That the request be not pressed.

As regards our two requests for the amendment of this item, the other House agreed to exempt prepared plates for engravers and photographers, but did not agree to place sensitized films and paper on the free list. I assented to the request to make the latter articles duty free, acting upon information which was before the department at the time that sensitized films were not made in Australia. But we have since ascertained beyond all question that these films are being made extensively in Victoria, New South Wales, and elsewhere; and that a considerable number of persons are employed and extensive plant has been erected in connexion with their production. They are being produced in a very satisfactory way.

Motion agreed to.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) agreed to—

That the modification of the date from which the amendments made come into effect be agreed to.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Before we report progress, perhaps I may be allowed to say, that as we have now gone through the message it will be necessary to send a message back to the House of Representatives. I propose to-morrow morning, in moving the adoption of the report, to state fully what the terms of the message will be. Under ordinary circumstances the duty of framing the message would be left to the President and the officers of the Senate, but we think that under the special circumstances it is desirable that the Senate should know as nearly as possible the terms of the message. As it will be necessary for the officers to prepare the document, and to give them time to consider it, and also to afford time for the President to confer with them concerning it, I intend to move that we meet to-morrow at half-past eleven o'clock, instead of half-past ten.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—In reference to what my honorable and learned friend has said, perhaps he would add an intimation as to the business he proposes to take to-morrow, because then honorable senators can make their arrangements accordingly. I should also like to suggest to him that it would be convenient to a good many honorable senators if the Senate did not meet on Tuesday, but on Wednesday next week. I o not ask my honorable and learned friend o intimate finally what his intentions are s to that, if he has any hesitation about loing so, but will ask him to give an intima- tion to-morrow as soon as we meet.

Senator O'CONNOR. — As to the first matter which has been mentioned, it is our ntention to proceed to-morrow with the re- solution relating to the Governor-General's Establishment. I do not think it will be worth while going on with any other business. It is not my intention to take the Electoral Bill. With regard to the adjourn- ment, it is necessary to get this message sent to the House of Representatives as soon as possible. I understand that they will be sitting on Tuesday. I will not say anything finally, until I have consulted my col- leagues, but I will let the Senate know as early as possible to-morrow.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Senator O'CON- NOR)—

That the Senate at its rising adjourn till 11.30 a.m. to-morrow.

Senate adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

TELEGRAPH POLES.

Mr. CLARKE asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Is he aware that a considerable sum of money is owing by the Postmaster-General's department to the contractors for the supply of telegraph poles and that the amounts owing cannot be paid owing, it is alleged, to the Treasurer's advance vote being exhausted?

2. If the reason given is correct, will he take steps to insure the payments of the amounts in- volved?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I intend to make inquiries into this matter. It is a fact that the Treasurer's advance vote is, unfortunately, practically exhausted, some very heavy claims having been made upon it; but whenever a department makes ap- plication to me for small amounts for wages and small contracts I endeavour, by some means, to make arrangements to meet them. The Postal department recently applied for a sum of £2,000 in connexion with this matter.

FREE TRAVELLING : POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLARKE asked the Minister re- presenting the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Has a suggestion reached the Department of the Postmaster-General to insert a clause in future mail contracts providing that all postal officials when travelling on duty shall be carried free?

2. By whom was such suggestion (if received) made?

3. If received, has such proposal been carefully considered?

4. Has such a provision been recently intro- duced into mail contracts of the State of Queens- land?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. No such suggestion has reached the depart- ment of the Postmaster-General.

2 and 3. Replies included in the answer to No. 1.

4. No.

POST AND TELEGRAPH RATES BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 27th August, vide page 15495):

SECOND SCHEDULE.

PART I.—ORDINARY TELEGRAMS.

	Town and Suburban within prescribed limits.	Other places within each State.	Inter-State, i.e. from any one State to any other State.
Per word	One halfpenny ...	Three farthings ...	One penny
Minimum charge per message ...	Sixpence ...	Ninepence ...	One shilling

Double the foregoing rates to be charged for the transmission of telegrams on Sunday, Christmas Day, and Good Friday, and for "urgent" telegrams.

The foregoing rates are exclusive of portorage charges.

A fraction of a penny occurring in a charge calculated according to the foregoing rates is to be charged as a penny.

PART II.—PRESS TELEGRAMS.

	Within any State.	Inter-State, i.e., from any one State to any other State.	Relating to Parliamentary and Executive Proceedings of the Commonwealth.
Not exceeding 25 words ...	Sixpence ...	One shilling
Exceeding 25, but not exceeding 50 words	Ninepence ...	One shilling and six-pence
Exceeding 50, but not exceeding 100 words	One shilling and six-pence	Three shillings
Every additional 50 words or portion of 50 words	Sixpence ...	One shilling and six-pence Within the Commonwealth.
Not exceeding 25 words	One shilling
Exceeding 25, but not exceeding 100 words	One shilling and six-pence
Every additional 50 words or portion of 50 words	Sixpence

The foregoing rates are exclusive of portorage charges.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I have given notice of an amendment to omit all the words after “telegrams” in the heading of this schedule down to the word “shilling,” with a view to insert in lieu, thereof, the words, “per word, exclusive of eight words for address and signature, one penny; minimum charge for message, 9d.” It has, however, been suggested to me that the moving of that amendment would prevent other honorable members from moving amendments which they wish to bring forward, and, therefore, I move now,—

That the words “town and suburban, within prescribed limits” be omitted.

That amendment will raise the question whether a special rate should be given to the town and suburban areas, and later on if it is carried, I shall move the omission of the word “other” upon which the question of the general rate to be charged can be discussed. I do not wish to resurrect all the arguments which have been used on this subject in second reading speeches. I think it has been conclusively shown that there are no strong reasons why a distinction should be made between the town and suburban areas and the country, in the matter of telegraph rates. Those who reside in town and suburban areas have many advantages which country residents do not possess. They have a delivery of letters two or three times daily, a telephone service, and many other means of communication arising out of their closeness to each other.

That being so, I do not see why they should be specially favoured in the matter of telegraph rates. If the town and suburban telegraph rate is lowered, a larger staff of operators and messengers will be needed for the transmission of the messages, and not only will the revenue from telegrams suffer, but the receipts from the postal and telephone services are also likely to diminish. I shall altogether oppose the adoption of a sixpenny rate for telegrams, and I think there are strong reasons why whatever rate is given to the town and suburban areas should be extended at least some distance into the country.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). — I must again ask the attention of honorable members to the fact that the department is proposing to make concessions in this direction which are estimated at some £40,000 a year. It is, moreover, proposing to give to the community a cheaper telegraphic system than exists anywhere else in the known world. In making that statement I am quoting the words of Mr. Sassoun, who is associated with Mr. Sandford Fleming in electrical business. Honorable members may be of the opinion that the telegraphic systems of the United States and of Canada are cheap systems; but Mr. Sandford Fleming, in speaking on the subject to a body of scientists specially interested in this matter, drew attention to the fact that the rates charged in those countries are practically twice as high as the rates charged elsewhere. There is in America a 50-cent. rate for telegrams sent from one town to another, but if a telegram is transmitted from Boston to San Francisco, the rate charged is 1 dollar. As a matter of fact, the proposals of the Postmaster-General are rather ahead of the times, because, whereas he proposes to give a minimum rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a word, and a maximum rate of 1d. a word, the rate from London to different parts of the continent varies from 2d. a word to Paris, a distance of 287 miles, to $5\frac{1}{2}$ d. a word to St. Petersburg, a distance of 1,774 miles. The Postmaster-General wishes to continue to the town and suburban districts of five of the States the privilege of a special rate which they have hitherto enjoyed, and to extend that privilege to the town and suburban residents of Victoria, where, hitherto, there has been a uniform rate of 9d. throughout the State. In all the States but one there has hitherto been a town and suburban rate of 6d. a telegram for a limited number of words, with a charge of 1d. a word for telegrams transmitted throughout the whole State, of 2d. a word for telegrams sent through two States, and of 3d. a word for telegrams sent through three States. In putting forward the proposals in the Bill, the Postmaster-General not only desires to legislate in a federal spirit for a federated community, but he evidently had in his mind the statement made by Mr. Sandford Fleming, that a feature of peculiar importance in the British telegraph service is the adoption of a uniform charge for all distances. The proposal of the honorable member for Grampians would give a uniform rate of 1d. throughout the Commonwealth, but it would do away with the cheaper suburban rate. In considering whether he should adopt the zone system in regard to telegraph rates, the Postmaster-General was confronted with the provisions of section 99 of the Constitution, the correct interpretation of which is a matter worthy of the consideration of our legal friends, as to whether, in legislating for the Commonwealth, we are bound to regard every individual as entitled to the same privileges.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—What about the postage rates?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Undoubtedly the rates are incongruous, but they exist under State laws. Directly the Postmaster-General comes to deal with the varying rates of postage, he must adopt the principle of an amendment, which was moved last evening by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, that they should be uniform.

Mr. GLYNN.—Then a distinction ought not to be made between a man who sends a long telegram, and a man who sends a short one.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The logic of that remark does not appeal to my mind. I do not propose to discuss the provision in section 99 of the Constitution Act. I merely call the attention of honorable members to the position, because it has occurred to me that if we cannot immediately adopt the letter, we must progress towards the spirit of the section, which says—

The Commonwealth shall not by any law or regulation of trade, commerce, or revenue give preference to one State or any part thereof over another State or any part thereof.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How would the honorable gentleman apply that principle of equality to States which are unequal in their natural conditions?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am not going to deal with that point. I have not risen to make a learned disquisition on the law of that section, but I think that when we come to deal with the question of zones, we shall simplify the discussion, and get out of a great deal of difficulty, if we remember its existence, and the comments of the learned gentlemen who compiled the Annotated Constitution, in which they most distinctly lay down in connexion with services rendered—they even use the term “postal services,” I believe—that it would be a preference. With respect to the question whether the Postmaster-General is giving a cheaper service, I desire to make a few observations. The department has estimated the value of the reductions in the rates which are made by this Bill, at about £40,000 per annum. On a previous occasion I told honorable members that the Postmaster-General in consenting to give up that amount of revenue expects to receive a similar amount, or a little more, from the postage on newspapers. Last evening the expectation of that increased revenue was materially affected by the amendments carried in regard to the weight of newspapers. The department will lose a considerable sum by those alterations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not think it will lose £100.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—Surely if the Postmaster-General proposes to carry 16 ozs. of newspaper for 1d., and he is made to carry 20 ozs. for that rate, it is very certain that on the aggregate of 6,000 tons of newspapers which are carried over our railways, and a large proportion of which goes on to the postal carts, he must be a considerable loser.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The rate will not operate on all that matter.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—It will operate very largely. However, I wish to limit my observations to the question immediately before the committee. I desire to call attention to a statement which has been rather forcefully obtruded upon honorable members, namely, that the schedule gives no advantages to the people—that instead of the 6d. suburban rate being maintained, it is being increased to 9d. I find that, whether the message be confined to twelve words or to 24 words, and even taking into consideration the charge for the address, Victoria gains considerably under the schedule. If I take the rate between New South Wales or Victoria and South Australia, I find that in every respect, excepting the twelve words, there is an all-round reduction—that whereas the rates are from 2s. to 3s., they will be from 1s. 6d. to 2s. So far as New South Wales, Victoria, and Western Australia are concerned, the rates which are at present from 3s. to 4s. 6d. will be reduced to 1s. 6d., with a maximum of 2s. It will be a great disappointment I hold, to the people of the five States who have a suburban rate if it is discontinued. It is the cheapest service so far as the department is concerned. More profit is made on the suburban business than on any other; the cost of construction is limited to a few miles instead of extending to hundreds of miles, while the cost of maintenance is proportionately less. Therefore, we may presume that, with a rate of 1d. per word, the profit is greater over the short distance than over the long distance.

Mr. SKENE.—Has the honorable gentleman any official statement to that effect?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No; but I have been associated with a Postal department for a great many years, and in Tasmania we always considered that a greater profit was made on the short mileage than on the long mileage. I think it will be found that the suburban rates on the mainland pay better than do the rates for long distances. A very large proportion of the population of these States live within the operation of the suburban rates, and to rob the five States of the advantages which they have because Victoria has not enjoyed them is wrong. I believe that they would prefer to extend to Victoria the advantages which they enjoy. I hope that the suburban rate will be continued.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable gentleman, before he resumes his seat, indicate what his attitude is with regard to charging for the address and the sender's name?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The Postmaster-General lays great stress on the advisability of enabling him to charge for the address and the sender's name. It has been stated by the honorable member for Parramatta that a return of the number of telegrams sent out of the Sydney office on a given day shows that about 90 per cent. averaged from five to fifteen words. My honorable colleague urges the advisability of making the proposed charge, because he has valued the services to be rendered at over £95,000 per annum, and although I have heard the honorable member for Parramatta challenge the accuracy of that statement on one or two occasions, it is indorsed by the Deputy Postmasters-General, who, being practical men, are in a position to support their statements. If it is seriously proposed to deprive the Postmaster-General of his right to make this charge, I must ask honorable members to consider at what cost it is to be done, and to give a reason why it should be done, seeing that in other important countries a charge is made. In New South Wales and Canada, the address is not charged for in connexion with a certain class of their business, but, as I said before, their rates are certainly twice those which are payable elsewhere.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Does the 6d. suburban rate pay in Sydney, where the address is not charged for?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I am not in a position to say. The department cannot afford to give way in every direction, and I must ask the committee to consider whether it is advisable to adopt a uniform rate of 1d. per word for the Commonwealth, and to enable the Postmaster-General to make good some portion of the loss which it will entail by making a charge for the address, and the name of the sender. We cannot carry telegrams all over the Commonwealth at the rate of 1d. per word, if we do not charge for the address and the sender's name, which are estimated at seven words, except at a very serious loss to the revenue. I hope that the committee will support the provision for a charge to be made.

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—If we are to have long second reading speeches on every point which is raised, we shall not conclude the consideration of this Bill to-day. I should like the debate to be confined to the simple point—are we to have differential rates within one State—which is raised by the amendment of the honorable member for Grampians to strike out the words, “town and suburban within prescribed limits”? I think that we should not sanction the introduction of differential rates. I fail to see why the rate for Melbourne and suburbs should be different from that for Gisborne, Kyneton, Bendigo, Ballarat, or Castlemaine. I am not familiar with the working of the department, but I imagine that it costs no more to send a telegram from Melbourne to Ballarat or Bendigo than to Caulfield or Williamstown, which are within the metropolitan radius. Residents in the cities enjoy many more conveniences than are at the command of people who live in the remote districts. In many cases heavy portorage has to be paid upon country messages, and it is wrong to penalize those who are far removed from the populous centres by making them pay an extra charge for their telegrams. Whatever rate is fixed should be uniform throughout the States. We cannot afford to throw away revenue, and if the reduction of the telegraph rates would involve any loss I should be in favour of retaining those now in existence, at any rate until the book-keeping period has expired.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I am always happy to shorten debate as much as possible, but I regard this as one of the most important and practical questions that we have been called upon to discuss. The Bill will be far-reaching in its consequences, and our decision will probably hold good for a very long period. The figures furnished by the Government with regard to many matters connected with the postal system show the necessity for employing some reliable statistical authority. I do not for one moment doubt the bona fides of the Minister, but I do not believe in the figures he has presented to us. I am sorry that I cannot agree with the proposal that a uniform rate should be charged throughout the States. So many attempts have been made to curtail the rights and privileges which have hitherto been enjoyed by the public that people are beginning to ask whether the objects with which the Commonwealth was established were not entirely misunderstood. The Government proposals with regard to city and suburban telegrams would have the effect of increasing the rates from 6d. to 9d. per message, and I shall be no party to making any such change. Uniformity is very desirable within reasonable bounds, but we must not lose sight of the special considerations which should operate in this case. I am willing to support the honorable member for the Grampians in securing a uniform rate for all messages throughout the Commonwealth, beyond those despatched within city and suburban areas. The question for us to consider is whether the rates now proposed, including the eight words allowed for the names and addresses, are reasonable, in view of the financial necessities of the department. In dealing with this matter for the whole of the Commonwealth, we should not lay too much stress upon the necessity for immediate payment. If we believe that an arrangement extending generous terms to the public would pay within a reasonable period we should be prepared to face an immediate loss. That should be the guiding policy in the administration of all the great public departments. I should cordially support a proposal to make a uniform charge of 9d. per message throughout Australia, apart from a special charge of 6d. per message for telegrams despatched within city and suburban areas. In each case eight words should be allowed for the names and addresses.

Mr. WATSON.—Would a charge of 9d. be sufficient for messages despatched from one end of Australia to the other?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I do not know that 9d. telegrams would pay at once, but I believe that ultimately the revenue would be increased. None of us can say with authority that a 9d. or a 10d. or a 1s. rate would involve a loss, and we can only arrive at the truth by experience after a reasonable trial. The statistics presented to us cannot be absolutely relied on. I make full allowance for the difficulties of the situation, because I have stated on previous occasions that no Treasurer could possibly forecast the financial position of the Commonwealth during the next two or three years. At the same time, we should be prepared to make reasonable concessions, and to deal with the Commonwealth departments from a national stand-point, in order that the public may derive substantial advantages from the change of administration. It is a matter for consideration whether eight words would be sufficient to allow for names and addresses. In England, they obviate a great deal of difficulty by charging for the addresses, and they adopt a system under which persons can register their addresses at a small fee, and thus reduce the directions on the telegrams to a minimum number of words. I know, however, that in many parts of Australia the addresses have to be given at some length in order to insure the delivery of the message to the proper person. We should be very careful not to make innovations which will have the effect of restricting the privileges hitherto enjoyed by the public. I should be inclined to adhere to the present system rather than take drastic steps which would operate to the disadvantage of those who now make use of the public services. The tendency of all progressive movements in these days is to annihilate space so far as correspondence and communication is concerned, and the volume of business in our public departments and our revenue will increase in proportion to the liberality of the terms extended to the public. I understand, of course, that there are certain limits beyond which we cannot go if we desire our public departments to be conducted upon a paying basis, but it will be better to err on the side of liberality at the outset, and retrace our steps afterwards if necessary.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie). — The amendment of which I have given notice provides for the omission of the whole of the words in the body of the schedule, including those comprehended in the amendment now before us, and the substitution of an entirely new form. The honorable member for Grampians has submitted the straight-out issue whether there should be any distinction made between town and suburban and country telegrams. I am strongly of opinion that it is unfair to differentiate between the two classes of messages, because any such distinction must perpetuate that centralizing policy which has been one of the greatest curses of Australia. I recognise that the claim put forward by residents in the metropolitan areas has a certain amount of force. The claim is, that they are really wholesale customers, but I would point out that they cannot really be regarded as wholesale customers, because the individual units who use the telegraph lines must be taken into account. It simply means that the scattered populations—those who from the very fact of their being separated should have greater consideration—are made to suffer. I think that is very unfair. I am glad to say that we have not had this differential rate in Victoria, and when we last reduced the cost of postage we again refused to have a differential rate. Victoria is one of the most evenly settled States in the group. As it has been found in Victoria inadvisable to make this distinction, how much greater will be the ill results following from such a distinction in States that are not so closely settled? I would urge honorable members to see that every part of every State in the Commonwealth has the same privilege extended to it, and that no part is called upon by reason of the disadvantages from which it suffers to pay a greater penalty than the people in those parts who enjoy greater benefits. The honorable member for Echuca has pointed out that in the country at present those who use the telegraph wires are placed at a distinct disadvantage, not only with regard to the want of facilities in being compelled to travel very many miles to use the telegraph, and in being compelled also to wait a considerable time before receiving replies to their messages, but also in having to pay a large amount in portage. If they do not pay portage, we have in Victoria a system by means of which telegrams can be sent to the receiver by post; but that means delay and probable additional expense. Is it a fair thing that those who live in areas which are more centralized should have the privilege of a reduction, such as is proposed by the Government, of 33½ per cent. over those who are residing in the country? That is the question we have to settle. Are we to have a differential rate, or—as we say that all men are equal before the law, and as duties of customs that are imposed are levied equally in every instance—are we going to say that those who use the post-office are to be charged in accordance with the benefit which they receive. The benefit to a man in the country is not one whit greater than to the man in the town. The benefit is equal, and the expense is very nearly equal; at any rate, there is very little difference indeed. Therefore, we should not make this difference in the payments. Some honorable members may ask whether I should be in favour of all men paying the same for travelling on the railway lines without regard to distance. There the benefit which is conferred upon the passenger bears a strict relation to the amount which he pays, and to the cost of conveyance. But with regard to telegraphs there is very little difference, or none whatever. Under the circumstances, I hope to see the cost reduced. I do not want to see the amount which the Government proposes charged at all; but, if it is to be charged, let it be paid by all, and not by a section.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I do not think we are proceeding in the right way with regard to this question. First of all, the committee should have decided whether the names and addresses are to be paid for. The Victorian rate will be an increase upon the New South Wales rate, and that is what we want to avoid.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I shall vote for sixpenny telegrams without names and addresses being charged for.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If we decide that whatever rate is fixed shall be uniform, we shall be committed to a higher uniform rate, instead of to a lower one.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—The question now is whether we shall have differential rates or not.

Mr. SKENE.—The question we have to decide is whether we shall retain the words "town and suburban." If the honorable member for Parramatta wants sixpenny telegrams, he should propose a charge of sixpence within a certain radius of a post-office.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I appreciate that point, and I also want to abolish these distinctions if I can get a uniform lower rate. But I do not want to abolish them if we are to have a uniform higher rate. If I could not get a sixpenny rate for the States, I should prefer to have a sixpenny rate for the cities, and ninepence for the country, rather than a ninepenny rate all through. The honorable member for Grampians, on the other hand, is, I understand, in favour of a ninepenny rate all through. I do not think there should be a uniform rate throughout the Commonwealth. We have not got to that point yet. We are pushing the federal idea to an absurd extreme if we urge that. What we want is a zone rate.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—The honorable member favours penny postage for the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And I should be in favour of a uniform telegraph rate if I thought it would pay. That is the distinction between postal and telegraphic rates. The honorable member can at present send a letter to Queensland for 2d., but he cannot send a telegram to Queensland at the same rate as that for which he can send a telegram in his own State. The telegraph rates vary for purely financial reasons. The distinction is preserved everywhere. In Canada and all over the world there is no uniformity as between postage and telegraph rates. For the present, at any rate, 1s. for Inter-State telegraph messages is little enough. A shilling for 3,000 miles ought to satisfy the greatest stickler for economy or for facilities. My idea is that there should be a zone within which the 6d. rate would operate, names and addresses being not charged for; and that there should be another rate of 1s. for the rest of the Commonwealth. I would make the zone 600 miles in extent.

Mr. A. PATERSON.—That would cover New South Wales, but what about Queensland?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The zone should be 600 miles from any post-office in the Commonwealth; therefore it would operate as well in Queensland as anywhere else. Any man in Queensland would be able to go to a telegraph-office, say, in the centre of that State, and could send a 6d. telegram to Brisbane or to the northern portion of the State within 600 miles. The zone rate would operate all over Australia, without respect to borders. But the proposal of the honorable member would operate only within the State, and he would still charge for names and addresses, which is the most vicious element in the whole position. It really means that a proposal for 6d. telegrams is a proposal for 9d. telegrams. If the Minister will take the schedule as it stands, and will leave out the proposal to charge for names and addresses, I shall be prepared to support him right through. It is the proposal to charge for names and addresses that I most strongly object to. Let the Government agree to make names and addresses free, plus the rates proposed in the schedule, and I will support them, although I admit that theirs is not a strictly federal proposal.

Mr. POYNTON.—Do I understand that the honorable member wants telegrams sent from Adelaide to Melbourne for 6d.?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, if the distance is within 600 miles.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does he want 6d. telegrams for the whole continent?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Oh, no. If a man wanted to telegraph from Adelaide to Sydney he would have to pay 1s. My proposal means the complete obliteration of the borders. I candidly believe that such a system would bring in quite as much revenue as would the rates which the Government propose. The more telegraph facilities are given to the people the better the service will pay ultimately, and the cheaper the telegrams are made the greater will be the number sent over the wires, and ultimately the better the revenue will be.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the committee will extend to me their indulgence for a few moments, and the Chairman allows me a little latitude, I will venture to suggest what I hope will prove to be a compromise satisfactory to all concerned. I begin by accepting the proposition laid down by the honorable member for Parramatta, that this schedule should contain no increases on any existing rates within the Commonwealth. In every case what is proposed should either be the existing rate or a lower rate. What I think honorable members have had in view—those at all events, who represent five States, where a distinction has existed between metropolitan and country rates—what the great bulk of the committee have had in view—has been a 6d. town message, a 9d. State message, and a 1s. Commonwealth or Inter-State message. The zone proposal of the honorable member for Parramatta has much to recommend it, and will probably be adopted eventually. But while the bookkeeping system obtains—while we have to reckon the receipts in each State—we are not taking an anti-federal course in maintaining the present system. We are only adopting the most convenient method of enabling the telegraph revenue to be allocated. The zone system would mean the division of every Inter-State message into fractions, in order to enable the proper amount to be credited to each State, whereas the present system enables the collections to be at once credited to the proper States. If we commenced with a blank sheet, no one would favour the present system; but, under existing circumstances, having regard to the bookkeeping system, it appears to be a very desirable method to retain for the next few years. If honorable members will permit me to trespass for a moment, I will make a remark or two on the subject of charging for names and addresses. It has been the custom throughout Australia to enable names and addresses to be telegraphed free, and that privilege, as honorable members are aware, has, in some instances, been abused. At all events, it is desirable, while making allowance for proper provision for names and addresses to be telegraphed, to avoid the free use which has been made of the telegraph lines in that respect.

Mr. WATSON.—If there are two few words in the name and address it may mean more expense to the department.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is so, but if a reasonable margin be allowed—and I think that six words is reasonable—and if we allow a message to be sent at a fixed rate with that number of words free for the name and address, increasing the charge if more words are used for that purpose, it will rest with the person sending the message whether he uses the full number of six words for the name and address, or whether he puts the name and address into fewer words and gets the benefit of the extra words in the body of his telegram.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Would names beginning with "Mac" and "O" be counted as two words?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not in any English-speaking country. The proposals which I venture to submit to the committee, not as retaining all that the Government would desire in the way of financial gain, but as representing, apparently, the views of a majority. The proposals are as follow:—City and suburban telegrams, including address and signature, not exceeding sixteen words, 6d.; each additional word, up to twenty words, 1d.; and each additional word thereafter, $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Messages within the States, exclusive of the city and suburban area, including the address and signature, not exceeding fifteen words, 9d.; each additional word up to twenty-four words, 1d.; and each additional word thereafter $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

We propose further that Inter-State messages, including the address and signature, not exceeding sixteen words shall be charged 1s., and each additional word 2d.

Mr. WATSON.—Why not make it sixteen words all round?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have no objection to adopting that course.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Would it not be better to make one charge for all words in excess of sixteen words?

Mr. GLYNN.—Why not follow the alternative proposal outlined by the experts?

Mr. DEAKIN.—As a matter of fact the recommendation of the experts was that each additional word should be charged 1d. That would mean that for the city and suburban area a telegram containing sixteen words would be charged 6d., whilst for every additional word 1d. would be the rate. Within the States 9d. would be charged for sixteen words, and 1d. for every additional word, whilst Inter-State messages would cost 1s., and 1d. for every additional word. After all perhaps it would be an advantage to have only two rates. Under such a system city messages containing twenty words would pay a little more—but these are not very numerous—whilst the Inter-State messages would pay 1d. instead of 2d. for each word in excess of sixteen and up to 24 words.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—As the discussion has become general, I think it is only right that I should give the committee some fuller reasons for moving this amendment. I fully recognise that whilst our present financial relations with the States continue, the question of revenue is one of the very greatest importance. I attach no importance whatever to the estimate which the Minister has placed before us in regard to addresses and signatures. Last night the honorable member for Parramatta and the honorable and learned member for Corinella stigmatized some of the estimates which he gave as mere guesswork. I am disposed to go further, and say, in the language of the poet Gordon, that it is not only guesswork, but a blank enigma. No one can possibly say what the result of these charges will be. Therefore I think that the estimate of the Attorney-General ought to be completely eliminated from the consideration of this question. The Government, moreover, have entirely given away any argument in favour of an additional rate which may be based either on long distance or upon the cost of transmission. The question of long distance involves the cost of construction and maintenance of the lines, and the charge for transmission involves the passing of the same telegram through several different offices. The Minister representing the Postmaster-General has declared that the public could send an Inter-State message from Cape Leuwin or Cape Howe to Thursday Island. He might have gone further, and stated that they could send a telegram from Brisbane to Cape Leuwin. Upon the ground of distance, there is no justification whatever for an extra charge upon Inter-State messages. The only reason which can possibly be urged is that some messages pass from within the boundaries of one State to those of another. The Minister has also put it that it might be held to be unconstitutional to adopt the zone system. But I look at that matter from an entirely different stand-point. I think that the system, as proposed by the Ministry, would be unconstitutional. They propose to introduce a zone of 25 miles upon the boundaries of the different States.

Mr. WATSON.—I understand that they have now dropped that.

Mr. SKENE.—If their proposal does not constitute a preference as between one part of a State and another, I do not know what does. If an individual trading between Moama and Melbourne, and another trading between Deniliquin and Melbourne are to be charged different rates, the former 9d., and the latter 1s., I hold that a distinct preference is made in favour of one part of a State as against another. I have looked up probably the best constitutional authority to be had—I refer to Messrs. Quick and Garran's Annotated Constitution—and their view upon what constitutes a preference as set out upon page 877 of their work is as follows:—

A preference is a discrimination considered in relation to the person or State in whose favour such a discrimination is In the case of the Commonwealth every preference whatever is forbidden by the Constitution itself, irrespective of injustice or unreasonableness.

I hold that under the Constitution the Commonwealth is prohibited from giving any part of a State a preference. Of course, I do not pretend to be able to construe the Constitution as well as could a lawyer, but to my mind, if the extract which I have quoted is not in accordance with its letter, it is certainly in accordance with its spirit. It is not within the province of this Legislature to make laws which give an advantage to one person over another. The rate which is now proposed in the Bill for State messages is 9d. Under that proposal a telegram can be sent in South Australia from Adelaide to Port Darwin—a distance of about 2,000 miles—but in no part of Victoria can a message be sent a quarter of that distance. Thus a distinct preference is given to one State as against another. To my mind there is no justification whatever for this distinction. On the one hand, a message can be transmitted for 2,000 miles in South Australia for 9d., whilst a similar telegram between Moama and Echuca—a distance of only one mile—would be charged 1s. The zone system at least has the advantage that some reason can be assigned for the extra charge. We cannot split up a penny for a postage stamp into a number of parts as a pound can be apportioned in connexion with railway travelling; neither can 9d. for a telegram be subdivided into a great many parts. We must take a certain area in which a minimum charge is made. The rate charged for telegrams in Sydney, for the metropolitan area is 6d., and for the country 1s. It seems to me that fact indicates that Sydney has controlled the destinies of New South Wales very much as Melbourne has dominated those of Victoria. Under my proposal, the 6d. rate in Sydney would be very much equalized by the fact that most of the country messages would be charged a lower rate than they are at present. Similarly the Inter-State messages would cost less. Of course, I admit that the long-distance lines in South Australia and Western Australia are to a large extent national lines. I am not objecting to the rate charged in South Australia. I only use it to point the argument, that if the people of one State can send a telegram 2,000 miles for 9d., there is no reason whatever why the Commonwealth should not adopt the same course irrespective of State boundaries. The bulk of the Inter-State telegrams simply cross the border line, and if the argument of the honorable member for Parramatta, that a 6d. rate within the metropolitan area will produce more revenue is sound, it is fair to assume that a reduction in the Inter-State charge will also be productive of a similar result. Trade advantages are generally with the large towns. To my mind, the charge in the town districts might well be so levelled up as to bring about a uniform rate. My contention is that a uniform rate would be more in consonance with the federal spirit; that it would facilitate and simplify the administration of the department; and that it would, perhaps, effect some saving in that direction. The 9d. rate—eliminating, of course, the proposed charge for name, address, and signature—should be a uniform one, and the people of Sydney should consider the advantage which they would obtain from the extension of the rate to country districts. I believe that the proposal which I have made for a uniform rate would, if adopted, return just as much, if not more, revenue than would the proposal made by the Government.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I welcome the announcement made by the Attorney-General that the Government are prepared to accept a modified scheme. I agree with the honorable member for Parramatta that one of the principal grounds of complaint against the scheme embodied in the Bill was the charge proposed to be made for names, addresses, and signatures, because that charge would have involved a very heavy burden upon persons using the service. In a circular issued by the Victorian Storekeepers' and Traders' Association, it is stated that—

Telegrams, if sent according to the proposed new rates in the schedule, would cost the sender at least 50 per cent. more than is charged at present.

Mr. SALMON.—That is in regard to 9d. telegrams.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Yes. The trading community of Victoria make decided complaints, in which the Stock Exchange joins very seriously, against the proposal. In a circular issued by the Stock Exchange of Melbourne, it is said—

Our principal objection to the Bill is the new departure charging for name, address, and signature, introduced by the Postmaster-General on the plea that this is the practice in every civilized country outside of Australia. In making this assertion the Postmaster-General evidently overlooked the United States and Canada, where name, address, and signature are free.

Particulars are furnished showing that if a charge were made for names, addresses, and signatures, the business done in the telegraph-office at the Melbourne Stock Exchange would involve an extra charge of over £1,800 per annum. I am glad that the Minister has seen his way clear to propose an amended scheme, in which he has abandoned the contemplated charge. At the same time I am sorry that he is unable to go a little further, and provide for 6d. telegrams over wider areas than those of city and suburbs. Like the honorable member for Echuca and the honorable member for Laanecoorie, I fail to see why cities such as Melbourne, Sydney, or any other Australian capital, should be particularly favoured by the special application of the system to them. It is said that most of these metropolitan centres have hitherto enjoyed the system, and that it would be very hard to deprive them of it. But the value of the system in city and suburbs has been of late years considerably reduced by the extension of the telephone service. When 6d. telegrams for cities and suburbs were first introduced, there was no telephonic system such as now exists in Melbourne, Sydney, Adelaide, and the other metropolitan cities of the Commonwealth and the extension of the telephone service has largely dispensed with the necessity of resorting to the popular and cheap system of 6d. telegrams in these places. It is stated in a circular issued by the Victorian Shopkeepers' Association that the telephone is now so largely used in cities and suburbs that telegrams are rarely thought of by business people, so that the great stress laid by the honorable member for Parramatta upon the 6d. telegram system as a kind of rightful inheritance of Sydney and other capitals, is not altogether justified. The time has arrived when we should allow telegrams to be sent at this cheap rate over wider areas than those suggested. The only question is as to the principle upon which the system should be extended. It should be possible to devise a method to extend it, first of all to telegrams sent to any address within a State. That is what, I understand, the honorable member for Laanecoorie suggests. To a large extent, however, that would involve an inequality in the privileges enjoyed by the people of the various States. For instance, residents of Queensland would be able to send sixpenny telegrams over much wider areas than would be possible to the people of Victoria.

Mr. CROUCH.—In Western Australia people would be able to send telegrams over distances twenty times as great as would be possible to the residents of Tasmania.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Exactly. Therefore a State could hardly be taken as a fair measure. If it were decided to adopt the sixpenny telegram system, it would be only fit and proper to consider the zone system suggested by the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The same trouble would occur under that system.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not think that the discrimination would be so glaring.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But the book-keeping period is fatal to the adoption of that system.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Of course. I am not quite satisfied that the time has arrived when we could adopt it; but, ideally and logically, I think it would be a desirable system.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The honorable member for Parramatta allows that the time has not yet arrived for its adoption.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That is so. I do not think that the suggestion made by the honorable member for Grampians, that we should have one uniform system, could be vindicated either on commercial or logical grounds. We should charge for telegrams, according to the value of the services rendered. It is urged that a telegram can be sent over a distance of 1,000 miles at no greater expense than is involved in sending a message over a distance of 100 miles. But in dealing with a revenue-earning and service-rendering department such as this, we have to consider the amount of capital which has been sunk to enable it to render those services.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If we do that we shall never have a 6d. rate for the country.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—We might have a rough and ready line of demarcation in regard to the value of the services rendered, without insisting upon any mathematical accuracy. At the same time I do not think the time has arrived for that. I have been principally interested in endeavouring to secure the abolition of the proposal that a charge should be made for names, addresses, and signatures. I am glad that that proposal has been thrown aside. My next object will be to secure the concession of 6d. telegrams, either within a State or under some zone system; but as the time is not yet ripe for that, I do not see my way clear to unduly press it. I hope the time will arrive when the department will be conducted upon such lines, and when our federal development will have arrived at such a stage as to enable us to give more liberal concessions in this direction.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—I am very glad that the Ministry have made an amended proposal, because I am always anxious, especially in regard to postal matters, to follow the recommendations of the department, seeing that private members necessarily suffer from a want of accurate information upon the question. I was in somewhat of a difficulty in regard to the proposals in the Bill, because they do not appear to be in accordance with the recommendations of the experts. They are certainly not in accordance with the two recommendations contained in the report which I obtained from the Minister, and therefore I should have had considerable difficulty in accepting them. The proposition now made comes very near to an alternative proposal made by the experts. It is more protective for the revenue, and therefore I approve of it, although it is not quite so liberal. The alternative suggestion now made is that a charge of 6d. shall be made for a telegram containing sixteen words in cities and suburbs; 9d. for other telegrams transmitted to any address within a State, and 1s. for Inter-State telegrams, with a charge of 1d. per word for every word in excess of sixteen. That proposal allows six words for the name and address as against the estimate of five given by the experts. The recommendation of the experts was that Inter-State telegrams should be transmitted for 6d. each. Their alternate suggestion was that a charge of 6d. should be made for city and suburban telegrams, and 9d. for any other telegram sent to any address within a State, with a charge of 1d. for every additional word over fifteen. They also proposed a 6d. rate for Inter-State telegrams up to fifteen words, with a further charge of 1d. for every additional word.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Did they actually propose a lower rate for Inter-State messages than that for State messages?

Mr. GLYNN.—I think the honorable and learned member will find the statement to which I have referred in the second alternative suggestion made by the experts. The Ministerial proposal that a charge of 1s. shall be made for Inter-State telegrams is certainly far more protective to the revenue. I contend it should be so for the reason that the loss will be far greater to South Australia than to any other State. In South Australia we obtain a far greater proportion of our postal and telegraphic revenue from the transmission of telegrams than from other branches of the service. When we were considering the matter at the Convention in 1897, figures were produced showing that in 1896 South Australia obtained £89,000 from the telegraph service, as against £91,000 obtained by Victoria from the same source. Having regard to the smaller population in South Australia, the returns for that State are much larger.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I find that the experts recommended that a charge should be made for names and addresses in Inter-State messages. That would have made the Inter-State rate higher than that proposed for messages within a State.

Mr. GLYNN.—A charge was to be made for names and addresses in all cases.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Not in the case of city and suburban messages.

Mr. GLYNN.—I did not notice that. The Government propose 1s. telegrams, allowing six words for the name and address, so that it really amounts to a proposition to transmit a ten-words message for 1s. That is half the rate at present charged on telegrams between South Australia and Victoria, and I believe it to be a fair concession. We cannot expect to keep up the rate of 2s., nor can messages be sent for as low a sum as has been suggested, seeing that that course would mean a loss of some £20,000 in South Australia. The estimated loss for the whole Commonwealth will be £90,000, and, considering that the telegraph service produces more in proportion in South Australia than in any other State, the South Australian share of the loss would not be a tenth; but, if addresses were free, to probably £20,000. I am glad, therefore, that an alternative suggestion has been made which very nearly represents what is a fair charge for all the States.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I am glad the Minister has agreed to allow six words for the names and addresses. I had given notice of an amendment suggesting that the number of words allowed for the names and addresses should be eight, leaving ten for the message. I feel, however, that the Minister has met the position very fairly, though at the same time, if any amendment, which I think an improvement, be proposed, I shall hold myself free to vote for it. I consider that the lower the charge for messages, the greater the revenue is likely to be. I cannot, however, support a very large reduction because I think it would take some time to make up the revenue. At the same time, I feel that the proposal now before us is a step in the right direction. There will be a large increase in the number of Inter-State messages, and of messages in the cities and suburbs. Personally I have the same complaint to make against telephones that I have to make in regard to the delivery of telegrams. Many of us know that it is better to walk home than to send a telegraph message there, and much loss of time and inconvenience is caused by delay at the telephone. No satisfaction will be given until some money has been spent on establishing the metallic return system. I do not blame the officers of the department; I blame the fact that the money is not forthcoming to bring the service up to date, and I hope the matter will be taken into consideration as soon as possible.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I am glad some concession has been made by the Minister, though I cannot regard it as of any advantage to the ordinary man in Victoria, who will have to pay higher rates than previously. I usually receive about four telegrams a week, and I find that the average address and signature consists of nine words, though I am willing to accept eight as sufficient. An address is necessary to the signature also in many cases.

The CHAIRMAN.—I ask the honorable member not to discuss that question at present, because it is not before the committee.

Mr. CROUCH.—I understand that there is to be some alternative proposal, and I want to show why the amendment of the honorable member for Grampians should be accepted in preference to that proposal. An allowance of sixteen words for 6d. would be of no advantage in Victoria. Are country towns like Bacchus Marsh subject to the city and suburban rates?

Sir PHILIP FYSE.—No.

Mr. CROUCH.—The charge in Victoria now is 9d. for nine words, and, allowing ten words or eight words for the address and signature, that means nineteen words or seventeen words as the present message allowance. Under the alternative scheme, a country resident of Victoria will be allowed only sixteen words for 9d.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Is all legislation to be based on Victorian usage?

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not say that it should, but I quote Victorian rates and places because I am better acquainted with their details, and I do not want men in Victoria to feel that the Commonwealth scheme is placing them under a disadvantage. Nor do I want any part of the Commonwealth to suffer diminution of its privileges through this Bill. The Victorian country resident gets no advantage from the city rate, and the State rate places him at a disadvantage. It is proposed that Inter-State charge shall be 1s. for sixteen words.

The CHAIRMAN.—I must ask the honorable and learned member not to continue to discuss the rates; they are not now before the committee.

Mr. CROUCH.—I submit with all respect that the Acting Prime Minister, in his responsible position, urged the proposed rates as arguments against the suggestion of the honorable member for Grampians, and that therefore I have a perfect right to discuss this matter, and I intend to do so, unless I am otherwise stopped. I have only one other, but very necessary, reference to make to the rates. It has been suggested, as an amendment, that the charge for an Inter-State message of sixteen words shall be 9d. At the present time a person in any part of Victoria can telegraph to New South Wales ten words for 1s., which means twenty words or eighteen words, allowing ten words or eight words for the address and signature. The Government proposal is sixteen words to New South Wales for 1s.—another disadvantage. In view of these facts, the suggested amendment of the honorable member for Grampians should be supported as the only fair solution of the difficulty.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I am prepared to accept the amended proposition of the Government as representing a practical reduction throughout the service. We ought not, however, to go too far in this matter of reductions. I am prepared to give the public all the benefit which the service will permit, but we must not lose sight of the fact that there is an absolute loss at the present time on the Post and Telegraph department throughout the Commonwealth. We have not during the present discussion taken into consideration the important factor of the interest charges on the cost of postal and telegraphic construction throughout the Commonwealth, which represent about a quarter of a million sterling. That is practically a subsidy contributed by the general taxpayer for the benefit of those who use the post and telegraph service, and we are making reductions which, in some instances, amount to 33 per cent. The question arises whether the increased business will be sufficient to return the necessary revenue; and past experience goes to prove that no such result will follow, and that consequently there is possibility of further loss. There is no possibility of introducing the zone system at the present time; and we must accept the situation. The honorable and learned member for Corio has pointed out that the country residents of Victoria will suffer a loss on the charges for Inter-State telegrams to New South Wales; but it must not be forgotten that on the other hand a decided reduction is made in the cost of telegrams to South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania. There will also be a gain in connexion with town messages; and, under the circumstances, I am prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the Government.

Mr. WINTER COOKE (Wannon).—I am sorry that the feeling of the committee seems to be against the proposal of the honorable member for Grampians. At any rate, the representatives of one State, which at present has the advantage of sixpenny telegrams within a certain radius, are very strongly against that proposal. I am afraid that if we permit differential telegraphic rates, the result may be that when at some future time it is sought to adopt a uniform tariff, we shall find very strong protests made on behalf of what I may call vested interests. We may find the residents of towns, which have the advantage of lower rates, contending that if there is to be a uniform tariff throughout the Commonwealth it must be that to which they have been accustomed. When it is remembered that beyond a certain distance from the centre of a city, a charge of 9d. is proposed to be made for a telegram, and a charge of 1s. for sending the same telegram into another State, no matter what the distance may be, how can it be said that the charge is being made in accordance with the services rendered?

Again, while it is proposed to send a telegram 5 miles for 9d, the same telegram can be sent 300 miles for the same amount. I think for the reasons I have given that the committee should support the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Grampians.

Question—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the schedule—put. The committee divided.

In Division :

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—No statement has been made during the division as to whether an extra charge is to be made upon words sent in code. I think the committee should be informed on that point.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment negatived.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The committee having disposed of that matter, the time has come when I may bring definitely before honorable members the amendments which have already been suggested in the second schedule. Honorable members will see that there is no occasion to alter all the headings of the columns in the schedule. I move—

That all the words in Part I. from the words "per word" down to and including the words "one shilling" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof, under the heading, "Town and suburban within prescribed limits," the words "including address and signature, not exceeding 16 words, 6d.; each additional word, 1d.;" under the heading, "Other places within the State," the words "including address and signature, not exceeding 16 words, 9d.; each additional word, 1d.;" and under the heading, "Inter-State, i.e., from any one State to any other State," the words "including address and signature, not exceeding 16 words, 1s.; each additional word, 1d."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I strongly urge the committee to accept these proposals of the Government. They are essentially in the nature of a compromise. In some respects they involve a compromise in all the States, and in other respects they will mean concessions to all the States. For instance, in New South Wales we make some little concession in regard to our town rate, and in the case of Victoria some little concession is made in regard to the country rate. In actual operation these concessions will probably not be found to mean substantial monetary concessions, but, perhaps, the elimination of a word or two from the address or message. With regard to all the other States, there is a gain in the case of country messages. In Victoria there is a corresponding gain in the case of city messages. Of course the proposal involves an unequal rate in Victoria for the first time, but in that respect Victoria has stood alone amongst the States. There are concessions and advantages to be gained by every State under the proposal of the Government. It is a compromise, and I believe that under all the circumstances it is as good a compromise as can possibly be devised.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I have been surprised to hear that the honorable member for Parramatta, who has shown himself to be so strongly in favour of uniformity, making a plea for the introduction of a system which will destroy uniformity in the only State in which it exists in connexion with this matter, while it will perpetuate the lack of uniformity in the other States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is only for the book-keeping period.

Mr. SALMON.—I cannot help looking upon this proposal as a most severe blow at country industries. I honestly feel that an unfair advantage has been taken of the fact that a very large number of country members are not present on this occasion. I think that honorable members from the other States do not appreciate how unfairly this proposal will operate. The honorable member for Parramatta was at first under the impression that, under the proposal of the Government, an advantage will be given to the country, but he now finds that the country will suffer.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; the country will not be charged any more than heretofore.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable and learned gentleman was not here when the matter was debated; otherwise he would have known that it was proved conclusively that, under the Government proposal, the privilege at present enjoyed by country people in the State of Victoria is to be curtailed to the extent of at least two words in every message. I cannot look upon this as other than an attempt on the part of members representing great centres of population to benefit the people of those centres at the expense of the people of the country districts. At the present time no charge is made for addresses and signatures, but an additional charge is made for every word in the message exceeding ten. The Government propose to limit the number of words allowed for the address and the signature to eight, and I think that the limit should be at least ten, but I would be willing to accept nine as a compromise.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—Seven is nearer the mark.

Mr. SALMON.—Then why do the Government propose eight. While it is easy to abbreviate addresses for city and suburban telegrams, where people are easily found, it is not possible to do so for country telegrams. Let me give a case in point. It seems to me that if a man were telegraphing to the country to accept an offer of employment there, a reasonable message would be—"Accept terms; leaving by first train tomorrow"—seven words. If that telegram were addressed to a contractor in Maryborough, the address would be something like this—"James Watson, Contractor, William-street, Maryborough, Victoria"—another seven words, without the name and address of the sender. I do not wish to be accused of taking parochial or provincial views in this matter, and I have referred to the conditions existing in Victoria because I am better acquainted with it than with the other States, and the proposal of the Government takes away from those living in our country districts a benefit which they have hitherto enjoyed. With regard to the proposal to apply a special rate to town and suburban areas, I asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General what constituted a town, and he told me that a definition would be prescribed by regulation. Since then he has informed me that a town is any settlement which has suburbs—a most remarkable definition.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I gave the honorable member two or three examples, such as Bendigo and Ballarat.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable gentleman also mentioned Kyneton as an example. I urged that if the special rate for towns was agreed to, the areas to which it should apply should be determined on a population basis. The honorable gentleman told me that Kyneton had not sufficient population within its own boundaries to justify the extension of the privilege to it, but that when its suburbs were taken into account it would be qualified to benefit by the special rate.

Mr. SKENE.—What is a suburb?

Mr. SALMON.—A suburb, according to the derivation of the word, and in its usual acceptation, is an addition to a city; but there are suburbs in Melbourne which are themselves cities. The only right basis to go upon in this matter is the population basis. If we adopt any other, there will be endless trouble. I shall, however, oppose the proposals of the Government, because I regard them as unfair to those who live in the country districts.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I intend to move the insertion of the word "eighteen." That, I think, will get over the difficulty which has been raised by the honorable member for Laanecoorie.

The CHAIRMAN.—The honorable member can do that when the amendment now before the committee, which provides for the creation of a blank, has been disposed of.

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—I am somewhat surprised at the readiness with which the proposals of the Government have been accepted, especially by country representatives. In speaking upon this subject, I am speaking in the interests not merely of the residents of the country districts of Victoria, but of the residents of the country districts in all parts of Australia. We are told that we must agree to special town and suburban rates in Victoria, because the other five States are at present enjoying those rates, but that a uniform rate of 6d. throughout the States cannot be adopted because it would not pay. I should like to know if the sixpenny rate for town and suburban areas pays. If it does, there could not be much loss in extending it to the country districts, but if it does not pay, it is a gross injustice to charge the country districts 50 per cent. more to make up whatever loss is incurred. The residents in country districts are subject to quite enough disadvantages at present in their remoteness from centres of population, their want of facilities for intercourse, the distance which they have to go to get to post-offices, and the portorage which they have to pay on telegrams, without having to pay an additional 50 per cent. for their messages. If a difference must be made between the town and suburban and country rates, cannot a smaller difference than 50 per cent. be adopted? Would not a difference of 20 per cent. be sufficient to cover the extra cost of transmission? In my opinion, the people in the country should be put on the same level as those in the towns. I think that, like the acting leader of the Opposition, we are all doubting Thomases in regard to the accuracy of the estimate which places the loss of the department at £40,000. That estimate is mere guesswork, because it cannot be satisfactorily foretold what result will come from our new conditions. But let us err on the safe side. If it be thought desirable, however, to run the risk of loss, let us run that risk in respect to both town and country telegrams. Then if, after two or three years' experience of the rates adopted, the Government show that they cannot be made to pay, Parliament can be asked to increase them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did not the honorable member say this morning that he would make the rates as high as possible?

Mr. McCOLL.—I do not want to see a loss in the working of the department, but I contend that whatever rates are adopted they should be uniform. Those who are prepared to vote for the Government proposals en bloc are putting an extra burden upon the people of the country, on whose behalf so much is said, and for whom so little is done. I shall vote against those proposals.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—The amendment which the honorable member for Melbourne intends to move will not remove the grievance to which he has called attention. I desire to obtain some concession for country residents. If I fail to secure the approval of the committee to the amendment of which I have given notice, I should like to see the zone system established, so that it might operate from centres fixed upon according to population. I should not be in favor of making every small telegraph office a centre, but perhaps the zone system might be applied to townships having 1,000 inhabitants and upwards.

Mr. FOWLER.—That would still give a preference to the large centres of population.

Mr. SALMON.—No doubt it would, but, as I have before stated, my first object is to secure a uniform rate. If it could be managed, I should be pleased to see a uniform rate adopted for telegrams, including Inter-State messages, from one end of Australia to the other. I had to vote against a uniform system of postage, because the information supplied to us showed that it would involve a very heavy loss; but we cannot obtain satisfactory returns with reference to telegrams. We are told that 6d. telegrams would not pay, and no doubt the revenue would suffer at the outset; but by the time that the book-keeping period was at an end, the revenue would recover. I believe, moreover, that an Inter-State rate of 1s. per message would show payable results, even before the end of the bookkeeping period. I join with the honorable member for Echuca in protesting against country residents, and those who do business with the country, being penalized to the extent of 50 per cent. over the rates charged for telegrams in the city and suburbs. The merchants in the cities would gain more in proportion than would the actual residents in the country by a reduction in the rate for country telegrams, because the additional facilities provided would be availed of to the greatest extent by business men.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It is the business people in the city who make the telegraph service pay.

Mr. SALMON.—I admit that the residents in the large centres of population are the biggest customers of the Telegraph department, but they are not contract customers, and they send their telegrams for purely business reasons, and with a view to make a profit out of them.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Why does the honorable member gird at business men?

Mr. SALMON.—I am not girding at business men. I am speaking more particularly about the special advantages enjoyed by the people who are gathered together in the large centres of population. This section of the community has not had more consideration than it deserved, but the advantages conferred have been altogether out of proportion to those extended to country residents. It cannot be urged that ninepenny telegrams have not proved payable in Victoria, and any loss that occurs must be attributed to the sixpenny rate. It would almost seem that the Government were anxious to recoup any losses involved by the sixpenny telegrams out of the profits made upon the higher-priced messages sent through the country. We are not asking that one section of the community should be benefited at the expense of another, but simply that fair and equitable treatment shall be extended to the people who live in the country. Those who are scattered throughout the sparsely-populated districts are especially deserving of consideration at the present time, because, owing to a series of unfortunate seasons, they are less able than formerly to bear the burden of taxation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member say that the addition of two words makes all the difference to the country people?

Mr. SALMON.—No, I do not; but I contend that an unfair distinction is being made. Rather than adopt the change now proposed, I should prefer a uniform rate of 9d. for both town and country.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is all that the honorable member wants.

Mr. SALMON.—No. On the contrary, I shall vote for a uniform rate of 6d. if the honorable member is prepared to propose it. I should, however, prefer a 9d. rate rather than that an invidious and unfair distinction should be made to the disadvantage of residents in the country. I cannot understand why honorable members, who represent country districts in Victoria and other States, are so blind to the interests of their constituents that they are prepared to sacrifice them and to submit to their being called upon to pay more than their fair share of any losses that may be incurred.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I should like some explanation from the Minister as to the extent to which the sixpenny telegram system is to be applied. Is it intended that sixpenny telegrams shall be enjoyed exclusively by residents in the metropolitan centres?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Then I should like to know to what extent the cheap rates are to be applied in the country districts. I am as much interested as are my honorable friends who have just spoken, in obtaining concessions for residents in the country. I pledged myself to support the zone system, but I find that that cannot be applied at present. There are a large number of towns throughout Victoria, New South Wales, and other States to which the sixpenny telegram system might be applied. For instance, there are such places as Ballarat, Bendigo, Geelong, and Launceston, and many others might be also suggested. The power to make regulations prescribing the limits within which the rates for town and suburban telegrams shall have effect is vested in the Governor-General in Council; but I think it would be advisable to include in the Bill some provision which would indicate the limits within which these powers are to be exercised. If the sixpenny telegram system is to be applied to all cities, towns, and boroughs, with fairly populous surroundings, and a sufficient number of telegraph stations to justify special arrangements, a valuable concession would be made, but I should not vote in favour of the system being restricted to metropolitan centres only.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is not intended to limit the town and suburban rates to metropolitan centres only. It is proposed to embrace every township which is associated with what may properly be termed suburbs—places in which those engaged in business and trade reside beyond the boundaries of the town itself. Every such place will be entitled to consideration. It is impossible to fix an exact limit as to distance, because everything will depend upon the circumstances of the town and its surroundings.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The matter should be dealt with on the basis of revenue, and not of distance.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The revenue is not the only consideration. The idea is that the system should be applied to townships having suburbs in direct communication, and where a community of interest exists between the residents in the town and the immediate surroundings. This would be partly determined by the existence of telegraph stations, because a sixpenny telegram system could not be applied to places where there is only one station.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Would the system be applied to the area embraced within a 10 miles radius of the townships?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In some instances undoubtedly. I am told that in New South Wales a very large number of towns are brought within the operation of the sixpenny telegram system. Thirteen miles happens to be the radius adopted there. It is not proposed to adopt any absolutely fixed rules, but to study the general circumstances of the settlements.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—If the Minister will permit me, I might explain that in New South Wales they have adopted a 13 miles radius, but within that radius there must be collected an annual revenue of £2,500 per annum.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That would be prohibitive.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It would not be so prohibitive as the honorable and learned member seems to think. These radii are dotted all over New South Wales, and nearly the whole of the State is embraced by them. No difficulty is experienced in the application of the sixpenny telegram system. It would be unfair to take any particular centre without considering its immediate surroundings. The township forming the centre might return a revenue of only £1,000 per annum, and the business transacted in the area embraced within the 13 miles radius outside of the township might not yield an income of more than £500 per annum. On the other hand, the centre might have only £500 of revenue, while the rest of the area made up the £2,500. Therefore, the Attorney-General must see that he had better proceed upon the basis of revenue, rather than upon that of area, unless every post-office be made the centre of a zone.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Nothing that I have said excludes such a case as that to which the honorable member has referred. The officials tell me that the difficulty is that they wish, from the practical basis which has been established in New South Wales, together with a study of the natural conditions of the other States, to fix upon the areas within which there exists a natural community of interest sufficient to justify the Postmaster-General in considering them as centres to which this system should be applied. But there need not be the same anxiety in this respect, because a list of these centres will be published, and it will be open to this House from time to time to review and criticise it. Parliament will have the power of seeing that all places which ought properly to enjoy this privilege do so. There is no doubt that centres of the size of Bendigo will be included. I am told that in New South Wales the system is applied to very much smaller townships. The system is by no means limited to the metropolis. The intention is that it shall apply to numerous areas throughout the country.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland). — I regret that I cannot follow the proposal of the Government to make distinctions between certain favoured localities and the rest of the States. It appears to me that that proposal is in keeping with almost every other move we have made in the direction of discouraging people from becoming producers, and of driving them as far as possible into the favoured centres of population. Why should we make this distinction? So far as the working of the lines is concerned, it is just as cheap to send a message from Melbourne to Ballarat as it is to transmit one from Parliament House to the General Post-office. Of course, there is a difference in the first cost of the construction of the lines, but are we to levy blackmail for all time upon country residents, simply because they have had sufficient enterprise to settle there? It is exceedingly unwise for us to endeavour by every means in our power to put burdens upon the country people. No doubt, before long the telegraph wires in the city will have to be placed underground, and that work will cost just as much as would the construction of a long line in the country. Yet it is proposed that city residents should be able to transmit messages over short lines for 6d., whilst the producer in the country is to be charged 9d. for a similar privilege. I would further point out that in connexion with railways country residents are more heavily taxed than are the inhabitants of the city. If a man in the country sends a truck of stock or produce to the city, he has to pay freight; and similarly if he obtains a truck of goods in return, he has again to pay the cost of carriage. The city resident does not contribute anything in that respect. He does not pay for the transit of produce from the country.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—He has to pay it indirectly when he purchases his meat.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The honorable member is wrong. Cattle from the furthest end of the States are sold in competition with stock which have never been trucked at all. The man who sells his produce does not get a farthing more for it, because of the amount of carriage which he has had to pay upon it. I see no justification whatever for the proposal, and I hope that the Government will not persist in it. If a sixpenny rate all round will not pay, I trust that some intermediate charge will be adopted which will enable the same principle to be applied alike to town and country.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—The reply of the Attorney-General to the honorable and learned member for Bendigo has emphasized the wisdom contained in my proposal to omit the words "town and suburban." Had that proposal been adopted, no difficulty could have arisen. The Attorney-General spoke of "townships and their suburbs," but I do not know of any suburbs in Victoria outside of Melbourne, Ballarat, Bendigo, and Geelong. I am sorry that the honorable member for Parramatta has left the Chamber. He has argued that the adoption of a lower rate will produce a larger revenue in the towns than will a higher rate. Yet, in an amendment of which he has given notice, he proposes that a sixpenny rate shall apply within a radius of 600 miles. Does he say that the revenue within that radius is likely to be increased by the adoption of a sixpenny telegraph rate? Six hundred miles represents double the distance between Melbourne and the boundary of New South Wales. If we are to accept his authority that the lower rate will produce a larger revenue in the towns, it is fair to assume that it will also produce similar results in the more thickly populated districts. I feel so much the injustice which it is proposed to inflict upon the country districts in connexion with this matter, that, if a proposal were made for the adoption of a sixpenny State rate, I should support it. There is not the shadow of an argument in favour of considerations of distance. The Minister representing the Postmaster-General has declared that town messages return a greater profit than do country messages. He admitted that he had no official authority for his statement, the accuracy of which I very much doubt. Under the circumstances, I fail to see how the honorable member for Parramatta can consistently argue against the extension of a sixpenny rate to the whole of a State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I never have argued against it.

Mr. SKENE.—Then I hope that when a proposal is submitted in favour of a sixpenny State rate, the honorable member will support it.

Mr. HARTNOLL (Tasmania).—My interests are very largely centred in the country districts. For many years I have been more intimately associated with the agricultural industry of Tasmania than with any other. Therefore I am not likely to do anything which would in any way prejudice the interests of the producers. The reason why I draw a distinction between the city and suburban rates, and those applicable to the States, is that within the metropolitan area a very large expenditure upon the construction of telegraph lines has been incurred. It is purely from a revenue point of view that I recognise that a distinction should be made. Seeing that this large expenditure has been incurred, it would be useless to impose a rate which would prevent people within the metropolitan area from taking advantage of the conveniences afforded them. If the rate be made too high, merchants will employ a boy on a bicycle, and run their messages from one centre to another within a small area, and the Commonwealth will be depleted of a very considerable amount of revenue. It is purely from a commercial stand-point, and in order to guard the revenue of the Commonwealth, that I in this instance support the Government in what I regard as a very clean-cut proposal, which is easily understood, and which, in many cases, will give country residents a great concession. When we consider that in the future we shall be able, at a charge of 1s., to send a telegram from Melbourne to Thursday Island, a distance of something like 5,000 miles, surely we may regard that as a step in the direction of extreme liberality. If we closely analyze the proposal of the Government, we find that the advantages are largely in favour of the domestic sender as compared with commercial senders. Those engaged in commercial pursuits have perforce to send much longer telegrams than are usual in domestic life. There may be a little bit of jugglery, seeing that the original proposal was ¾d. for every additional word, and that it is now 1d., and in a lengthy telegram it will be found, in many instances, that the charge is as much, or considerably more, than under the original proposal. But taking it all round, I regard the compromise as very reasonable, and one that ought to be generally accepted by the committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I should like to reply to some statements made by the honorable members for Gippsland, Echuca, and Laanecoorie concerning the great disadvantages under which country residents are supposed to labour. I know well the general disadvantages which attach to country life; and I am as keenly anxious as any honorable member to place country residents on an equality with those in the towns. We are considering this proposal on the basis of services rendered; and I contend that it is not proposed to give to the city anything which is not also given to the country. It is proposed to make city and suburban areas in both town and country.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—How does the honorable member define a suburb?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The fairest way is to define it on a revenue-producing basis. I do not believe in giving big towns any advantage over small towns; and it is in that connexion that my suggestion will operate. If a number of country places can be formed into a certain area they are as much entitled to concessions as are the great towns, and I see no difficulty in the matter. I take it that if the city man wants to telegraph to the country he must pay 9d., and so with the country man who wants to telegraph to the town. It is a reciprocal arrangement; and in the country, over a given area, the same advantages will be enjoyed as in the cities and suburbs. If it were intended to make the country resident pay 9d. for every telegram he despatched, it would be a different matter. Personally, I should like to see a uniform rate of 6d., but that is not the desire of the honorable member for Echuca.

Mr. McCOLL.—The honorable member has no right to say that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Echuca said he wanted the rate to be as high as possible so long as it was uniform.

Mr. McCOLL.—The honorable member is saying what is untrue.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The honorable member said that he wanted the highest rate he could get, having regard to the revenue. Of course, we cannot get a uniform rate of 9d., and the honorable member does not want a uniform rate of 6d.

Mr. McCOLL.—That is not correct.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Did the honorable member this morning not advocate a uniform rate of 9d. ?

Mr. McCOLL.—I did not. I said I would sooner have a rate of 9d. than see any loss.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — That is practically what I say — the honorable member wants to level up the rates to a uniform basis. Our object, on the other hand, is to have the rates as low as possible.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I am not with the last speaker in his description of those honorable members who desire a uniform rate for Victoria; but I am a country member and have to look after country interests. We ought to have a local rate such as is proposed; but it would be absurd, when all the other States have town and suburban rates, to attempt to raise the rate to 9d. My desire is to give equal treatment to the town and country, and I suggest that after the word "suburban" the words "or within twenty miles from the sending station" be inserted. This would give the advantage of the sixpenny rate to country towns which are in proximity to each other. It would make the population of each area in the Commonwealth receive similar and equal treatment to those living in another equal area.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the proposal of the Government, except as to fixing the limit.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Government have not yet even suggested it. We heard from the honorable member for Parramatta the other night that in New South Wales there is a local postage rate operating within a radius of thirteen miles, and the same principle could be applied to the telegraphic service. This would leave the sixpenny rate in Sydney, Brisbane, and other large centres, and, at the same time, would give an equal privilege to country residents. If the Minister reserves the power to define what is a town, he will be pestered by deputations, which will want every small centre declared a "town," and so constant political pressure will be put on him, and he will thereby create a great deal of trouble for himself. There are business men in small centres who are as much entitled to consideration as are business men in the cities. The honorable member for Wentworth, when the honorable member for Laanecoorie was speaking, interjected that it is the business men who make the telegraph service pay; and I think that is correct. In Bacchus Marsh, which I can take as a fair example of an Australian country town, there are 500 or 600 people, and 30 or 40 shops; and the business men there should have equal rights with the business men in Prahran, Collins-street, or South Melbourne. The same remark may be made of many Gippsland centres which could not possibly be described as towns with suburbs, but which should have the advantage of a system such as I have suggested, and which I trust the Government will grant.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—In default of a uniform rate for the whole of each State, which I should much prefer, I think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corio. If that suggestion were adopted the administration would be relieved of a great deal of pressure, and from possible charges of unjust discrimination. If it be left to the Minister to define towns, varying reports will be made by the officers of the Postal department as to the paying or non-paying character of the proposals made, and endless trouble will be created. I venture to say that there is not a township in Australia that would not ask, and properly ask, to be regarded as a centre in this connexion. The Minister will find it very difficult indeed to draw a distinction between granting a privilege to all and granting it to none except cities. If he granted it only to the latter, all the alleged equality of treatment for the country would disappear altogether. I therefore trust that the Minister will accept the suggestion of the honorable member for Corio, which, while it does not go as far as I should like, will meet the difficulty. When the Postal Bill was under consideration, a considerable number of members, including myself, objected to the postal and telegraph rates being left a matter for regulation. The House was then practically unanimous in saying that an important question of the kind should be determined by Parliament, and not by an administration for whom the only punishment would be ejection from office—a punishment which might be entirely disproportionate. The proposal before us is merely another phase of the same question. We are asked not only to leave the rates to be determined by regulation, but, worse than that, to be determined in individual instances. A regulation has at least the appearance of generality, but we are now asked to go further in a wrong direction. If the House previously would not permit the administration, by regulation, to determine postal and telegraph rates, we ought to be consistent, and again refuse the power. The suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Corio is consistent with what has already been determined by the House in the Postal Bill, and it ought to be accepted by the Government. I am sure that every honorable member who opposes a uniform rate for town and country alike will agree that the honorable and learned member for Corio has suggested a sensible way of settling the matter.

Amendment (by Mr. CROUCH) proposed—

That the amendment be amended by the insertion after the word "suburban" of the words "or within 20 miles from the sending station."

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—I think that the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corio is worthy of consideration. It will be an unfortunate thing if in our legislation we make a discrimination between town and suburban areas and country areas. Any discrimination that is made should be based upon distance, so that it may not appear that special concessions are being granted to aggregations of population. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella that the Executive will be given an almost insoluble problem to determine if they have to decide in what cases the sixpenny rate shall apply, and in what cases it shall not apply. There is no statutory definition of a town or a suburb, and therefore the application of town and suburban rates would depend upon the personal view of the Minister at the head of the department, which, of course, would be subject to the representations made to him, and the information at his disposal. It would be a graceful concession to country views and interests if a discrimination based upon distance were substituted for the discrimination now provided for.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is very difficult to obtain data which would enable us to say with confidence what the exact financial effect of these proposals would be. We can estimate that effect only from the experience which has been gained in New South Wales, where a thirteen-mile limit has been in operation. Both the other proposals which have been submitted by the Government mean an immense reduction in the telegraphic rates at present prevailing throughout the Commonwealth. We have reduced the maximum Inter-State rate from 4s. to 1s. That is a reduction which will operate largely in the interests of the country districts, by cheapening their communication with the centres of population which they supply, and with which they do business. But in order that it may not be felt that the various parts of the Commonwealth are not sharing alike in the advantages which are being given, we are ready to accept, though with some hesitancy, the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corio, if he will agree to the reduction of the distance from twenty miles to fifteen miles.

Mr. CROUCH.—I understand that the Sydney suburban radius within which the sixpenny rate applies is fifteen miles.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; thirteen miles.

Mr. CROUCH.—Then I will accept the compromise offered by the Attorney-General.

Amendment of the amendment amended accordingly.

Mr. MCCOLL (Echuca).—I do not intend to oppose the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corio, but I do not wish honorable members to think that I intend to abandon my proposal for the adoption of a uniform rate of 6d. I intend to move the amendment of which I have given notice, and to press it to a division.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I am surprised to hear the Acting Prime Minister say that the reduction of the Inter-State rates is chiefly of advantage to the country districts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is of advantage to the whole community, including the residents in the country districts.

Mr. SKENE.—The honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. Hartnoll, also took the view that the reduction in the Inter-State rates will chiefly benefit the residents in the country districts; but the fact is, that in many places country residents will have to pay the maximum rate of 1s. for the transmission of telegrams for distances not much further than from one end of Bourke-street to the other.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is because of the bookkeeping sections of the Constitution.

Mr. SKENE.—With regard to the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corio, I think that, as we cannot arrange for the application of a suburban rate to the smaller country towns, it is reasonable that we should agree upon a rate which will be applicable to the small townships which are in business communication with some larger centre. Throughout Victoria there are towns which may be regarded pretty well as county towns. Market days are observed there, stock sales are held there, and they are general centres for business. It would be of great advantage to give the people residing in the smaller townships around these larger towns the advantage of cheap rates, so far as their telegraphic communication with the larger towns is concerned; but I think that, to be of any advantage, the radius provided for in the amendment should be increased from 15 to 25 miles. That extension is certainly necessary to cover the cases which I have in my mind in which I think the convenience should apply.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I am of opinion that the distance should be increased to 25 miles. This is a matter of importance to the electors on the West Coast, because it is 21 miles from Strahan to Zeehan, and 25 miles from Zeehan to Queenstown. Why should a discrimination be made between the citizens of the Commonwealth in violation of the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—It seems to me that the Government are offering a concession which is practically worth nothing. The 15-mile radius which they are willing to concede is practically no more than the suburban limitation. Towns like Bendigo, Ballarat, Castlemaine, and Maryborough, get no additional advantage from the adoption of the 15-mile radius. I am in favour of a uniform rate. The benefit intended to be conferred upon residents in the country by fixing the radius at 15 miles is quite illusory.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will represent a very real concession to residents in the country districts.

Mr. SALMON.—I do not think so. I feel bound to do what I can to prevent the country residents from being subjected to an unfair charge.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No new charges are being made, but the Government proposals represent a very great reduction.

Mr. SALMON.—If a 25-mile radius were decided upon it might confer some benefit upon residents in the country, but the limit now suggested would be of no use. I would urge the Acting Prime Minister to consent to make the further concession suggested.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I cannot possibly do so.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—I think that the Government are treating the country members in a very generous spirit. A 15-miles radius would not suit everybody, nor would even one of 25 miles, but if residents in the country are able to send telegrams for a distance of 14½ miles from any given centre at sixpenny rates, they will be placed in a position of far greater advantage than at present.

Mr. WINTER COOKE (Wannon).—In order to show that some benefit has been conferred upon the residents in the country districts of New South Wales by the adoption of the sixpenny telegram system within a 13 miles radius of certain centres there, I might point out that something like 300 places outside of Sydney are benefited. Although I should personally prefer to see an extension of the radius I think we might fairly accept the proposal of the Government.

Amendment of the amendment agreed to.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I move—

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the figures "16," with a view to insert in lieu thereof the figures "18."

I had intended to withdraw my amendment in order to enable the honorable member for Echuca to propose the adoption of a uniform rate of 6d., which I was prepared to support. I think, however, that the Government have met the committee very fairly, and that it would be unjust to press them any further in that direction.

Question.—That the figures "16," proposed to be omitted, stand part of the proposed amendment—put. The committee divided.

Amendment of the amendment negatived.

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—I move—

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the word “ninepence,” with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word “sixpence.”

I thoroughly agree with the view taken by the honorable member for Laanecoorie that the Government proposals, in their present form, will confer very slight, if any, benefits upon the country residents. The sixpenny telegram system could not be applied with any advantage, except in places where there are several telegraph stations within 15 miles of the centre selected for the operation of the system. That happens in very few cases. If we are to make any reductions they should apply all round, and the rate adopted should be uniform throughout the State.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the professional advisers of the department could indorse such a proposal as that made by the honorable member, it would be received with the greatest approbation, not only by the Government, but by honorable members generally. The steps we have already taken, however, are regarded by them with grave apprehension, and they believe that the adoption of a uniform rate of 6d. would involve a heavy loss which the States could not afford to incur. It is on that ground alone that we oppose the proposal. I hope, however, that the zone system will be adopted as soon as the bookkeeping period has expired.

Question—That the word “ninepence” proposed to be omitted stand part of the proposed amendment—put. The committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment of the amendment negatived

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP FYSH) proposed—

That the following words be inserted after the table of rates in Part I. :—“On telegrams from and to Tasmania the charges to be those mentioned above, with cable charges added.”

Mr. McCOLL (Echuca).—I should like some explanation as to what this extra charge means. In the past there has been no such charge made in connexion with the Tasmanian cable.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Always.

Mr. McCOLL.—I was under the impression that at the present time the ordinary Inter-State charge obtained. At all events I should like to know the reason for the extra rate.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The object of the amendment is to continue the present system. Hitherto the cable rate between Victoria and Tasmania has been 1s., but hereafter we are hopeful that it will be reduced to 6d. Upon a former occasion I explained that the cable company, under the clause which enables them to charge for services rendered, was recovering about £10,000 a year, but the Government have the power to reduce the rate at any time so long as the company receives not less than £5,600 a year. The agreement made between the Tasmanian Government and the Eastern Extension Cable Company contains a clause by which the company are entitled to receive, for services rendered, not less than £5,600 per annum. When that sum has been assured to the company, the Tasmanian Government—with the concurrence of the company—can reduce the charge, which has hitherto been 1s., to such a rate as will continue to return to the company not less than £5,600 per annum. The object in adding the words proposed to the schedule is to enable the Postmaster-General to collect such a rate as may be agreed upon between the Tasmanian Government and the cable company, which in the future, it is presumed, will be 6d. instead of 1s.

Mr. HARTNOLL (Tasmania). — We have in the Constitution what is familiarly known as the "Braddon blot." In connexion with this Bill it is proposed to repeat that mistake and to have a "Fysh blot." The Minister representing the Postmaster-General has told the committee that the Eastern Extension Company is guaranteed £5,600 per year by the Tasmanian Government, but that statement is scarcely correct. It is jointly guaranteed by the Tasmanian and Victorian Governments.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The Victorian Government are not responsible unless a loss has been incurred.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—That is so. Victoria and Tasmania jointly divide the loss, and, therefore, they are equal guarantors. We hear a great deal about uniformity in these matters, and about the necessity which exists for preserving the federal sentiment. If these are merely empty words the amendment will be accepted; but if, on the contrary, they have some significance, the Commonwealth will come to the rescue of the smaller States by taking over Tasmania's liability to loss in this connexion. Those who study Tasmanian politics are aware that, owing to the Tariff alterations which have been made, the finances of that State are in a somewhat unsatisfactory condition, and that in endeavouring to carry their new taxation proposals, in order to meet the exigencies of the time, the Lewis Government have just suffered defeat. It is the duty of this Parliament to aid Tasmania in every possible way. If the Acting Prime Minister desired to exercise that liberal spirit which he has hitherto exhibited in connexion with this Bill, he would have risen long ago, and declared—"We wish to preserve the federal spirit which sways the whole of the people of this continent, and we mean to take upon our shoulders this small financial load, and to place Tasmania upon the same footing as that occupied by all the other States."

Mr. DEAKIN.—The States have declined to authorize the adoption of that course.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—The people of Victoria and New South Wales would derive equal advantages with Tasmania if the cable rate were reduced. There is a very considerable agricultural and general commercial business between Tasmania and Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. DEAKIN.—These two States were willing to share, but the other States were not willing, and so an arrangement was impossible. This is again a matter of the bookkeeping, and the other States objected to bear any proportion.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Could a sum not be placed on the Estimates to meet the loss?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then it would fall on the States which object. Unless this provision goes into the Bill, Tasmania will have to bear the whole.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—Do I understand the Acting Prime Minister to express the opinion that, unless this provision be inserted, Tasmania will have to bear the whole?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—That is an absolutely new proposition. I have always understood from the press of Tasmania that, as matters stand at present, that State is bearing the whole loss.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—There is no loss.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The people pay the charge now, but if there were a loss Tasmania would have to pay it.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—In order to bring Tasmania into line, the Treasurer of that State in his financial statement would have to show a loss, and it is in order that a loss may not have to be shown that I now appeal to honorable members to go as far as possible in the direction of remedying an absolute defect in the present arrangement.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—There is no loss now, and there cannot be a loss in the future with increasing business.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—But if the rate in Tasmania be reduced to 6d., or Tasmania is placed on an equal footing with the rest of the Commonwealth, that State will have to bear a proportion of the loss in conjunction with Victoria.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—That is so, if there be any loss over the £5,600.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—We understand that. But if the Commonwealth assumed the position occupied to-day by Victoria and Tasmania, cablegrams could go between the latter State and any part of the mainland at the same rate as telegrams are carried from one part of the mainland to another. It is with the desire to bring about uniformity that I ask the committee to go as far as they can in placing Tasmania on an equal footing with the rest of the States.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—Every member of the Chamber would, I think, be very glad to pass the Bill in such a shape as to allow the people of Tasmania to send telegrams to the mainland at the same rate as that for which they can be sent similar distances in other parts of the continent. So far as I understand the situation, the trouble is that, if we pass such a proposition, Tasmania will, under the bookkeeping sections, have to make good any deficiency. I should be quite willing for the Commonwealth to shoulder the responsibility if the bookkeeping sections would allow it. I had a long chat some time ago with Mr. Bird, the Treasurer of Tasmania, and he took a very strong position against the suggestion to charge the uniform rate on telegrams. He said that the finances of Tasmania were in such a condition, notwithstanding the measure of prosperity alluded to by the honorable member who last spoke, that they could not stand an additional charge of £5,000, or maybe a little more, which it was anticipated would result in a reduction of the rate to 1s. Therefore I take it that the appeal is made on behalf of the people of Tasmania to continue the present rate, or something approximating to it, until the bookkeeping period is exhausted. We shall then be able to adopt a uniform scale, and the Commonwealth will have to shoulder any loss which may result. A matter of £4,000 or £5,000 to the Commonwealth as a whole would be nothing if the Constitution would allow the loss to be shared amongst the rest of the States. To Tasmania such a loss is somewhat important, and, from all the estimates we have had so far, it is not likely that the reduced rate will result in an increase of business sufficient to make up for the loss which seems to stare Tasmania in the face. If honorable members who represent Tasmania are satisfied that the people of that State are willing to shoulder the responsibility, I shall vote for the lower rate. I, for one, shall follow the votes of the honorable members for Tasmania.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I may remind the committee that the whole question was recently considered at the conference of Premiers in Sydney, where a resolution was unanimously carried that the responsibility of Tasmania in this matter should, as new expenditure, be shouldered by the Commonwealth, and shared amongst the different States. In order to give effect to the resolution, the Commonwealth Government placed themselves in communication with the States Governments; but by that time three of the States had changed their minds. The agreement made at the Premiers' conference was conditional on all the States coming in, and as three States declined, there was nothing for it but to ask Tasmania to leave the original proposal in the Bill, in order that the whole cost might not fall on that State.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—Which were the three States?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Their names were published, and I have sent the correspondence to the Premier of Tasmania. Under the circumstances, there is no choice but to either let Tasmania pay the whole, or make the provision now proposed.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—The members for Tasmania cannot possibly take the responsibility of agreeing to that State bearing the whole loss. The Attorney-General speaks as though the Commonwealth were a confederacy, and not a federation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is a financial confederacy until the bookkeeping period expires.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Then we have a sort of improvised Jeff Davis show.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I move—

That the following words be added to the schedule:—"Telegrams of public interest giving notice of bush fires or floods affecting or likely to affect large tracts of country, to be free."

I gave notice of this amendment at the request of the honorable member for Riverina, who takes a great interest in the question. It has been the custom in, at any rate, one of the other States to give every facility for sending word of these great national disasters to people unaffected at the time, but who may be affected, thus enabling them to make provision. The cost would be very small—I trust nothing at all—and the Government may see their way to accept the amendment.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I cannot accept any amendment which will continue the practice of franking either postal communications or telegraph messages. We have already decided, by clause 5, that even Government correspondence must pay the rates prescribed, in order that the department may be able to show what it earns. If a concession be allowed to any body of individuals, in respect of matters local or otherwise, each State which is interested must make provision for paying the department for the concession. The Postmaster-General is not in a position to advise me that any exceptions can be made.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I am rather surprised at the attitude assumed by the Government, seeing that they agreed to an amendment providing for a substantial reduction on the rate for the carriage of materials for the blind. My amendment involves very small expense, and cannot be regarded as a breach of the rule, such disasters being, not of State, but of national concern. The object is to prevent local disasters becoming national.

Amendment negatived.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—Can the Minister inform me exactly what the rate in the future will be to Tasmania?

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I believe the rate will be $\frac{1}{2}$ d. instead of 1d. as heretofore; but the matter is not absolutely settled. The rate will be agreed to by the Treasurer of Tasmania, but I believe that will be the result.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—In regard to the second part of the schedule, I think there should be the same comparative liberality or generosity that has been extended to the first part. This second part might be a little simplified by reducing the number of lines in it from three to four. The charge of 6d. for a press message not exceeding 25 words is very fair, and the same may be said of the charge of 9d. for messages exceeding 25 words, but not exceeding 50 words; but I think the next line might be omitted. It is a bad principle, in my opinion, to differentiate between telegrams for ordinary purposes, and press telegrams connected with the Commonwealth. Such differentiation must lead to a great deal of difficulty, and I do not know of any principle of equity on which it can be defended. We are dealing with the Commonwealth as a whole, and it looks like making a close preserve for ourselves when we create special terms for telegrams relating to Commonwealth affairs. The special charges are confined to Executive matters and debates in the House, but the next proposal will be to extend them to speeches made by Federal members outside, and to all matters connected with the Federal Government. The best plan would be to reduce the rates as far as the department can see its way to allow it, and, in order to avoid complications, to apply the same rates all round. My proposal is that for Inter-State telegrams of all kinds, the charge for 25 words should be 9d., which is 50 per cent. more than the charge within a State; and that for a message of more than 25 words, and not exceeding 50 words, the charge shall be 1s. and for every additional 50 words, 9d. That would make the rates for messages within a State, not exceeding 25 words, 6d., and from one State to another, 9d.; for messages exceeding 25 words, but not exceeding 50 words, within a State, 9d., and throughout the Commonwealth, 1s.; while for every additional 50 words, or portion of 50 words, the rate would be 6d. within a State, and 9d. throughout the Commonwealth. It seems to me that that would be a better arrangement than the attempt which is made in the schedule to differentiate between telegrams conveying Commonwealth intelligence and other telegrams.

Mr. WATSON.—The newspaper proprietors have not complained of the charge of 1s. 6d. per 100 words within a State.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I think that to reduce the rate would lead to an acceleration of communication. This Parliament can sit only in one State, but the people of the whole Commonwealth should be informed of its proceedings as quickly as possible. To that end, I think it is better to lower the telegraphic rates all round to a reasonable extent than to make the distinction provided for in the schedule. It does not seem to me that it is fair that the rate throughout the Commonwealth should be double the rate within a State. In my opinion a difference of 50 per cent. would be sufficient. In the next rate, I propose an addition of 33 per cent. Then I propose that the rate for an additional 50 words shall be 6d. within a State, and 33 per cent. more throughout the Commonwealth; so that whereas the charge for telegrams relating to Commonwealth parliamentary and executive proceedings is 6d. for every additional 50 words, I propose to make it 9d.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—I wish first of all to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Bill before us was very much liberalized by the Senate. The Postmaster-General originally proposed that the rate for every additional 50 words within a State should be 9d., but the Bill now makes it 6d. I intend to go still further, however, and to reduce the charge for every additional 50 words for transmission throughout the Commonwealth from 1s. 6d. to 1s. Those are lower rates than have been imposed throughout the States hitherto. Seeing that, under the rates now proposed by the Government, enough words to fill a whole column of the Argus can be telegraphed for about 10s. 6d., the charges are surely cheap enough. In view of the concessions made in dealing with other parts of the Bill, I cannot accede to the proposal of the honorable member for Wentworth, and must ask the committee to support this schedule as it stands, with the amendment of which I have given notice.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—My point is that it would be better to get rid of the distinction between telegrams giving Commonwealth intelligence and other telegrams, and to do that I suggest the reduction of the ordinary rates. Of course, if the Government will not agree to a reduction of rates, I do not wish to compel the newspapers to pay more for the transmission of Commonwealth intelligence.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I hope that the proposals of the Government, rather than those of the honorable member for Wentworth, will be accepted. Under the latter the charge for the first 100 words of a message transmitted within a State would be 1s. 3d. instead of 1s. 6d., as provided for in the Bill, while there would be a corresponding reduction in the case of messages for transmission beyond the borders of a State. But the proposal of the Minister to reduce the rate for every additional 50 words for transmission beyond the borders of a State from 1s. 6d. to 1s. brings all the rates into conformity. It brings the charge for every additional 50 words for transmission beyond a State into conformity with the charge for the transmission of an additional 50 words within a State, and also into conformity with the charge for messages relating to Commonwealth parliamentary and executive proceedings for transmission beyond a State. Therefore I think that, on the whole, the proposals of the Government are fairer than those of the honorable member for Wentworth. I do not agree with him that we have no right to allow messages relating to the proceedings of the Federal Parliament to be transmitted at a lower rate than is charged for the transmission of ordinary news.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I did not say that we had no right to do so, but I think that we should get rid of the distinction.

Mr. MAHON.—I took down the honorable member's words in shorthand as he uttered them, and he said—"We have no right to make this a close preserve for ourselves."

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—What I meant to convey was that it is not politic to do so, not that we have no power to do so.

Mr. MAHON.—My contention is that we not merely have the right, but that it is our duty to do so. Surely information concerning the proceedings of this Parliament is of far more importance to the people of Western Australia, or of Queensland, and of other remote parts of the continent, than news respecting a football match or a race meeting.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Sometimes the report of a football match would be much more interesting.

Mr. MAHON.—I do not deny that reports of football matches and race meetings may often be of great interest to the people of the Commonwealth, but they cannot be of so much importance to them as reports of the proceedings of this Parliament. The property and even the lives of the people are affected by our decisions here, and it is proper that we should give facilities for making these decisions known. But the proposals of the honorable member for Wentworth virtually amount to the contention that news concerning football matches, race meetings, and other trifling incidents of passing interest, that are of no real moment, are as important as information respecting the proceedings of this Parliament, and should be sent at the same rates. In my opinion, we did wisely when we decided that reports of the proceedings of this Parliament, and of the Commonwealth Executive should be telegraphed at lower rates than those charged for the transmission of general news. If the proposals of the honorable member for Wentworth be accepted, it will be necessary to recast the whole of the second part of the schedule, and I do not think that that is advisable.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I think that the proposal of the Minister is rather better than that of the honorable member for Wentworth. Under the Minister's proposals, the charge for 200 words would be 2s., while under the proposals of the honorable member for Wentworth it would be 2s. 3d. I think, however, that there should be some reduction in the charge for Inter-State messages. If a reduction is made for messages within a State, there should be also a reduction for Inter-State messages. In my opinion, the amendment of which the Minister has given notice will not meet the case. I think that it is as necessary that the people of Queensland, and of other distant places, should be given cheap telegraph rates as it is that the rates within the States should be low.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—The schedule, as it stands, is rather ridiculous in this respect: The charge for messages within a State is 9d. for 25 words and not exceeding 50 words, but for 50 words and not exceeding 100 words, it is 1s. 6d., or twice as much, so that there is no concession there, because of the longer message. Then for Commonwealth telegrams, the charge is 1s. for 25 words, 1s. 6d. for a message not exceeding 100 words, and 3s. for a message exceeding 100 words.

Sir PHILIP Fysh.—For messages over 100 words, there is a very big concession.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But I think that there should be an intermediate concession. I do not know that it matters very much in practical press work, but it seems to me that the 3s. rate might be reduced.

Mr. DEAKIN.—At the rates now proposed a full column of news could be telegraphed for 13s.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Of course, the real point, so far as the newspaper proprietors are concerned, is the reduction of the rates for messages containing more than 100 words. At the same time, there are many short, pithy telegrams of less than 100 words, and I think that in view of the rates charged for telegrams up to 50 words, it would be fair to reduce the charges for messages exceeding 50 words, but not exceeding 100 words to 2s. 6d.

Mr. DEAKIN. — The departmental experts do not regard the present press rates as payable.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that the rates proposed are fairly reasonable.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—At the present time, if a press correspondent wishes to send 100 words from Melbourne to Western Australia he has to pay 4s. 6d., and a similar amount is charged for every subsequent 100 words. Thus, a message containing 200 words would cost 9s. Under the Government proposals a message of 200 words could be sent from Melbourne to Western Australia for 5s. I answer the question of the honorable member for Wentworth by saying that this must be regarded as a very satisfactory reduction so far as the more remote parts of the continent are concerned. I would not presume to speak for the Sydney newspaper proprietors.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The present charges for press telegrams to Western Australia are extremely high.

Mr. MAHON.—The same rate applies to press messages despatched from Melbourne to Queensland. I think that the Government have offered very fair terms. The committee should remember that this department is not paying expenses, and the mail services hitherto existing in remote portions of Australia are for this reason being curtailed. If these rates are reduced the size of the departmental deficit will form an excuse for the further curtailment of the facilities given and so badly required in the far interior of the continent. I for one will never be a party to a policy which will have that result, and which will also form a pretext for reducing the wages of the servants of the Commonwealth.

Mr. A. PATERSON (Capricornia).—I understand that the Government propose that the Inter-State messages shall be transmitted at the following rates:—25 words for 1s., 50 words for 1s. 6d., 100 words for 3s., and 150 words for 4s. The honorable member for Wentworth proposes that 25 words shall be transmitted for 9d., 50 words for 1s., 100 words for 1s. 9d., and 150 words for 2s. 6d., and it seems to me that these latter rates would be very advantageous to the newspaper proprietors.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Our proposals represent a great reduction upon existing rates, but if the suggestions of the honorable member for Wentworth were carried out the difference would be immense.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—I think that the Government might adopt the suggestion of the honorable member for Wentworth, that the rate for messages of over 50 and not exceeding 100 words should be reduced from 3s. to 2s. 6d. Most of these press messages are sent during the night, and I would point out that in Canada it is the practice to transmit press messages at night at half-rates.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—Although the Government have made considerable reductions in the rates charged for Inter-State press telegrams, I think that, as a matter of symmetry, they should reduce the 3s. rate for messages not exceeding 100 words to 2s. 3d.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta). — There is no reason why we should charge 100 per cent. more for 100-word messages than for telegrams containing 50 words. In every other kind of business a reduction is made upon taking a quantity.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government propose to make a considerable reduction upon the charges for messages containing over 100 words.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Yes; but the reductions should be made upon the same scale right through. The public point of view is the only one from which we can consider this question. It would be of the utmost advantage to facilitate in every possible way the transmission of news from the seat of the Federal Government to all parts of the Commonwealth. The general public know too little of what is happening in the Federal Parliament, and of what is being done by the administration, and I think that the suggestion of the honorable member for Wentworth might very well be conceded.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I move—

That the words "one shilling and sixpence," column 2 of Part II., be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "one shilling and threepence"; also that the words "three shillings," column 3, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "two and threepence."

The effect of these amendments will be to reduce the rate for telegrams exceeding 50, but not exceeding 100 words, transmitted within any State, from 1s. 6d. to 1s. 3d., and to decrease the charge for Inter-State messages of similar length from 3s. to 2s. 3d.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I do not think there is any justification for the great reduction proposed by the acting leader of the Opposition. There is no doubt that the proposal of the Government as amended is an extremely liberal one, as compared with the rate which has been charged upon Inter-State messages in the past. A material reduction has been made in the charges for the transmission of press messages.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — The charges have not been reduced to the same extent as they have in connexion with private telegrams.

Mr. WATSON.—The fact that we have been a little too liberal in regard to ordinary messages, is no reason why we should continue to make concessions which have not been asked for. I think that the press will be thoroughly satisfied with a reasonable reduction, and certainly such a reduction has been made. I would further remind honorable members that last year the Postal department showed an apparent loss of £46,000, and an actual loss very considerably in excess of that amount, because the balance-sheet did not cover interest upon the capital invested. If experience shows that the adoption of the lower rate results in an increase of business, we can then make a further reduction should it be deemed desirable to adopt that course. In the meantime, the concession which has been made in the Bill constitutes, I think, the utmost which we should risk in the interests of the Commonwealth as a whole.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—I think that the Government proposals as amended are fairly satisfactory. Although the reduction which has been made in connexion with the transmission of press telegrams is not equal to that made upon private messages, the fact must not be overlooked that hitherto the press have enjoyed a considerable advantage as compared with private citizens.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I desire to ask the Attorney-General if it is not possible to extend the definition at the top of the third column of part 2 of this schedule, which applies to press telegrams "relating to Parliamentary and Executive proceedings of the Commonwealth." If a vote be taken upon the proposal of the acting leader of the Opposition, will that definition be considered to have been agreed to by the committee?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think that it would.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope that the honorable and learned member will not press this suggestion. The definition is a fairly general one, and if it be found necessary to extend it hereafter that course can be adopted at any moment.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Under that definition press telegrams at the reduced rate would be restricted to Parliamentary debates and Executive proceedings. It would not cover the publication of statistical information, reports of deputations, Customs prosecutions, or important trials before the High Court, all of which are matters of general interest. I think that the definition ought to be extended by adding the words "and Commonwealth affairs." That would cover anything relating to the official proceedings of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I trust that the Government will accept the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. It is perfectly absurd that a rate of 1s. per 100 words should be charged only upon telegrams relating to parliamentary and Executive proceedings. In this connexion I would point out that Executive acts may at any time call for the issue of a manifesto by the leader of the Opposition or the leader of the labor party. Indeed they might necessitate comment on the part of any private member. Yet whilst the reports of Government proceedings would be telegraphed to the newspapers at the rate of 1s. per 100 words, a charge of 1s. 6d. per 100 words would be levied upon the criticism of a private member. The latter should have equal rights with members of the Executive in this respect.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Private members have.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They have not, although I admit that some of the privileges enjoyed by Ministers have recently been swept away. Some of the regulations issued by the Executive have a very important bearing upon the customs and postal departments. Take for instance, the regulations issued the other day in connexion with the Post and Telegraph Act. If any honorable member had thought it necessary to comment upon them, or to show reasons why they should not come into force, the press would have been charged double rates for the transmission of his views.

Mr. DEAKIN.—So they would for any Ministerial defence of them.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It seems to me that it is most unfair to discriminate between the character of the matter transmitted. The only equitable method which can be adopted is to allow all press telegrams to be despatched at a uniform rate. I feel strongly upon this matter, and I am sorry that the Government have broken the arrangement which was entered into with this side of the House. The House met at eleven o'clock this morning so that honorable members from other States might be enabled to return home this afternoon.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have kept our promise. The understanding was that the Bill should be passed.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We have been caught napping once, and we shall be very wary in future.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—No doubt there is a great deal in the contention of the honorable member for Macquarie. It frequently happens that election speeches and addresses delivered upon the public platform are just as important as are Executive proceedings. It is of no use to press the matter now, if the Government do not intend to take it into consideration. We must keep within the terms prescribed by the Government, or make them as extensive as possible, so as to include everything connected with the Federal Government, Parliament, or Ministers in any part of Australia. This is a difficult matter, but it is one which can be revived in the future.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN (Melbourne).—A little time ago we had a long discussion about placing the town and the country on the same footing, and I regard the proposal before us as involving an analogous question. Why should there be this great difference made between one State and the rest of the States? I do not say that all the States can be put on exactly the same footing, but it is only reasonable that the charge should be altered from 3s. to 2s. 3d.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is another point.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—There are many matters of even greater importance than the proceedings of the Commonwealth Parliament or Ministers, and all press telegrams should be treated alike. I have not been spoken to on this question by any one, so that no pressure has been exercised on me. The proposal of the honorable member for Wentworth is one which the Government should take into consideration.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I trust the Government will consider the advisability of altering the definition of the Commonwealth or Parliamentary news which may be sent at the reduced rate. It will be difficult to prevent news of every description, without reference to its source, from going through if the definition be widened. It would be well if any news concerning the Commonwealth or the Commonwealth Parliament could be sent as cheaply as possible to every part of Australia. People in distant States are, in this connexion, at a considerable disadvantage, because, in addition to Parliamentary proceedings, there is much other news of interest and importance. The Government ought to endeavour to make a definition which will be sufficiently wide, but which will not allow the transmission of news having no relation to Commonwealth affairs at the cheaper rate.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—There is a distinct hardship in the definition we are asked to adopt.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The insertion of the word "political" would meet the case.

Mr. FOWLER.—I do not care what words are used, so long as greater facilities are afforded for sending important information from the seat of Government to places like Western Australia. There are many matters in connexion with my own State which I should like to see reported in the Western Australian newspapers, but their publication is prevented by the prohibitive telegraph rates. For instance, the report on the immigration of Italians is of great interest to the people of Western Australia, and yet, under present arrangements, they must wait until it can be sent by post. A considerable part of the work of a member of Parliament is done outside the Chamber, but there is no possibility of letting my electors know what is going on unless I take improper advantage of the concession afforded to members in respect of their own telegrams. That improper advantage I do not take, and, as a result, only the most meagre and late reports appear in the metropolitan newspapers of Western Australia. I do not blame the newspapers, which are not so wealthy as to be able to afford 4s. 6d. per 100 words for news of the kind. I do not think there would be any great loss of revenue if the concession were made a little more liberal, and in view of the importance of giving the people as much information as is available, I hope the Government will expand the definition.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am willing to expand the heading of the third column of the schedule in order to embrace practically all facts and matters relating to the Commonwealth. I move—

That the heading to the third column be omitted, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:—"Relating to Parliamentary, Executive, departmental, and other Commonwealth proceedings as may be prescribed."

Parliament has control over the regulations, and will thus be placed in a position to say what news shall be included.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I understand that if any injustice be done it may be brought under the notice of the Government and the regulations altered.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I am prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the Acting Prime Minister.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Sir PHILIP Fysh) agreed to—

That the following words be added to the schedule:—"On telegrams from and to Tasmania the charges to be those mentioned above, with cable charges added."

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported with amendments; report adopted.

Resolved (on motion by Sir PHILIP Fysh)—

That the standing orders be suspended so as to allow the Bill to be passed through its remaining stages this day.

Bill read a third time.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (motion by Mr. DEAKIN)—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until Tuesday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WATSON.—What will the order of business be on Tuesday?

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—Should the Customs Tariff Bill be sent from the Senate, the consideration of the message of that Chamber will be the first business. Should the Customs Tariff Bill not arrive, we shall take the Bonus Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 4.57 p.m.

Senate.

Friday, 29 August, 1902.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 11.30 a.m., and read prayers.

COUNCIL OF CHURCHES: DAY OF PRAYER FOR RAIN.

Senator DAWSON.—I desire to ask the Vice-President of the Executive Council, without notice, if his attention has been directed to a paragraph in the Argus of this morning stating that at a meeting of the Council of Churches held yesterday, at which the Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, and Lutheran churches were represented, it was decided to ask the Federal Government to set aside 7th September next as a day of humiliation and prayer for general rain. In view of the fact that it is said that it is only during the continuance of the drought that farmers can hope to make a living, is it the intention of the Government to refuse the request of the Council? If not, why not?

Senator O'CONNOR.—I have not seen the statement to which the honorable member refers, but if he desires me to do so, I shall inquire into the matter.

EASTERN EXTENSION CABLE COMPANY.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Has the Government or the Postmaster-General received any information that the honorable the Prime Minister has carried out his promise, and entered into negotiations in London with the Eastern Extension Cable Company?

Senator DRAKE.—The Government do not consider it to be in the public interest that they should make any statement at the present time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of House of Representatives' Message, resumed from 28th August, vide page 15539):

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales — Vice-President of the Executive Council) —I move—

That the following be adopted as the report of the committee:—

The committee have considered the message of the House of Representatives returning the Customs Tariff Bill, and have agreed to the modifications made by the House of Representatives to Requests Nos. 6, 13, 18, 28, 57, 71, 75, 79, and have disagreed to the modifications made by that House to part of Request No. 9 and to Request No. 38.

The committee recommend that the House of Representatives be again requested to make the amendments as originally requested by the Senate by Requests Nos. 9 and 38.

The committee have agreed not to again request the House of Representatives to make the amendments originally requested by Requests Nos. 1, 2, 5, 10, 11, 12, 40, 51, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 72, 74, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 88, 89 (as to part), and 92.

The committee recommend that the House of Representatives be again requested to make the amendments as requested by the Senate by Requests Nos. 4, 7, 8, 14, 15, 16, 20, 25, 29, 30, 37, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 58, 59, 66, 67, 86, 90.

The committee have modified Requests Nos. 26 and 36, and recommend that the House of Representatives be requested to make the amendments as now modified.

The committee recommend that the modification as to date from which the amendments made come into effect be agreed to.

The committee recommend that the Bill be returned to the House of Representatives with a message requesting that House to make the amendments as set forth in a schedule annexed.

The committee recommend that the committee have leave to sit again forthwith on the receipt of a message from the House of Representatives, or on motion.

This report will practically constitute the message forwarded to the other House, and it has been drafted in its present form because I think it is desirable that on an occasion of such great importance practically the whole text of the message should be brought under the notice of honorable senators.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am sure that we can rely entirely on the accuracy of the references to the various items, and it seems to me that the report sets forth with great care and explicitness the exact position in which the Tariff now stands in respect to the House of Representatives. I think that everything that it is desirable should be said, is expressed in the message.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolutions reported.

Motion (by Senator O'CONNOR) proposed—

That the report be now adopted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The details of the work of the committee are set out in the report, but I should like to crystallize them, because, in listening to the enumeration of the different items one can scarcely realize what they mean. I think it is desirable to mention that there were 50 items upon which the House of Representatives did not feel at the moment in a position to agree to the requests of the Senate. Out of these 50 requests 23 have not been pressed by us, and two have been modified. So that half of the requests to which the House of Representatives did not feel themselves in the position to assent have not been persisted in by us, and I think that honorable senators on both sides of the Chamber will agree that we have exercised some spirit of moderation. I think, under the circumstances, I may very well ask the Senate to commend this message to the wise counsels which, I am sure, prevail in the House of Representatives. I may be permitted to add that I regret that in some sections of the press an endeavour, which I think is unwise, has been made to stir up strife. I hope that that will be entirely disregarded, and that we shall be able very shortly to rejoice in handing the Tariff over to the people of Australia, for better or worse.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—It might be convenient if at this stage I mentioned the intentions of the Government with regard to the adjournment. I can see that there are a good many reasons why we should adjourn till Wednesday next, but as the House of Representatives will meet on Tuesday, in anticipation of receiving the Tariff on that date, I feel some difficulty in complying with the request, which I otherwise would certainly have liked to accede to. Of course it is a matter more or less for the convenience of the Senate, but it appears to me that, looking at the balance of convenience of both Houses, I must move—

That the Senate at its rising adjourn until Tuesday next.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I am just as anxious as is Senator O'Connor that we should get on with our business in the most expeditious way, but taking into consideration the business which has been transacted and that which is likely to be done, and also having regard to the fact that many honorable senators have to go to their homes in New South Wales and South Australia, I think the honorable and learned senator might consent to an adjournment until Wednesday. Considering the small amount of business that there is for the Senate to do there is no earthly necessity for our meeting on Tuesday. I strongly urge honorable senators to take into consideration the convenience of their colleagues who wish to get to their homes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—My honorable and learned friend, Senator O'Connor, might readily acquiesce in the suggestion of Senator Glassey. I think there is a consensus of opinion that Wednesday will be a more convenient day than Tuesday for meeting next week.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I wish to say that Wednesday would suit me admirably. I want to go to Adelaide and do not want to come back to Melbourne until Wednesday. I believe that sitting on Wednesday would suit the convenience of most honorable senators. Considering that the Senate has done fairly well this week in dealing with the whole of the requests upon the Tariff, I hope that the Vice-President of the Executive Council will recognise that he ought to meet the convenience of honorable senators.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—For the very reasons given by the Vice-President of the Executive Council for sitting on Tuesday, I have come to the conclusion that Wednesday would be the more convenient day.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I certainly should like to see the Senate sit on Tuesday, but at the same time I have no objection to meeting the convenience of the greater number of honorable senators. My chief reason for doing so is that apparently the unattached member of the Government who sits at the head of the table differs from his colleague in regard to the matter. We have the Vice-President of the Executive Council asking the Senate to sit on Tuesday, whilst the other Minister suggests Wednesday. The Government might show some cohesion with regard to their proposals.

Senator O'CONNOR. —The argument used by Senator McGregor has certainly impressed me, namely, that the Senate has shown unusual and commendable expedition in dealing with this subject. I realize that we really have done much more work than was anticipated, and as there seems to be a general wish that we should adjourn until Wednesday, I have no objection to giving way. Therefore, I desire to substitute Wednesday for Tuesday in the motion which I have moved.

Motion amended accordingly.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

GOVERNMENT HOUSES : EXPENDITURE.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—I move—

That an expenditure upon Government Houses of £5,500 a year, as submitted in the statement laid upon the table of the Senate on the 20th inst., is approved during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Honorable senators will, no doubt, recognise from the form in which the motion is put the object of the Government in bringing it forward. That object is this: At the present time the appointment of a Governor-General of Australia is being deferred until the wishes of the people of Australia with regard to the maintenance of establishments has been definitely made known. Until something definite has been decided it is quite obvious that it would be impossible to offer the position to any one. Therefore it is desirable that that uncertainty should be removed at the earliest possible date. Of course there are two ways of doing that. It may be done as we seek to do it now, by obtaining an expression of opinion from both Houses of the Legislature on some general principle. On the other hand, a Bill might have been introduced to fix the amount of this particular kind of expenditure. But we have adopted the former course instead of the latter for this reason—the expenditure upon the upkeep of two establishments hitherto has been under departmental control only in a very slight way. The conditions are altogether new, and it is impossible to say accurately, until we have had some little experience of the working out of the new plan we have adopted here, what the amount of expenditure actually will be. If we adopted the second mode, the amount would have to be fixed in a Bill, and whether that amount proved to be too much or too little it would afterwards be necessary to have another Bill to amend it. We think it very much better to have this expenditure put upon the next Estimates in order to give time to ascertain the results of actual experience. After that, if it is found, as we believe it will be, that this sum is ample, the matter can be put in the form of a Bill and the Governor-General will from that time out—not only the next Governor-General, but succeeding Governors-General—know definitely what the position will be. Honorable senators will realize that the object of adopting a resolution in this form is that there shall be a statement which will be honorably binding upon the people of the Commonwealth, that during the term of office of the next Governor-General, although these matters are not secured by Bill, there will be no lessening of the amount which is now mentioned. I think honorable senators will realize that it is necessary that some definite expression of opinion which will practically and honorably bind Parliament should be made, to enable the Government definitely to communicate with the Imperial authorities. The only way in which that can be done is in this form. This form enables us to give that definite assurance which is necessary, and, at the same time, leaves it open to us after an experience of twelve months to put the matter in the most accurate way possible in the form of a Bill. Honorable senators will see from the schedule which was laid upon the table on the 20th inst., what the exact proposal is. According to this paper, the appropriations for 1901, under the same headings that we are dealing with now, amounted to £13,030. Under the proposal we now make, the sum involved is £5,500. Perhaps it may be well for me to read the schedule, as some honorable senators may not have the document before them. It is made up in this way:—

Melbourne Government-house.—Maintenance, £500; grounds, £900.

Senator STEWART.—What does maintenance mean?

Senator O'CONNOR.—Maintenance of the building itself.

Senator STEWART.—Repairs?

Senator O'CONNOR.—Yes, repairs, up-keep, and so on.

Caretakers, charwomen, &c., £550; insurance, £126; fittings and furniture, £125; china and glass, £150; flags, £100; postal charges, £240; telephones, £110; lighting on public occasions and for offices, &c., £300. Total, £3,101.

Sydney Government-house.—Caretakers, &c., £740; maintenance, £250; grounds, £750; insurance, £100; telephones, £87; postal charges, £50; china and glass, £50; flags, £50. Total, £2,077.

The total amount is £5,178. As that sum of course is only a rough estimate, in order to be upon the safe side we mention a lump sum for the proposed votes, of £5,500. It will be noticed that this expenditure is asked for in regard to the up-keep of the Melbourne and Sydney Government-houses, and I should like to remind honorable senators of the position in which the matter stands in regard to those establishments. The Governments of both New South Wales and Victoria have placed at the disposal of the Commonwealth the Government-houses in the capitals of their respective States, rent free, upon the understanding that we shall pay for their up-keep. That arrangement has compelled them to procure other accommodation for the State Governors, for which the States have to pay. This exceedingly generous conduct on their part certainly deserves the return on ours that we shall fall in with their views, and provide reasonably for the upkeep of the two establishments.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is any other State to receive similar treatment, and to have its deserts so excellently considered?

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do not know that any other State has made an offer of its Government-house to the Commonwealth. The arrangement of which I speak is only for a certain period. To those who may think that it is unreasonable to maintain a residence for the Governor-General in both Melbourne and Sydney I would point out that two residences are provided for the Governor in each State. New South Wales provides a residence for her Governor in Sydney and another in the country, whilst South Australia provides a beautiful country residence for her Governor in addition to his fine town residence.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We are going to abolish the country residence.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It may be that the present arrangements will be altered in the future; I am referring to facts as they are, and as they were when the federation was inaugurated. The cost of the separate State establishments is very much more than the amount which we now propose shall be expended upon the up-keep of residences for the Governor-General. So far as Melbourne is concerned, the Governor-General will have to reside here to attend to his duties while Parliament is sitting, and with regard to the proposal that he should in the recess reside in Sydney, I hope it will not be forgotten that New South Wales was the first State to make provision for his reception, and that by the generosity of its Parliament a residence was provided for him there at the time when the people of that State with splendid hospitality celebrated the inauguration of the Commonwealth.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the Governor-General still have a residence in Melbourne after the federal capital is established?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The honorable member's interjection reminds me that the arrangement entered into with the States concerned is only temporary, and will hold good only until the federal capital is established. When that happens, we hope that a residence, with appointments and surroundings suitable for the position, will be provided for the Governor-General, and Parliament will then have to decide whether it will be necessary to provide any other residence for him. The amount set down in the statement which I have read is the lowest which can be expended to honorably carry out our obligations. Considering that the appointment of a Governor-General is awaiting the settlement of this matter, I think the Senate might well give its approval to the resolution which has been passed by the House of Representatives, so that the Government may definitely and with certainty inform the Imperial authorities what allowance and salary will be available for the person to whom the position is offered.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The motion just moved is an absolutely necessary one, and the only proper course to be adopted, so that the Imperial Government, when they enter upon the task of choosing the next Governor-General, may be in the position to state definitely what amount will be allowed in respect to expenditure not covered by salary. I think that we should all agree that irrespective of amount—a question into which we cannot very well enter at the present moment—it is eminently desirable that the confusion and looseness which has prevailed during the past twelve or eighteen months, and which has led to such serious misunderstandings, should not continue. The motion is practically the outcome of misunderstandings, which, if they did not lead to the resignation of Lord Hopetoun—now Marquis of Linlithgow—culminated in his departure from Australia. Apart from every other consideration, it is desirable that a repetition of that state of things should by all reasonable means be avoided. I do not know that in dealing with a motion having the object which I have indicated, it is desirable to haggle about the amount provided for. It is, of course, important that we should see that the amount provided is reasonable, but if an error is made, it should be in the direction of liberality rather than of parsimony. In my opinion, no accusation of parsimony can be brought against the people of Australia in regard to the unfortunate difficulties which arose, and were the subject of debate in both branches of the Commonwealth Legislature some months ago, and the suggestion of meanness which emanated from some of the English newspapers which dealt with the subject was utterly unjustified. There has been no foundation or colour for any such reflection upon the action of the Commonwealth. The people of Australia are not a mean people. They are a generous people, and if they err in dealing with high public servants, it is in the direction of liberality—

I would almost say lavish liberality—rather than in the direction of the undue curtailment of allowances for the maintenance of the dignity of an office or the efficiency of its administration. I resent personally, and as a representative of the State of South Australia, any imputation of parsimony. Those who have made such malicious assertions cannot be aware of the actual facts. I am sure—aware as we are of his high-standing and character, which is esteemed wherever he is known—that Lord Hopetoun would have been the last to suggest any charge of parsimony. During the eighteen months for which he was Governor-General he received from the exchequer of the Commonwealth a sum of £40,000. The salary of £10,000 per annum, which is fixed by the Constitution, was the subject of very grave consideration during the sittings of the Convention, and the fact that super-added to it there are allowances upon what I consider no paltry or small scale has only to be known to entirely refute any reflections upon the fairness and justice of the people of Australia. The basis upon which the amount set down in the motion is arrived at has more relation, it seems to me, to the residential conveniences of the Governor-General than to the actual administrative necessities of the office which he holds. At the risk of seeming to part company for once with some of my very good friends from New South Wales, I utterly disagree with the necessity for two Government-houses, one in Melbourne and one in Sydney. I think the proposal is too ridiculous to commend itself to men who have arrived at years of maturity.

Senator DAWSON.—It was not even suggested by the Colonial Office.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—As my honorable friend says, it was not even suggested by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. My recollection is that he rather deprecated the sort of pressure which it appeared was likely to be brought to bear upon the Governor-General to occupy these two Government-houses, and to establish himself in Sydney for a certain portion of the year. To my mind the suggestion is perfectly childish. I hope my honorable friends for New South Wales will believe that I say this with the greatest pain, because I am free to confess that there is no place within the bounds of this Commonwealth that I would more gladly live in than Sydney, except, of course, Adelaide. If there is to be a choice of a Government-house, apart from the residence rendered necessary by the administration of the Government of the Commonwealth, I think it ought to be in or near Adelaide. I thoroughly sympathize with the view my honorable and learned friend Senator O'Connor has suggested as a reason why there should be two Government-houses, that, in each State, two Government-houses are provided. I know it is so in South Australia, though I think there ought only to be one. It happens, as my honorable and learned friend says, that, in all the States, there are two Government-houses provided, one as a winter, and the other as a summer residence. I should like to know whether it is proposed that Sydney Government-house shall be the summer residence of the Governor-General?

Senator O'CONNOR.—This certainly ought not to be the winter residence.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am with my honorable and learned friend as to that. We have heard of geographical free-traders and protectionists, but Government-house, Melbourne, is not selected as the residence of the Governor-General upon any geographical ground, but on the ground of necessity, because, whether we like it or not, and whether our friends from New South Wales like it or not, Melbourne is, for the present, practically the seat of Government. There is no getting away from that. Why, for the mere sake of patting our good friends in Sydney on the back, and keeping them sweet by the expenditure of a few thousand pounds per year, we should keep up a residence in Sydney for the Governor-General I really do not know. I do not propose to move any amendment upon the motion, because, whether £5,000 a year is sufficient or not, there ought to be some definite sum fixed in respect of these allowances, in order that the gentleman who has the distinction and high honour of being chosen Governor-General of Australia in succession to the Marquis of Linlithgow, may know exactly what he is going to receive. But the proposal to maintain Government-house in Sydney for the Governor-General is submitted for a reason which would justify the positive throwing away of the money of the Commonwealth upon any silly purpose whatever. These are the only observations I desire to make upon the motion.

I desire to express my entire dissatisfaction with the proposal to maintain Government-house, Sydney, for the Governor-General. I do not think it ought to be done. I think the Government should put their feet down and abstain from doing it. We have before in the Senate had references made to the maintenance of public offices in Sydney, luxurious, carpeted rooms, with magnificent beds and bed-hangings, but that is a comparatively unimportant matter.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Where does the honorable and learned senator get that information? I have not seen any.

Senator Major GOULD.—From his own imagination, or from the imagination of Senator Matheson.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It cannot be from my own imagination because I always have an iron bedstead without any curtains. Is it not a fact that there is a lovely suite of rooms provided in the public offices in Sydney for the Minister of Home Affairs?

Senator DOBSON.—There is no bed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then there ought to be a bed; it is a decided omission.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned senator made the bed his grievance just now.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—This is a very small matter in comparison with the maintenance of a costly Government-house. Sydney Government-house is a beautiful residence which I think it ought to be the pride of the State to maintain at its own expense, but which ought not to be kept up at the expense of the Commonwealth. I feel less inclination to move an amendment in this matter for the reason that the remedy for this state of things—and perhaps in this respect I may disappoint my Victorian friends—ought to be the early selection of a federal capital site and the early establishment of the federal capital.

Senator DOBSON.—I hope not.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We shall then get rid of all these little troubles. We shall know what our expenses are likely to be. We shall be able to cut our coat according to our cloth, and we shall not be continually getting into trouble and uncertainty with high officers of State, such as the Governor-General, and feeling difficulty as to how much ought to be contributed towards the cost of his establishment. I hope that the Government will take an early opportunity of curtailing that expenditure, and in the interests of economy, which is clamoured for throughout the Commonwealth, I trust they will put an end to the maintenance of a second Government-house, except at the expense of the State in which it exists.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am very sorry that Senator Symon did not carry the expression of his opinion to the extent of moving an amendment upon this motion. I beg to move—

That the words "less the amount required for the up-keep of Government-house, Sydney," be inserted after the figures "£5,500."

If honorable senators can improve upon that amendment, I shall be only too happy to give way to them. My only object is to secure a substantial expression of the opinion which apparently is held by a majority of honorable senators from all the States, that it is quite unnecessary to have two Government-houses. In my opinion, it is not only unnecessary, but it is quite objectionable. Why should Sydney and Melbourne be entitled to the whole of the Governor-General's time? Have Perth, Hobart, Brisbane, or Adelaide no claim, or have the States of which they are the capital cities no claim? Why should all the other States be called upon to contribute towards the expense of keeping up Government-house in Sydney, which, if the Governor-General does his duty to the Commonwealth, he cannot occupy for more than a couple of months in each year?

Senator CHARLESTON.—He must have a residence.

Senator HIGGS.—That is a very brilliant observation. I have not suggested that the Governor-General should not have a residence in Melbourne. Does the honorable senator not think that Government-house in Melbourne is sufficiently capacious to hold the Governor-General and his suite? From a cursory glance, I should say that it would hold about 40 families, and that is the great trouble. The statesmen of Victoria have been so extravagant in their ideas that they have built that great mansion and now expect the public to maintain it. This arrangement for the leasing of two Government-houses was come to between certain politicians very estimable in other respects, but who had extraordinary opinions as to what the Commonwealth was likely to approve. They evidently thought that we were so rich in resources that we could maintain a Governor-General as expensive as the Shah of Persia appears to be, judging from comments recently appearing in the newspapers. My feeling is, that the sooner the people of Australia make up their minds to have a native-born or native-raised Governor-General, the better. I do not demand that he shall be native-born, but I mean to say that he should be one of our own. He should be an Australian statesman or citizen who is qualified for the post, and we have dozens of them. We shall never arrive at that stage so long as we are prepared to tempt some of the hard-up nobility in the old country who are desirous of coming out here to recoup their fortunes. It would appear that the idea of this motion is really to assist Mr. Chamberlain to select a Governor-General for Australia. The opinion we once held that the aristocrats of the old country were anxious to obtain this position on account of the honour attached to it is apparently exploded, and it is understood now that the number of applicants for the position will be determined by the amount of money we are prepared to pay to make the stay of the Governor-General in Australia comfortable. To my mind, £10,000 a year is more than ample for the purpose. I am not, however, at this stage prepared to say that the people of Australia should expect the Governor-General to occupy a place like Government-house, Melbourne, or that the Governor-General, whoever he may be, should have to bear the expense necessary for the up-keep of so magnificent a building. I understand that it costs no less than £1,000 a year to light up that residence. In any case, I certainly think we are not called upon to go to the expense of maintaining Government-house in Sydney. Honorable senators may not feel inclined to vote against this proposal, the Government being committed to the expenditure, seeing that they have leased the house for some three years. But, if it is a business transaction, the Government will have no difficulty whatever in sub-letting it for the remainder of that term to some of the wealthy families of New South Wales, who would be only too glad to occupy it.

Senator DAWSON.—And make money on the bargain.

Senator HIGGS.—They would probably make money on the bargain. If there is any disability in that respect, it might be allowed to revert to the State Governor, instead of his being expected to occupy some other establishment, as the State Governor of Victoria has also had to do.

Senator Major GOULD.—What would be done with the existing State Government-houses then? The States will be expected to keep them up?

Senator HIGGS.—Some honorable senators may think that there is some animosity to New South Wales contained in the opposition to this motion.

Senator MILLEN.—I think so.

Senator HIGGS.—There is no objection on the part of honorable senators from Queensland. We took the trouble to go on the federal tour seeking the capital site—a search which Senator Millen did not assist by his presence—and we did so with a view to the early establishment of the federal capital. Surely that is in the interests of New South Wales? Every honorable senator from Queensland is anxious to see the federal capital selected at an early date, but I am afraid a selection will not be made for some time to come, mainly because of the neglect of Senator Millen and certain other honorable senators, who failed to join in the recent parliamentary inspection.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator should not talk bunkum. I know more about the sites than he does, although I did not take part in the picnic.

Senator HIGGS.—It was no picnic for us to travel thousands of miles in order to make the inspection. Honorable senators from New South Wales did not join in the tour because it was a Government proposal, and they thought that the Government would probably obtain some credit for it. In objecting to the maintenance of two Government-houses, I am not actuated by any feeling against New South Wales. I feel that only a small section of the people of that State—a section concentrated in Sydney—is interested in the proposal that the Governor-General shall spend a certain portion of the year in Sydney. That small section consists of the people who receive blue and white tickets for the Governor's receptions. The average taxpayers—the men whose case honorable senators of the Opposition have been pretending to advocate during the discussion on the Tariff—are not in any way affected by the proposal. They never visit Government-house; they do not even obtain a glimpse of the Governor-General except when he rides through the streets in some procession to impress the people with a display of militarism. I have no feeling against New South Wales. I believe Sydney to be one of the most beautiful spots on the face of the earth, and the citizens are as generous and as good as are any other people in the Commonwealth. But while the up-keep of Government-house, Sydney, for the use of the Governor-General, and the residence of His Excellency in that capital, may not have a disastrous effect upon federal politics, I feel that there is always a possible danger to be feared. If the Governor-General of the future makes friends, as he will do, amongst influential citizens of Melbourne and Sydney, it is possible that, in the event of Inter-State troubles arising, Queensland might suffer.

Senator O'CONNOR.—What powers has the Governor-General under the Constitution?

Senator HIGGS.—If the Governor-General has no power to do anything, of what use is he? Has the honorable and learned senator become a pro-Boer or a Republican that he talks in that way?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The Governor-General is only the mouth-piece of the Executive, and the Executive is controlled by Parliament.

Senator HIGGS.—Let honorable senators note that statement. According to Senator O'Connor the Governor-General is only the mouth-piece of the Executive Council, the members of which each receive some £1,500 a year. What an expensive mouth-piece he is! He receives a salary of £10,000 a year, and the sum of £5,500 per annum is to be provided for the up-keep of two Government-houses for his use. As Senator Symon has pointed out, no less a sum than £40,000 was expended in connexion with the office during Lord Hopetoun's occupancy of it. Yet that gentleman had no power, no influence whatever. He was merely the mouth-piece of our esteemed and able leader, the Vice-President of the Executive Council, and his colleagues in the Government. I am thankful for the information which Senator O'Connor has given us. The sooner the taxpayers learn that the Governor-General has no power, and that he is merely the mouth-piece of the Executive, the sooner they will arrive at the conclusion that we have amongst us any number of men of ability competent to fill the position. If I may be pardoned for being personal, who would not vote for the appointment of Senator Playford as Governor-General? To go outside this Parliament for a moment, we must recognise that, although some of us may disagree with the political opinions expressed in the past by our various States Lieutenant-Governors, not one of them has failed to prove himself to be as capable and as intelligent as any Governor or Governor-General that we have known. I hope that honorable senators will vote for the amendment in some form or other. If we believe, as Senator Symon says, that it is utterly ridiculous to provide two Government-houses, let us show the possession of that opinion by voting for the amendment.

Senator EWING (Western Australia).—I should not have spoken but for the fact that I intend to-day to reverse the vote which I gave upon a previous occasion. Upon looking into the matter, it seems to me that the attitude taken up by this Parliament on a previous occasion was rather paltry, and I propose to place before the Senate some of the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. We find in the first place that nearly every State in the union provides two residences for its Governor, and we know from personal experience that Melbourne in winter is hardly a fit place for any one to live in. On the other hand, we have evidence before us that there is hardly a climate in the world in which it is more pleasurable to live than that of Sydney in winter.

Senator BARRETT.—Why does the honorable and learned senator complain of Melbourne? Does he not think we are having very good weather now?

Senator EWING.—I shall take the first opportunity of getting out of Melbourne, and I would vote—upon climatic grounds—for almost any city in preference to Melbourne as the meeting place of the Federal Parliament. Sydney has great claims upon the Commonwealth. It is the largest city in the union, and the capital of the oldest State.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—And the federal capital is to be in New South Wales.

Senator EWING.—I should be very glad if Sydney could be selected as the capital. I believe that it would have been chosen but for the fatal mistake of inserting a clause in the Constitution, providing that the capital shall be at least 100 miles distant from Sydney. With that provision in the Constitution we cannot make Sydney the federal capital; but I do not hesitate to say that if that city were chosen, the citizens of Melbourne would very quickly demand that a Government-house should be maintained in Melbourne for the use of the Governor-General whenever the opportunity offered. I do not know that that demand would be unreasonable, particularly when we can consider the desires of these two large States without any loss to the Commonwealth. If the Government proposal would involve the Commonwealth in an expenditure of thousands of pounds, I should hesitate to vote for it. But what do we find? We find on the figures before us that the States are paying the piper; that they are asking the Commonwealth practically to do nothing, and that if it were decided that the Governor-General should not have a residence in Sydney, we should save the Commonwealth only something like £1,000 a year. It is admitted on all hands that if we compel the Governor-General to live in Melbourne all the year round we must increase the sum of £3,100 proposed to be set apart for the upkeep of Government-house here.

Senator MATHESON.—Who makes that admission?

Senator EWING.—It is admitted by very many honorable senators. Whether the honorable senator admits it or not, does not concern me.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator should justify the contention.

Senator EWING.—If the honorable senator will look at the facts he must see that if the Governor-General lives in Melbourne all the year round, the caretakers and numerous other servants will have to be employed at Government-house, Melbourne, throughout the year.

Senator MATHESON.—They will be in any case.

Senator EWING.—I do not believe that. The number of persons employed about Government-house when it is in occupation must necessarily be much larger than when it is not. Therefore, the position is this: That if we are going to wipe out the £2,000 proposed to be set apart for Government-house, Sydney, we must increase the sum of £3,100 set apart for Government-house, Melbourne.

Senator BARRETT.—Not necessarily.

allowed to revert to the State Governor, instead of his being expected to occupy some other establishment, as the State Governor of Victoria has also had to do.

Senator Major GOULD.—What would be done with the existing State Government-houses then? The States will be expected to keep them up?

On the other hand, we have evidence before us that there is hardly a climate in the world in which it is more pleasurable to live than that of Sydney in winter.

Senator BARRETT.—Why does the honorable and learned senator complain of Melbourne? Does he not think we are having very good weather now?

Senator EWING.—I shall take the first opportunity of getting out of Melbourne, and I would vote—upon climatic grounds—for almost any city in preference to Melbourne as the meeting place of the Federal Parliament. Sydney has great claims upon the Commonwealth. It is the largest city in the union, and the capital of the oldest State.

Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER.—And the federal capital is to be in New South Wales.

Senator EWING.—I should be very glad if Sydney could be selected as the capital. I believe that it would have been chosen but for the fatal mistake of inserting a clause in the Constitution, providing that the capital shall be at least 100 miles distant from Sydney. With that provision in the Constitution we cannot make Sydney the federal capital; but I do not hesitate to say that if that city were chosen, the citizens of Melbourne would very quickly demand that a Government-house should be maintained in Melbourne for the use of the Governor-General whenever the opportunity offered. I do not know that that demand would be unreasonable, particularly when we can consider the desires of these two large States without any loss to the Commonwealth. If the Government proposal would involve the Commonwealth in an expenditure of thousands of pounds, I should hesitate to vote for it. But what do we find? We find on the figures before us that the States are paying the piper; that they are asking the Commonwealth practically to do nothing; and that if it were decided that the Governor-General should not have a residence in Sydney, we should save the Commonwealth only something like £1,000 a year. It is admitted on all hands that if we compel the Governor-General to live in Melbourne all the year round we must increase the sum of £3,100 proposed to be set apart for the upkeep of Government-house here.

Senator MATHESON.—Who makes that admission?

Senator EWING.—It is admitted by very many honorable senators. Whether the honorable senator admits it or not, does not concern me.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator should justify the contention.

Senator EWING.—If the honorable senator will look at the facts he must see that if the Governor-General lives in Melbourne all the year round, the caretakers and numerous other servants will have to be employed at Government-house, Melbourne, throughout the year.

Senator MATHESON.—They will be in any case.

Senator EWING.—I do not believe that. The number of persons employed about Government-house when it is in occupation must necessarily be much larger than when it is not. Therefore, the position is this: That if we are going to wipe out the £2,000 proposed to be set apart for Government-house, Sydney, we must increase the sum of £3,100 set apart for Government-house, Melbourne.

Senator BARRETT.—Not necessarily.

Senator EWING.—To provide a Sydney residence for the Governor-General will substantially make a difference of about £1,000 to the Commonwealth, and to oppose the proposition is altogether too paltry, especially when we realize that we are considering the largest State in the union, and the natural capital of Australia. Let the people of Melbourne or any other part of Australia say what they will, Sydney will be the commercial capital—and I should not be sorry to see it the political capital—of the Commonwealth. These being my views, and feeling, as I do, that we are not proposing to impose any substantial burden on the shoulders of the Commonwealth, I intend to support the Government proposal. At a cost of £1,000 we can do that which the people of Sydney expect of us. We can keep the contract made with the New South Wales Government. The Federal Executive have caused the State Government to spend a large sum of money in contemplation of an act of this kind, and shall we, for the sake of £1,000, break all the implied and express promises which have been made to the people of New South Wales? It would not be worthy of the Federal Parliament to quibble over a difference of £1,000, and I trust that the motion will be carried without amendment.

Senator MACFARLANE (Tasmania).—Upon this occasion I intend to vote with the Government. It seems to me that the amendment arises only from one of two things: either an honest desire for economy or something very much akin to jealousy. I fail to see why the ordinary courtesies extended to the Governor of a State should not be accorded to the Governor-General. The expenditure involved in the up-keep of two Government-houses will be comparatively trifling, and the principle which is involved in this proposal—the principle of extending courtesy to, and providing for the comfort of, the first citizen of the Commonwealth, should be agreed to.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I intend to support the amendment, because I think it is unnecessary and undesirable that the Commonwealth should provide for the Governor-General a house in Sydney as well as in Melbourne. Senators Macfarlane and Ewing have complained that only a very small sum of money is involved. It appears to me that something more than mere money—a principle—is involved. We are well aware of the reason why the Government proposes to maintain a house in Sydney for the Governor-General; it is because Sydney is jealous of the Federal Parliament meeting in Melbourne, and the Governor-General living there. That is not a frame of mind which ought to be encouraged by this Parliament. At any rate, if the Government of New South Wales insist or desire that His Excellency should spend some time in Sydney, they might very well pay all the expenses. Nothing more, I consider, can be claimed from the Commonwealth than that it should provide for the Governor-General a residence at the seat of government. Any other State capital might just as reasonably desire the presence of His Excellency as Sydney, or as a particular clique in Sydney, appears to do. After all, in whose interests is the Commonwealth asked to expend this additional sum of £2,077? In the interests of the people of New South Wales? No. In the interests of the people of Sydney? No. It is in the interests of an insignificant society clique in Sydney, who are never content unless they are basking in the sunshine of vice-royalty; who are never satisfied unless they are crawling on their bellies before some potentate whom they consider better than themselves; who are never pleased unless they are entertained with champagne and other luxuries at the expense of either the Commonwealth as a whole, or the people of the various States. In Brisbane we have the same little coterie. I suppose it also exists in Melbourne. If we go to Adelaide we shall find the very same thing existing there, and probably also in Perth. I dare say that even in far-away Hobart it finds a place. Living as we do in a democratic community we ought to discountenance everything of this kind. Referring to the items, I find that the postal charges amount to £240 for Melbourne and £50 for Sydney. £300 per annum to be spent on postage stamps! Is that money to be expended on the business of the Commonwealth or on the postage of letters of invitations to parties, balls, and receptions at Government house? Perhaps Senator O'Connor will give us some information on that point. A very great deal of criticism is levelled at members of Parliament because their letters to their constituents on matters of public importance are franked by the Commonwealth. Although the two Houses comprise 112 members, and the total sum allotted to them for postage and telegrams is £1,000 per annum, yet the Governor-General—who, Senator O'Connor has told us, is only a mouthpiece, has no power or influence, and really is not necessary—has for himself an amount equal to a third of the sum voted for the members of both Houses of Parliament. A proposal of this character appears to me to be ridiculous.

Senator DOBSON.—That is a very unfair comparison.

Senator STEWART.—I do not think there is anything unfair about it. We are here to scrutinize every item of expenditure by the Commonwealth. This particular expenditure is most unnecessary. It is an extravagance which ought not to be sanctioned by the Parliament.

Senator Major GOULD.—Is the honorable senator objecting to the whole £5,000?

Senator STEWART.—Under other circumstances I, probably, would object to the whole £5,000. Under existing circumstances it is apparent to me, as I suppose it is to many other honorable senators, that we cannot escape from sanctioning some expenditure. We cannot ask a Governor-General to come out from England, pay him a salary of £10,000 a year, and then invite him to spend half that sum in maintaining his residence; but I hope that at some future period the position of Governor-General will be put on a more business footing. I recognise that we cannot do that at the present time. But I really do not see any reason—and no reason that is satisfactory to me has been given—why we should spend over £2,000 per annum in maintaining a residence in Sydney in addition to the one in Melbourne.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales).—I regret that there should have been any feeling imported into this debate, because it should be recognised that the Government have presented this resolution in pursuance of an understanding which was made—rightly or wrongly—long ago. It must also be conceded that that arrangement has never been repudiated, and that it is incumbent on the Government to carry out their engagements. We must realize that both Victoria and New South Wales made provision at considerable expense for residences for the State Governors. It was considered desirable, owing to the large population centered in each of these States, that provision should be made for the residence of the Governor-General in each State for a certain portion of the year, pending the selection of the federal capital site, and upon that ground and at the request of the authorities both States incurred considerable expense. No one will raise a question as to the fairness of maintaining Government-house, Melbourne, as a residence for His Excellency the Governor-General. That may be regarded as a matter of necessity, owing to the sittings of Parliament being held in that city. We know that New South Wales has entered into an engagement by which it has become possessed of another house as a residence for the State Governor, that a large sum of money has been expended in properly furnishing that residence, and that the State Government, relying on good faith being observed, have incurred a considerable outlay upon Government-house, Sydney, to fit it for the occupation of His Excellency the Governor-General. We know, further, that at the inception of the Commonwealth the Governor-General was located in Sydney for a considerable time, and that it was only just prior to the opening of Parliament in Melbourne that he took up his residence here. It is only fair, therefore, that the arrangements made with the Government of New South Wales should be carried out in the way now proposed.

Senator DAWSON.—Was Queensland consulted with regard to that arrangement?

Senator Major GOULD.—It was represented in the Ministry by the Postmaster-General, and, I presume, therefore, that its interests were consulted. The Postmaster-General approves of this arrangement.

Senator DRAKE.—Hear, hear.

Senator DAWSON.—The Postmaster-General is expressing only one Queensland opinion.

Senator Major GOULD.—He represents it just as much as does the honorable member, and occupies a position of much greater weight and influence in the Commonwealth.

Senator DAWSON.—He does not represent as many Queenslanders as I do.

Senator DRAKE.—I am not so sure of that.

Senator Major GOULD.—Senator Stewart addressed himself to the question whether it was necessary to have a Governor-General, but I would remind honorable senators that, whilst we remain a portion of the Empire, we must have a Governor-General to preside over us in order to represent our connexion with the mother country. The question whether we should have a Governor-General or not may be dismissed for the present, and left as a subject for academic discussion by those who argue that the Commonwealth should be independent of the Empire. With regard to the fairness of the arrangement made, I cannot too strongly impress upon honorable senators the fact that one-third of the population of the Commonwealth reside in New South Wales. I admit that a somewhat similar proportion is to be found in Victoria. These two States are the dominant factors in the Commonwealth, by virtue of their population and the work which they have accomplished in promoting the settlement and advancement of Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Would the honorable and learned senator settle the Tariff on that principle—on the principle of New South Wales versus the rest of the Commonwealth?

Senator Major GOULD.—Certainly not. In the settlement of the Tariff we have been called upon to consider the best interests of the Commonwealth, as a whole. A very strong feeling prevails in New South Wales that the interests of that State are not considered to the extent they should be. It is believed that there is a tendency to pay more regard to the necessities of the State in which the Parliament is sitting, at the expense of the other States, which are quite as important as regards population, area, wealth, and everything that goes to make up prosperity. Under the Constitution it is provided that the federal capital is to be established in New South Wales.

Senator MATHESON.—But not in Sydney.

Senator Major GOULD.—I know that perfectly well; but would the honorable senator wish Government-house to be fixed at Goulburn or Bathurst for the time being? If so, we might, possibly, arrange it for him.

Senator MATHESON.—There should be one Government-house and no more.

Senator Major GOULD.—There is no provision in the Constitution to that effect.

Senator MATHESON.—That is the natural inference.

Senator Major GOULD.—Natural fiddlesticks! The Constitution provides that Parliament shall sit in Melbourne, but it does not state that the seat of government shall be in that city. It does not provide where the seat of government is to be, but the federal capital is to be somewhere in New South Wales. When this question was under consideration, it was pointed out by an eminent constitutional authority that there was no warrant for assuming that the seat of government should be in Melbourne, but that there was every warrant for supposing it should be in New South Wales. Taking that into consideration, it is reasonable that the Governor-General should have an opportunity afforded to him when Parliament is in recess of visiting the capital of New South Wales and residing there for a limited period. It is not intended that this shall operate to the detriment of the other State capitals. I readily concede that it is desirable that the Governor-General should have every facility for visiting all the capitals of the Commonwealth, and that he should not be shut up in Melbourne or Sydney exclusively. I know that some honorable senators feel that there is a spirit of undue extravagance abroad, and possibly it will be objected that the maintenance of a residence for the Governor-General in Sydney will involve an undue expenditure. I would point out, however, that the expenditure contemplated will not exceed £2,077. As has been mentioned by Senator Ewing, if we retained Government-house, Melbourne, alone as a residence for His Excellency, the cost of maintenance would be more than that now provided for, and, at the most, the saving affected by giving up Government-house, Sydney, would be £1,000 per annum. It is not desirable, after an agreement has been entered into with the Government of New South Wales, that any ground should be given for a feeling of injury on the part of that State, owing to any actual or imaginary breach of faith. The Sydney people may not receive any great benefit from the maintenance of a residence for the Governor-General there, but they will at least have the outward and visible sign of the Commonwealth, as represented by the Governor-General, amongst them. Furthermore, whatever may be said with regard to the fact that our Governors keep up a great amount of State, in which the great bulk of the people cannot participate, it must be acknowledged that the entertainments given by them cause a large amount of money to be circulated amongst the masses. The Governor-General, for instance, could not give an entertainment without spending a considerable sum, and this would be distributed amongst the masses. Moreover, the persons who were privileged to attend these entertainments could not do so without in their turn spending more money, and thus the people generally would derive benefit. We know that a quiet season in any of the large centres leads to great complaints regarding slackness of trade, and slackness of trade means less employment. It is one of the greatest mistakes to under-rate the importance of expenditure such as I have referred to, and the benefits which flow from it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The working bees in the hive do not appreciate arguments such as those, which are used by the drones only.

Senator Major GOULD.—The honorable senator will not deny that if he chose to spend £20,000 in entertaining his friends, he would be doing good by spending his money—that he would be distributing his money among the working bees in the hive.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The money could be spent to much greater advantage.

Senator Major GOULD.—No doubt, but if people cannot be induced to spend it in any other way, we may as well have it distributed in that form. Some people object to the money spent upon theatrical entertainments and other amusements, but that all becomes distributed amongst the general community. However, apart from that question, the present proposal of the Government is fair and reasonable, and will enable us to carry out the promise which has been made, and to satisfy at least one-third of the population of the Commonwealth. We shall also be able to show the State of New South Wales that with regard to this particular matter there is no under-current of ill-feeling or jealousy towards the oldest and most populous State.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I intend to support the amendment, because I think we should be very careful in laying down precedents in matters of this kind. It might appear at first sight that we should be studying the interests of Sydney by agreeing to the Government proposal, but a little consideration will show that a momentary advantage may be purchased at an ultimate excessive cost. If we lay down the precedent that Sydney is entitled to have the Governor-General residing in that capital for a portion of the year, later on, when the seat of government is in New South Wales, Melbourne will come forward with a claim that her interests demand that the Governor-General shall reside here. Melbourne will have quite as good reasons for urging that claim as Sydney has now. It is all very well to say that this arrangement is to continue for only five years, but we are laying down a precedent, and at the end of that time, or when the Government has taken up its seat in New South Wales, we shall have a similar set of circumstances presenting themselves, and a claim will be made that could not be put forward if we defeat this proposal at the present time. I therefore warn the New South Wales representatives not to buy a temporary advantage at too great a price.

Senator Major GOULD.—We are prepared to give Melbourne all that we ask for—the same fair treatment.

Senator DE LARGIE.—This is not a matter to be considered from a Melbourne or a Sydney stand-point. The other metropolitan cities of Australia have a right to be considered. I dare say that the business people of Perth would like the Governor-General to stay in that city, just as much as the Sydney people want him to stay there. The people of Perth are just as much entitled to have consideration given to them in regard to the spendings of the Governor-General and the people whom he entertains, as are the people of Sydney. We have to view the matter from the stand-point of every metropolis in the Federation. We have no right to lay down a precedent that we cannot carry out fairly all round. I admit that the Government have entered into an agreement, but if they enter into foolish agreements, and commit themselves to arrangements of this kind, it is not the duty of Parliament to give its consent to them. It is rather our duty to point out to the Government that they have done wrong. By so doing, we shall prevent them from entering into other agreements of the kind. Much has been said concerning the climate of Melbourne. There is nothing in that argument, because, as far as my experience goes, Melbourne is the most suitable climate in Australia for the English constitution. We are going to import our Governor-Generals from the old country, and there is no part of Australia where I have lived that suits the English constitution so well as does Melbourne. Sydney, in my opinion, is not at all suited to the constitution of the average Englishman in the summer months. Melbourne, indeed, is the very best place, as far as concerns climate, to which we could bring our Governor-General. But really the question of climate has nothing to do with the subject. It is really a matter of circulating as much public money as possible in Sydney. The troubles of those who have spoken about the health of the Governor-General are very small. I admit that New South Wales has just as much interest in this matter as has any other State of Australia. But Sydney has less interest in it than have some of the other cities of New South Wales, because Sydney is the one place mentioned in the Constitution where the seat of Government must not be. What is the meaning of this cry to have the Governor-General residing in the very place that is pointed out by the Constitution as the city where the seat of Government cannot be located? The argument has been advanced that there are more people in New South Wales than in any other State. Well, if the people of New South Wales are so numerous and the State is so wealthy — and I dare say that it will be admitted at once that it is the richest State in the Federation—let those people put their hands in their big collective pocket, and pay the expenses of the Governor-General when he is residing in that part of Australia. I am sure that there will be very little objection to their doing so.

Senator Major GOULD. — New South Wales passed a Bill appropriating £3,000 or £4,000 towards the expenses of the Governor-General. That is more than any other State did. The Commonwealth Government advised the Governor-General not to accept anything from an individual State.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We know that it suits the present position for Sydney to take up an exalted attitude like that. But I hold that we shall be laying down a sound precedent in not agreeing to this proposal at the present moment. I do not view the question from any antipathy to Sydney or to the people of New South Wales. If there is one State of the Federation which I admire more than my own State it is New South Wales. I lived there for the greater part of my Australian life. Therefore, I have no feelings of jealousy towards the people of New South Wales. I oppose the Government proposition because, by adopting it, we shall be laying down a precedent that in the future will operate against New South Wales. I hope that the New South Wales people will not be so warm in their advocacy of this policy, which is certainly not in their best interests.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). —I entirely agree with some of the previous speakers, who have deprecated the action of certain newspapers in the old country in decrying Australia, and in attributing any little disturbance that has occurred in the Commonwealth with respect to expenditure upon Federal or State Governors to the meanness of the Australian people. When the people of England realize that at the inauguration of the Commonwealth New South Wales spent about £150,000 through State and municipal channels, and that Victoria spent almost an equal sum, besides the amount indicated by Senator Symon that was incurred directly in connexion with the Governor-General himself, they will regard that as a complete answer to any charge of meanness on the part of Australia. I am sorry that so much State animosity has been introduced into the criticism of this proposal. It is not creditable to the representatives of the States that we should talk about what the people of New South Wales or Victoria want. I have been in New South Wales recently, and this question appeared to me to agitate the minds of the people there very little. At the inauguration of the Commonwealth, the Government were bound to enter into some arrangement as to the housing of the Governor-General at that time. No question was then raised about the Governor-General living in Victoria or any other State. Everybody admitted that the proper place for the inauguration of the Commonwealth was the mother State. The Government had also to enter into some arrangement with the Government of New South Wales with respect to the future housing of the Governor-General. That was done. The Government of New South Wales then had the power in their hands to a certain extent to make a bargain with the Commonwealth Government, and it was to their credit that they did what they considered to be in the very best interests of the State they governed. As the Government of the Commonwealth entered into an agreement with them, I think it would be very wrong for the Commonwealth Parliament to attempt to upset that arrangement. I do not see that there is anything in the argument with respect to laying down a precedent. The Government have consented to limit the expenditure to a certain term. If we do that, there is no danger that Victoria will make any attempt to have the Governor-General residing in Melbourne when we have fixed the site of the federal capital, any more than His Excellency will be asked to reside in Western Australia, South Australia, or any other capital city. It will be recognised that, as he is placed at the head of the Government, the Governor-General must reside at the seat of government, and that his visits to the other States may be welcome, but will not be compulsory. The real matter we have to consider is whether the amount asked for is too great or too small. I should like to be as economical as any one else in regard to the expenditure of Commonwealth money, and I would suggest that, if any one thinks the amount asked for is too much, an amendment should be moved to limit the sum without dragging in the name of New South Wales.

Senator O'CONNOR.—If it is to be done at all, it cannot be done for less money than we have asked for.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not suggest that an amendment should be moved, but am pointing out that that would be a better course to pursue than the one proposed. It would have been in better taste to move such an amendment. If honorable senators will turn to the experience of the different States, and consider how the Governors have been treated in the past, they will realize that, in voting the amount asked for, they are not consenting, considering the importance of the Commonwealth compared with the States, to the expenditure of money in excess of what the States have spent. Take New South Wales. She paid her Governor a certain amount nominally, but the allowances she voted were nearly as great as, if not greater than, the sum now asked for on account of the Governor-General. The same was the case in Victoria; and in South Australia, with a limited population, the proportion that the allowances bore to the salary of the Governor was not less than the allowance asked for in connexion with the resolution we are discussing. It would be better for us to discuss the question from the point of view of the adequacy or inadequacy of the amount we are voting, and not from the aspect of the relationship of one State to another. I intend to support the Government with respect to the resolution. No matter what cry may be made about extravagance, the proposed expenditure of the Commonwealth in this instance is not more extravagant than that of the States, and I am willing to take the responsibility of answering for my vote in support of it.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—The terms in which this proposed vote are introduced, are to my mind incorrect. We are asked to approve of the expenditure of £5,500 a year upon the Governor-General's establishment. The money is not to be expended upon the Governor-General's establishment at all; it is to be expended upon the maintenance of two Government-houses. If honorable gentlemen will look carefully at the items which have been placed before us, they will see that not one is to be paid for the maintenance of the Governor-General's establishment. The whole of the money will be paid, not to the Governor-General, whoever he may be, but to those employed by the Commonwealth Government in looking after the Government-houses in Melbourne and Sydney. I draw attention to the matter because several senators have spoken as though the money is to be paid to the Governor-General. It is simply an estimate of what the Government will be called upon to pay each year to keep two Government-houses in a habitable condition, and to provide for their lighting upon public occasions, the replacing of china and glassware, and similar expenses. I am thoroughly of opinion that it is absolutely necessary that the Government should maintain a residence for the Governor-General. Our first Governor-General, the Marquis of Linlithgow, came out here intending to remain six years, but stayed only eighteen months. An Acting Governor-General has taken his place, presumably only for a short time, and he, no doubt, will be succeeded by a second Governor-General, who may or may not remain for the whole term of the office. But, in any case, the money which we are now voting will not be paid to the occupant of the office, but will be spent directly by the Government.

Senator DE LARGIE.—A marquis could not be expected to remain very long in Australia in any case. Look at the society he would have to mix with!

Senator MATHESON.—That remark has no bearing upon what I am saying. The Government must provide a residence for the Governor-General, and they must maintain it. I am thoroughly in accord with that principle. It is a principle which has been adopted in the United States, in Canada, and in the various States of Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Have they not a White House in every State in America?

Senator MATHESON.—That I do not know, but the entire expense of keeping White House, Washington, in an habitable condition is borne by the Government of the United States, and, in addition, they spend a large sum, amounting in all to something like £21,000 a year, in paying for the President's secretaries, his carriages and horses, the lighting, the stables, the maintenance of the grounds, and the wages of all the permanent servants, President in and President out. That principle must inevitably be recognised by Australia, whether we wish to be economical or lavish. But there is another question involved in this motion, and that is whether it is desirable or necessary that two Government-houses shall be maintained for the next Governor-General. I am emphatically opposed to such unnecessary extravagance, and I desire the Senate to understand that we are touching here merely upon the fringe of the matter. The expenditure of £2,000 a year in maintaining Government-house in Sydney is in itself only a small matter. Its occupation will entail a very large expense upon the Governor-General apart from its maintenance. That fact was recognised when the arrangement was first suggested by the present Minister for Home Affairs, and when the New South Wales Parliament voted £3,700 in view of the proposal that the Governor-General should occupy two houses instead of one. It was also recognised by the present Treasurer when, in the Victorian Parliament, he introduced a Bill to make a similar provision. I intend to allude to these matters more fully later on, because I do not want any senator to ask what are my secret sources of information, or to say that my statements shock his sense of probability. Those remarks were made on a former occasion, when I put my views on a similar matter before the Senate, and, therefore, I propose now to quote my authority for every statement, so that there can be no airy disposal of the facts which I bring forward.

Senator DOBSON.—But even when one has the facts they must be rightly applied.

Senator MATHESON.—I will give the honorable and learned senator the facts, and he will be able to use his own judgment in applying them. The maintenance of a Government-house in Sydney, and the recognition of the principle that the Governor-General should spend the greater part of the parliamentary recess there, will, in the first place, entail a practice which a solid majority of honorable senators have already objected to—the transfer of the head-quarters of the Ministry to Sydney during the recess.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think that the fact that the Governor-General is residing in Sydney for a time will necessitate the transfer of Ministerial departments to Sydney.

Senator MATHESON.—It was repeatedly stated during the debate in the other House that the transfer of the head-quarters of the Government to Sydney during the recess would be justifiable because the Governor-General would be residing there.

Senator DOBSON.—The meetings of the Executive Council would, of course, be held wherever the Governor-General happened to be residing.

Senator MATHESON.—If the Governor-General were residing in Sydney, it would be necessary for the members of the Government who reside out of Sydney to travel there from Melbourne, from Adelaide, from Perth, and from other places to attend them. It would also be necessary for such members of the Ministry as resided permanently in Sydney to have their chief clerks and the heads of departments there to enable them to carry on the business of the country. The honorable and learned senator for Tasmania surely does not suppose that Ministers would live in Melbourne if they had to travel up to Sydney once a week to attend Executive meetings there?

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator think that he can determine where Ministers shall live?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not. But Parliament can put Ministers beyond the temptation of going to live where they have no right to live permanently during their continuance in office, because they are paid their official salaries so that they may attend to the business of the country at the seat of government.

Senator MILLEN.—It is a violation of the Constitution to have the Government offices in Melbourne at all.

Senator MATHESON.—I think that every one will admit that if the Governor-General resides in Sydney, the seat of government will be transferred there. I would have no objection to that if it did not entail upon the Commonwealth a very large and unjustifiable expense. Then, again, no provision is made for the Governor-General's travelling expenses. It is perfectly clear that, if he has to reside in two Government-houses he will, from time to time, have to transfer from one to another, not only himself, his wife, his aides-de-camp, and secretaries, but his entire household, his carriages, his horses, his household linen, and everything that, from an English point of view, makes a home. That would entail great expense, and I ask upon whom is it going to fall? It was admitted only the other day that the States have sent in bills to the Federal Government for the travelling expenses of the last Governor-General, and, to my mind, they received a most contemptible reply. The Federal Government, as I gather, intimated to them that they should send in their bills to Lord Hopetoun. The Government took advantage of the well-known popularity and respect in which that gentleman is held, and of the unfortunate position in which he found himself by reason of their action, to say to the States—"Make yourselves odious throughout Australia by sending in your bills direct to Lord Hopetoun." I may be told that this statement is untrue, but I have seen it in the newspapers, and I have not read any contradiction of it. If the last Governor-General had been unpopular, none of the States would have hesitated for a minute. They would have sent in their bills to him, and he, without the assistance of any allowance, would have had to pay them. Only two reasons have been given for the making of this special provision. One is that the Federal Government have entered into an agreement with the Government of New South Wales to occupy and maintain Government-house, Sydney, for a period of three years from the 1st January, 1901. The agreement appears to have been entered into on the 2nd April, 1902. It seems to have been clenched only a few weeks prior to the departure of the Prime Minister for England, and clenched in such a way that Parliament, up to the very last moment, was prevented from expressing an unbiased opinion in regard to it. No doubt the existence of that arrangement will, and has, influenced a good many votes. Honorable senators will say—"We must support the Executive. The Executive undoubtedly have the right to make agreements of this kind, and they have made this agreement in particular, and, therefore, for the next eighteen months there is a moral, if not a legal, obligation to maintain Sydney Government-house." But here the Government go further than that, and this motion contemplates committing us to Sydney Government-house for another term of five years from the appointment of the next Governor-General. I say it is highly undesirable that that should be done. Let us be content with the fact that we are committed to this extravagance in the way of maintenance for another eighteen months, and leave it at that. Let us pass the amendment that has been proposed, and which I shall support as a protest against the spending of this money. There is no doubt it will have to be spent, but after that it is right that the arrangement should come to a conclusion. The only other reason given for the maintenance of Sydney Government-house is one that was given by the Acting Prime Minister. It was not given in the House of Representatives, and I can, therefore, quote it. It was made during an interview, and was inserted in the newspapers. He said that:—

In the opinion of the Government the importance of the State of New South Wales demanded that the Governor-General should be enabled from time to time to reside in its capital.

That is a reason which has also been submitted here by New South Wales senators and others. The argument is that the importance of New South Wales from the point of view of population and of trade, and from the point of view that it is the oldest of the States, justifies the demand that the Governor-General should reside there. What does it amount to? It amounts to this: The people of New South Wales are desirous of being hospitable to the Governor-General at the expense of the whole community of the Commonwealth.

Senator Major GOULD. — That is incorrect.

Senator MILLEN.—That is a very unfair thing to say when the honorable senator

the Governor-General, and they must maintain it. I am thoroughly in accord with that principle. It is a principle which has been adopted in the United States, in Canada, and in the various States of Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Have they not a White House in every State in America?

Senator MATHESON.—That I do not know, but the entire expense of keeping White House, Washington, in an habitable condition is borne by the Government of the United States, and, in addition, they spend a large sum, amounting in all to something like £21,000 a year, in paying for the President's secretaries, his carriages and horses, the lighting, the stables, the maintenance of the grounds, and the wages of all the permanent servants, President in and President out. That principle must inevitably be recognised by Australia, whether we wish to be economical or lavish. But there is another question involved in this motion, and that is whether it is desirable or necessary that two Government-houses shall be maintained for the next Governor-General. I am emphatically opposed to such unnecessary extravagance, and I desire the Senate to understand that we are touching here merely upon the fringe of the matter. The expenditure of £2,000 a year in maintaining Government-house in Sydney is in itself only a small matter. Its occupation will entail a very large expense upon the Governor-General apart from its maintenance. That fact was recognised when the arrangement was first suggested by the present Minister for Home Affairs, and when the New South Wales Parliament voted £3,700 in view of the proposal that the Governor-General should occupy two houses instead of one. It was also recognised by the present Treasurer when, in the Victorian Parliament, he introduced a Bill to make a similar provision. I intend to allude to these matters more fully later on, because I do not want any senator to ask what are my secret sources of information, or to say that my statements shock his sense of probability. Those remarks were made on a former occasion, when I put my views on a similar matter before the Senate, and, therefore, I propose now to quote my authority for every statement, so that there can be no airy disposal of the facts which I bring forward.

Senator DOBSON.—But even when one has the facts they must be rightly applied.

Senator MATHESON.—I will give the honorable and learned senator the facts, and he will be able to use his own judgment in applying them. The maintenance of a Government-house in Sydney, and the recognition of the principle that the Governor-General should spend the greater part of the parliamentary recess there, will, in the first place, entail a practice which a solid majority of honorable senators have already objected to—the transfer of the head-quarters of the Ministry to Sydney during the recess.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think that the fact that the Governor-General is residing in Sydney for a time will necessitate the transfer of Ministerial departments to Sydney.

Senator MATHESON.—It was repeatedly stated during the debate in the other House that the transfer of the head-quarters of the Government to Sydney during the recess would be justifiable because the Governor-General would be residing there.

Senator DOBSON.—The meetings of the Executive Council would, of course, be held wherever the Governor-General happened to be residing.

Senator MATHESON.—If the Governor-General were residing in Sydney, it would be necessary for the members of the Government who reside out of Sydney to travel there from Melbourne, from Adelaide, from Perth, and from other places to attend them. It would also be necessary for such members of the Ministry as resided permanently in Sydney to have their chief clerks and the heads of departments there to enable them to carry on the business of the country. The honorable and learned senator for Tasmania surely does not suppose that Ministers would live in Melbourne if they had to travel up to Sydney once a week to attend Executive meetings there?

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator think that he can determine where Ministers shall live?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not. But Parliament can put Ministers beyond the temptation of going to live where they have no right to live permanently during their continuance in office, because they are paid their official salaries so that they may attend to the business of the country at the seat of government.

Senator MILLEN.—It is a violation of the Constitution to have the Government offices in Melbourne at all.

Senator MATHESON.—I think that every one will admit that if the Governor-General resides in Sydney, the seat of government will be transferred there. I would have no objection to that if it did not entail upon the Commonwealth a very large and unjustifiable expense. Then, again, no provision is made for the Governor-General's travelling expenses. It is perfectly clear that, if he has to reside in two Government-houses he will, from time to time, have to transfer from one to another, not only himself, his wife, his aides-de-camp, and secretaries, but his entire household, his carriages, his horses, his household linen, and everything that, from an English point of view, makes a home. That would entail great expense, and I ask upon whom is it going to fall? It was admitted only the other day that the States have sent in bills to the Federal Government for the travelling expenses of the last Governor-General, and, to my mind, they received a most contemptible reply. The Federal Government, as I gather, intimated to them that they should send in their bills to Lord Hopetoun. The Government took advantage of the well-known popularity and respect in which that gentleman is held, and of the unfortunate position in which he found himself by reason of their action, to say to the States—"Make yourselves odious throughout Australia by sending in your bills direct to Lord Hopetoun." I may be told that this statement is untrue, but I have seen it in the newspapers, and I have not read any contradiction of it. If the last Governor-General had been unpopular, none of the States would have hesitated for a minute. They would have sent in their bills to him, and he, without the assistance of any allowance, would have had to pay them. Only two reasons have been given for the making of this special provision. One is that the Federal Government have entered into an agreement with the Government of New South Wales to occupy and maintain Government-house, Sydney, for a period of three years from the 1st January, 1901. The agreement appears to have been entered into on the 2nd April, 1902. It seems to have been clenched only a few weeks prior to the departure of the Prime Minister for England, and clenched in such a way that Parliament, up to the very last moment, was prevented from expressing an unbiased opinion in regard to it. No doubt the existence of that arrangement will, and has, influenced a good many votes. Honorable senators will say—"We must support the Executive. The Executive undoubtedly have the right to make agreements of this kind, and they have made this agreement in particular, and, therefore, for the next eighteen months there is a moral, if not a legal, obligation to maintain Sydney Government-house." But here the Government go further than that, and this motion contemplates committing us to Sydney Government-house for another term of five years from the appointment of the next Governor-General. I say it is highly undesirable that that should be done. Let us be content with the fact that we are committed to this extravagance in the way of maintenance for another eighteen months, and leave it at that. Let us pass the amendment that has been proposed, and which I shall support as a protest against the spending of this money. There is no doubt it will have to be spent, but after that it is right that the arrangement should come to a conclusion. The only other reason given for the maintenance of Sydney Government-house is one that was given by the Acting Prime Minister. It was not given in the House of Representatives, and I can, therefore, quote it. It was made during an interview, and was inserted in the newspapers. He said that:—

In the opinion of the Government the importance of the State of New South Wales demanded that the Governor-General should be enabled from time to time to reside in its capital.

That is a reason which has also been submitted here by New South Wales senators and others. The argument is that the importance of New South Wales from the point of view of population and of trade, and from the point of view that it is the oldest of the States, justifies the demand that the Governor-General should reside there. What does it amount to? It amounts to this: The people of New South Wales are desirous of being hospitable to the Governor-General at the expense of the whole community of the Commonwealth.

Senator Major GOULD. — That is incorrect.

Senator MILLEN.—That is a very unfair thing to say when the honorable senator knows that New South Wales has offered to provide the money.

Senator MATHESON.—It is, no doubt, a fact that the New South Wales Parliament did vote a certain sum of money, and I propose to deal with that later on in tracing the sequence of events by which Sydney Government-house is sought to be foisted upon the Commonwealth. In passing, as the question has cropped up, I will point out that when Government-house in Sydney was forced upon the Commonwealth, the approbation of the Colonial-office was sought to be obtained for the transaction. The Colonial-office pointed out that if the proposal was carried through, the Governor-General's salary would have to be increased by £10,000. That was an increased cost, according to the then estimate of £3,700 for New South Wales, and the Parliament of that State was at the time only voting their per capita proportion of the total sum which their change of programme had entailed, when they voted the £3,700. They were not voting the whole amount required. They were doing no more than it is proposed they shall do now under the existing state of affairs. If we vote this £2,000, the people of New South Wales will be bearing as their per capita proportion of the sum required, a sum equivalent to the £3,700 they previously agreed to vote as their proportion of the £10,000, which it was then estimated would be necessary. Therefore, I say, with all due respect to Senators Millen and Gould, that I am not grossly unfair in saying that the Federal Government desire that the people of New South Wales should be put into the position of being hospitable at the expense of the Commonwealth. If the people of New South Wales were to set up this claim to residence in that State by the Governor-General, and the State Government were to say that the extra expense would amount to £3,700, and as that sum had already been voted, and was capable of being exercised for the purpose, they would supply a Government-house free of expense to the Governor-General by using this money for the purpose, I should have nothing to say against it if the other States were prepared to do the same. That, I maintain, is the proper course for the States to adopt if they wish the Governor-General to take up his residence with them, not permanently, but for any length of time. They should supply the Governor-General with a complete equipment in the city at which they wish him to stop. They should be open-handed in their hospitality; they should provide house equipment, carriages, horses and servants, so that he would need only to get into a railway carriage with his staff and go to the place provided for him, and enter into residence. I should have nothing to say against that.

Senator DAWSON. — Why should they, when they can get other people to do it for them?

Senator MATHESON.—I am objecting that we should be called upon to make this provision. I have stated the only other reason given for this procedure, and I say that none of the reasons given will hold water. If the people of New South Wales desire to have this residence maintained for the Governor-General, let them keep it up at their own cost, and invite the Governor-General to go and stop there whenever he thinks fit. That would be a most proper arrangement, one at which nobody could cavil, and one which would agree at any rate with my views, and I do not see why it should not meet with the acceptance of everybody else. The question now arises as to how it is we find ourselves in this position? It is a most interesting question when one comes to dig into it, and find out what happened, and the extent to which some people have changed their views since the Federal Government have come into power. The matter starts possibly with the meeting of the Premiers in Melbourne, in January or February, 1899. They then met, as will be in the memory of every honorable senator, and slightly amended the Constitution upon which the referendum was going to be taken. They arranged that the future capital of the Commonwealth should be in New South Wales, but not within 100 miles of Sydney. That arrangement met with the approbation of Mr. Reid, but during the course of the ensuing year 1900, Mr. Reid went out of power in New South Wales. Subject to correction, I should say it was about November, 1900, that Mr. Reid went out of office, and Sir William Lyne succeeded him. It is impossible to say absolutely what happened then, because the papers which have been supplied to another place, and which deal with the correspondence which took place between Sir William Lyne and Mr. Chamberlain, have not been supplied to honorable senators. I believe the papers supplied elsewhere were not very ample and did not give all the information that could be desired. At all events it is a fact that during 1900, Sir William Lyne found himself in communication with Mr. Chamberlain on the question of this Government-house. The first date we have before us is in July, when Lord Beauchamp sent a most extraordinary telegram to Mr. Chamberlain, at the instigation of Sir William Lyne. The message was more or less to this effect—

Lyne is anxious to have your permission to state that you desire Barton to inquire where the Governor-General should reside, and that in answer to your request, Prime Ministers of federated colonies consulted, are agreed to New South Wales.

Here we have a most remarkable condition of affairs. We have Sir William Lyne desirous of suggesting to Mr. Chamberlain the style of despatch he should send to Australia. I desire honorable senators particularly to note this, because so much stress has been laid upon the style of the despatches which Mr. Chamberlain has sent to Australia. The other day, when talking upon a cognate subject, I maintained, as I maintain now, that these despatches did not proceed from Mr. Chamberlain, nor were they sent by his initiation at all, but to a large extent at the instigation of Sir William Lyne. It may be said that I cannot prove it. Of course I cannot prove it; but any person who reads the correspondence, and studies the whole question with an unbiased mind, must come to the conclusion that in this case Mr. Chamberlain's despatches were instigated and inspired by Sir William Lyne, and that, dealing with this particular question, of course, Mr. Chamberlain is not to blame for the tone of despatches which in some measure have given offence to the people of Australia.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator suggesting that Mr. Chamberlain was a puppet in the hands of Sir William Lyne?

Senator MATHESON.—I suggest that Sir William Lyne asked through the Governor of New South Wales that Mr. Chamberlain should send out a despatch of a certain character; that he suggested the tenor and even almost the phraseology of the despatch which he desired to have sent.

Senator DAWSON. — Mr. Chamberlain trusted a false guide.

Senator MATHESON. — He suffered from the belief, as I have said before, that Sir William Lyne was representing the feeling of Australia. When I made that statement on a previous occasion, honorable senators characterized it as absurd, but I assure them that it is the fact. On the 16th July Mr. Chamberlain replied to Lord Beauchamp, as follows :—

Governor-General will be sworn in, and the Commonwealth inaugurated, at Sydney, and if other colonies have agreed to his mainly residing there during recess, His Majesty's Government will not object, subject, of course, to the decision of the Federal Administration.

Here we come to the next point. Mr. Chamberlain had been led to believe that the other States agreed. I say that was absolutely untrue, because the other States had not agreed. It has been denied over and over again that the Premiers of the States had ever discussed this question. I therefore feel justified in making the statement that it is untrue to say that the other States had agreed, basing that statement, of course, on the statements that have been made by representatives of the Government in the Senate and in another place. The Premiers did not discuss this question, and there was no authority for saying that the other States had agreed. That explains to a very large extent the nature of the despatches from Mr. Chamberlain with which we were dealing the other day. That brings us up to the time when Sir William Lyne met his Parliament in New South Wales in 1900. I find from the New South Wales Hansard for 2nd November, 1900, page 4715, that he was dealing with a Bill for the expenses of the Commonwealth celebrations in Sydney, and amongst other things that cropped up was this question of where the Governor-General was to reside. We have Sir William Lyne reported as having made the following statement :—

We should have the Governor-General, and he would, no doubt, entertain largely.

I desire that that should be particularly underlined in the minds of honorable senators, because I shall refer to it again.

By-and-by he would submit some provision for an allowance for the Governor-General in reference to the entertainment His Excellency would give.

Mr. MAHONY.—Will he reside here permanently?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. He had not had an easy task in bringing that about.

Further debate ensued, and Mr. Meagher warned the Government not to go ahead too fast. I shall not quote more, because I think it is not worth while to do so, and honorable senators may, if they think it necessary, refer to the New South Wales Hansard. Mr. Meagher saw at once that the Government were rather anticipating events, and he pointed out that Sir William Lyne had no justification for saying that the Governor-General would reside in Sydney; that there was no provision for anything of the sort made in the Federal Constitution; and that Sir William Lyne had to depend on the Federal Government when it met for any such arrangement. For all that, Sir William Lyne went ahead, and, as we find to-day, he has weaved such a cunning web that it is very difficult to break it and restore the matter to its proper position. A little later, on the 30th November, 1900, as honorable senators will find on reference to the New South Wales Hansard, at page 6227, Sir William Lyne, in introducing the very Bill to which Senators Gould and Millen have alluded, for the payment of an additional £10,000 to the Governor-General, said—

This is a Bill to make provision for the expenses of the Governor-General. I have had a fairly heavy fight to get the Governor-General's residence permanently established here, but a request has been made by the Colonial-office that the colonies shall pay £10,000 towards his expenses.

Here we have a definite statement. Sir William Lyne bent upon securing what, from the point of view of the people of Sydney generally, was a very laudable object, had expressly—

Senator DOBSON.—Is not the honorable senator making too much of Sir William Lyne?

Senator MATHESON.—No. If it were Sir Thomas Jones, it would be just the same to me.

Senator MILLEN.—Sir William Lyne is to the honorable senator what King Charles' head was to a celebrated petitioner.

Senator MATHESON.—That is an altogether uncalled-for remark. There may be a certain amount of justification for the complaint; but can I avoid Sir William Lyne in this matter? I have not unnecessarily dragged him into the controversy. He was Premier of New South Wales when he introduced these measures, and I cannot deal with this subject without referring to him. If I could refer to him as "Snooks," or by some other name, I should willingly do so, in order to avoid the impression which some honorable senators evidently entertain that I have some private animosity against Sir William Lyne. I have not.

Senator BARRETT.—We are very much indebted to the honorable senator for the light which he has thrown upon this matter.

Senator MATHESON.—I desire to know with whom Sir William Lyne engaged in the "fairly heavy fight" to which he referred? Obviously he was fighting people who were responsible to the States. They were the only people with whom he could have had to fight. Those who are to-day responsible for the Government case were at that time Premiers of the different States, and although Senator O'Connor will no doubt tell us that it is all bunkum, I can prove that this proposal was opposed by the very gentlemen who, as members of the Federal Government, are now supporting it. Before they joined the Federal Government, they knew that it was wrong, and they fought it with great bitterness. Sir William Lyne overcame their opposition, only with the assistance of Mr. Chamberlain, who, as I have said, was being misled by him. He came out of this fight triumphantly, only upon the condition imposed by the Colonial Office, in the interests of future Governors-General, that the Governor-General's salary of £10,000 per annum should be supplemented by £5,000 per annum for expenses. That, however, is merely a side issue, to which I need make no further reference at this stage. I shall deal with it at some later period, for I can prove the correctness of my assertion. The Governor-General's salary was also to be supplemented by an additional £10,000 per annum. As we have seen from the printed despatches laid on the table of the Senate, Mr. Chamberlain pointed out exactly what I have contended from the first, that a second Government-house would entail additional expense not only upon the Commonwealth, but upon the Governor-General. He was indifferent as to the expenditure which the Commonwealth might incur, for he recognised that it was a matter with which the Commonwealth alone had to deal. But he had to find a Governor-General, and to say to him, as he would have to say to-morrow to a gentleman whom it was proposed to appoint—"We expect you to spend portion of your term of office in Sydney. In order that that desire may be carried out, the Federal Government have provided a Government-house there as well as in Melbourne. They have undertaken to pay for the cost of caretakers, maintenance, grounds, insurance, telephones, postal charges, china and glass, and flags in connexion with the Sydney residence, and you are expected to live there for portion of the year. You are expected to move your establishment from house to house." When Mr. Chamberlain found himself compelled to give an instruction to Lord Hopetoun to that effect, he wired out at once—"It is impossible to expect a Governor-General to keep up two establishments for the proposed salary of £10,000 per annum." From what I know of the up-keep of such establishments, I feel satisfied that Mr. Chamberlain's view was amply justified. Honorable senators who live in small establishments, like my own, have no idea of the contingent expenses in connexion with the up-keep of an establishment like that which the Governor-General is required to maintain. Nor have they any idea of the enormous expense involved in removing from one house to the other, and keeping up two establishments. It is all very well for Senator Ewing who, like myself, lives in a little cottage, to say that what is saved in one house can be saved in another; but it is impossible to avoid great expense.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Hear, hear.

Senator MATHESON.—Senator Sargood, who has a big house of his own, can support my assertion. Those who live in palaces in England know what it means to maintain separate establishments and to move from one to the other. Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hopetoun knew what it meant, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies indorsed Lord Hopetoun's contention that £10,000 per annum would at the most be sufficient to cover only his expenses for one residence. I will now leave Sir William Lyne and come to Mr. Suttor, who was apparently the leader of the Government in the New South Wales Legislative Council at the time in question. In introducing the Bill in the Upper House he was much more emphatic than was Sir William Lyne, and his remarks, which are those of a gentleman whom I do not know, may be listened to with a great deal of attention. They are to be found reported in the New South Wales

Hansard of 4th December, 1900. Speaking as a Government representative, this is what he said—

A good deal of correspondence has passed between the Colonial-office in England and this Government respecting the position of the Governor-General as regards the colonies, and it has been pointed out that, although the Commonwealth Act provides that the salary of the Governor-General shall be £10,000, if the Governments expect the Governor-General to move from one place to another a further sum will be necessary to meet the increased expenses to which the Governor-General would necessarily be put. This Bill is brought in practically in pursuance of an agreement come to between the Home Government and the Government of this country.

I hope I shall not be out of order in pointing out that, although it has been denied that there was any agreement, Mr. Suttor, a member of the State Government, frankly admitted, at a time when there was no question involved, that there was an agreement between the Government of New South Wales and the Colonial-office, that a further sum of £10,000 per year should be provided. It was under that distinct agreement that Lord Hopetoun came to Australia. Mr. Suttor continued—

If we contribute this amount towards the extra expenses the Governor-General will be put to in visiting one colony and another, it will induce him to stay here.

That was the inducement for which the £10,000 was to be provided by the whole of Australia. I desire to emphasize this point, as an answer to the statement made by Senator Gould and Senator Millen in regard to the vote of £3,700. That is only a portion. Mr. Suttor went on to say—

It must not be forgotten that we have arranged that Government-house shall be placed at his disposal as a residence, and therefore this money will be necessary to defray the cost of keeping up that establishment. In view of the fact that we are going to have the Governor-General here, if we are anxious to make him comfortable, and smooth his way as far as possible, it is not asking the House to consent to an unreasonable thing in agreeing to the Bill now submitted.

I quite agree that it was not unreasonable. It was eminently reasonable, and if the Government had been successful in carrying their proposal, all would have been well. But they were not, and the whole of this trouble arises from that point. What was the attitude taken up by the people of New South Wales? What do they really expect now? We have been told that they do not care twopence whether the Governor-General resides in Sydney or not. I believe that is so. This is not a movement on the part of the country, and I wish to say that my opposition to it is not inspired by any animosity towards Sydney. As a matter of fact I prefer Sydney as a place of residence, just as the Governor-General would no doubt prefer it. As showing what was the feeling of the people when this Bill was before the State Legislature, I wish to quote an expression of opinion contained in a letter from Sydney written by a Mr. Gullett, and published in the Argus of 8th December, 1900—

Sir William Lyne got so far astray as to give solemn assurances the other day to the House (New South Wales) that he had made arrangements that the Governor-General should permanently reside in Sydney. This declaration was greeted as highly satisfactory. But one looks in vain in the Commonwealth Constitution for the clause which gives power to the Premier of New South Wales to arrange where the Governor-General is to permanently reside. And there is much to suggest that as soon as the Federal Premier is appointed, one of his first tasks will be to disabuse the State Premier here of his belief in the possession of a kind of a semi-proprietorial interest in the Governor-General.

I have no doubt that Mr. Gullett's forecast would have been amply borne out but for the fact that Sir Edmund Barton, a gentleman from New South Wales, hand and glove with Sir William Lyne, was appointed Prime Minister. Those two honorable gentlemen being at one in the matter, we find ourselves in this position: that the Senate is partly committed to the maintenance of Government-house, Sydney, for another term of eighteen months. Many of us are placed in the invidious position of having to vote for an amendment, although we believe—at all events I do—that this deals with a matter in which it is undesirable that we should have a dissentient voice. It would have been far better if it could have been avoided; but we are forced to vote in opposition to the grafting of a second Government-house upon the Constitution. In my review of this transaction, I have now got away from Sydney, and reached a stage at which other States became involved. It had been arranged that a Bill should be submitted in each of the State Parliaments to give effect to the proposal to increase the Governor-General's allowance by £10,000 per annum; and Sir George Turner, who was then Premier and Treasurer of Victoria, introduced a Bill in the State Assembly to provide for Victoria's contribution. In the Victorian Hansard for the 20th December, 1900, Sir George Turner is reported to have spoken as follows in introducing that measure:—

At the time that Act (the Commonwealth Act) was passed it was anticipated that the Governor-General would reside in one place, and have one establishment.

I would ask honorable senators to remember that Sir George Turner is now one of Senator O'Connor's colleagues—a member of the present Government, who are supposed to be fathering this proposal.

Senator MILLEN.—He did not indicate in what place the Governor-General was to reside.

Senator MATHESON.—No; but he stated that the Constitution contemplated only one. Does Senator Millen contend that we should not have a Government-house where Parliament meets?

Senator MILLEN.—I say that the residence of the Governor-General in Melbourne goes beyond the Constitution.

Senator MATHESON.—Then the honorable and learned senator is beyond argument. The only deduction to be drawn from his interjection is that he believes that we should not have a residence for the Governor-General in Melbourne, and if the majority of the Senate agree with him, I shall have been speaking in vain. It stands to reason that the only Government-house should be in Melbourne. There must be a residence for the Governor-General here, because Parliament meets in Melbourne. Sir George Turner went on to say—

His permanent residence appears, by some arrangement, to have been fixed in Sydney.

Sir George Turner expressed his surprise—I think that is a fair construction to put on his remark—that this arrangement should have been made. He was not a party to it; he did not know of it. He evidently anticipated that the Governor-General's residence would be in Melbourne. But he says the Federal Government were committed—that was in December, 1900, before there was a Federal Government.

Under these circumstances it is thought that it is unfair to ask the Governor-General on a salary of £10,000 per annum to keep up a second establishment.

He, therefore, proposed that Victoria should vote her quota of the allowance of £10,000, in order that His Excellency might keep up a second establishment—in Sydney. I wish to impress upon the Senate that Government-house in Sydney is going to entail, according to Sir William Lyne, Sir

George Turner, and their colleagues in office in both New South Wales and Victoria, a large additional expenditure on the Governor-General for which we are making no provision, and for which, I say without any possibility of contradiction, we do not intend to make any provision, because we are opposed to any increased expenditure in that direction. Sir George Turner went on to say—

There was apparently a good deal of correspondence between the home authorities and the New South Wales Government on this subject. Circumstances have arisen which were not in the minds of those framing the Constitution, and it becomes necessary for the colonies individually to say to what extent they are prepared to go in assisting to bear the expense of the second establishment. Can we expect him to keep up two establishments when he only gets paid for one. Is it fair to expect him to keep an establishment in Sydney as he has to do, and also to keep an establishment in Melbourne on the one pay?

That question was put by a member of the Federal Government who is not proposing to increase the pay of His Excellency.

When the federal capital is established and the Governor-General has one establishment to keep up, the Bill will fall through.

It is perfectly clear that it was not the intention of those who were at the head of affairs in the States, prior to December, 1900, that there should be two Government-houses, or, in fact, anything but one Government-house where the Parliament met. What happened next? A Prime Minister was appointed, and, as we all know, the Cabinet met and discussed this vote which had been made in New South Wales, and although they knew perfectly well that the Governor-General could not keep up two establishments on the one pay, they decided to recommend His Excellency not to accept the additional remuneration in the way in which it was proposed to be given to him from New South Wales, and I think they were right. I do not think that His Excellency could have properly accepted an increase of salary from any one State, but I submit that if the Government had had the least glimmer of common sense, they would have suggested to the Government of New South Wales that the Government-house in Sydney should be kept up by that State for the purpose of entertaining His Excellency whenever he chose to visit that city. They should have let drop this idea that it was to be an official residence. They should have been prepared to hospitably receive His Excellency as a guest whenever he chose to visit that city. With this vote of £3,500 they were in a position to say to him, as they might say to his successor if we refused to sanction this vote of £2,000—"Here is a Government-house in which your Excellency can reside whenever you like to come here. There are servants, grooms, horses, carriages, harness, lighting, everything that may be required, whenever it suits you to come, and we shall be pleased to welcome you." If they had done that, nobody would have had the least objection to raise, and the matter would not be in the position in which it is. It must not be supposed that even this additional £10,000, which was to have been voted by the States, was really, in the opinion of the Colonial Office, sufficient, because it was not. It appears that for the use of the Convention an estimate of the cost of the new services of the Federal Government was drawn up by the gentleman who was chairman of its Finance Committee, and who is now Speaker of the House of Representatives. In that scale of expenditure a provision of £5,000 was made, on the Victorian rate, for Government-house in Melbourne alone—practically what is now contemplated to be done with the £3,000. This sum of £5,000 appeared in the papers which were laid before the Convention, and was afterwards, according to Mr. Barton's admission, in the hands of Mr. Chamberlain as part of the public provision to be made by the Commonwealth towards the expenses of the office, and was undoubtedly in his mind as one which would be made when he insisted upon the further sum of £10,000 being provided. I wish the Senate to bear in mind that when the matter was first discussed, Mr. Chamberlain considered that £25,000 a year would have to be provided for keeping up Government-house in Melbourne and enabling the Governor-General to reside at Melbourne and Sydney. I do not say that he was right, nor do I say that the Commonwealth is in any sense bound to that view. What I wish the Senate to remember is that, in the opinion of those who had to find a Governor-General £25,000 a year, was approximately the sum which His Excellency would require to have at his disposal if he was going to do his business properly with two Government-houses. Mr. Chamberlain cannot go out into the street and pick up a Governor-General at every corner. These are matters which have to be arranged. He has to find a suitable person. We do not want a nincompoop to come out here, and I think that the country would sooner have a person of intelligence than a person of wealth—I know that I should. I should like to see the Governor-General's position placed on such a sound foundation that Mr. Chamberlain could choose a man of the highest intelligence available, not necessarily a man to whom money is no object, because very often when we get such a man he is of no use for the purpose for which he is wanted. In my opinion we want for Governor-General a man of capacity, and not necessarily a rich man; and the provision for his establishment ought to be made in such a way that he has not necessarily to trench on his private resources. I submit emphatically that if the Senate, or the House of Representatives, or the Parliament, is to settle the matter in this off-hand manner, as if it were merely assenting to £2,000 of Commonwealth expenditure—if we are to throw on the Governor-General the responsibility of living in two Government-houses, and of going from place to place, undoubtedly we shall have either to increase his salary or to accept a man whose wealth is his only recommendation, and that is a thing which I deprecate most strongly.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I hardly like to intervene in the debate on this well-worn subject, but I desire respectfully to enter my protest against two or three opinions which have been expressed by various honorable senators. It appears to me that the Government did what they were practically compelled to do, and had any other set of men been in office I believe that they would have felt compelled to do exactly the same. I consider that Senator Matheson, as I said by interjection, has made rather too much of what Sir William Lyne has done. When that honorable gentleman was Premier of New South Wales, and was rightfully and politically trying to do the best he could for the State which he helped to govern—

Senator MATHESON.—But we should not be bound by that now.

Senator DOBSON. — Quite so. The honorable senator will see that what Sir William Lyne told the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales he had arranged to be done has not come to pass, because the Governor-General has not resided permanently in the mother State, and when he does go to reside there permanently, it will be quite time enough for the Senate to protest. It appears to me that Mr. Chamberlain practically decided that the Governor-General should land at Sydney, and take up his residence there at the commencement of the inauguration of the Commonwealth. The Ministers of the day would have been blamed, and rightly blamed, had they not provided Lord Hopetoun with proper and sufficient accommodation, and when the Government of New South Wales placed their very charming Government-house and grounds at the service of the Commonwealth, it was the duty of Ministers, I think, to accept the offer—paying no interest or rent, but simply paying for the up-keep of the establishment. I do not at all agree with those honorable senators who say, in a fit of economy, which we all wish to practice, but which we wish to practice in a proper way, that the Governor-General must of necessity have only one residence. Senator Matheson, who has gone into this matter most clearly, and put his case most skilfully, has rather forgotten that the foundation of all his arguments is wrong; that is to say, he forgets that in the past the State Governors have been provided with practically two residences. When it is remembered that the Governor-General is expected to visit each State—and he ought to do so at suitable times—it seems to me to be drawing the line altogether too narrowly to say that there must be only one Government-house. I do not at all agree with the argument that every State has an equal right to the residence of the Governor-General there.

Senator HIGGS.—No one said that.

Senator DOBSON.—One honorable senator did use some words to that effect.

Senator MATHESON.—So every State has, I maintain.

Senator DOBSON.—I differ respectfully from my honorable and clear-headed friend. Take my own State. When the Governor-General came to Hobart, as he did for several weeks last summer, what did he do? He was brought in contact with 30,000 persons, and perhaps most of them saw him. When he goes to Sydney he is brought in contact with 350,000 persons. Does any one mean to tell me that His Excellency is bound to spend an hour among 30,000 persons for every hour which he spends among a third of the total population of the Commonwealth? It is idle to say that Western Australia or Tasmania has the same right, if there is a right about the matter, to the residence of the Governor-General, as have the larger States? We have heard a little about the climatic conditions of the various States, but I make bold to say that if Lord Hopetoun had continued to reside in Melbourne, it would have been absolutely necessary for him, for the sake of his health, to spend the winter, or a part of it, in Sydney or Brisbane, or some warmer climate than this. Although our next Governor-General may be a much stronger man, some of the members of his family may not be able to stand the severe winter in Melbourne, and it may be necessary for them to seek change of air. Are we to deny to our Governor-General the same privileges and rights that have been extended to States Governors for half a century? Are we going to prevent him from going into the country or into another State for a change of air? If not, how are we to offer this facility? Although I do not go the length of saying that a residence should be provided for His Excellency the Governor-General in each State—because he would not have time to occupy them—I contend that, wherever the capital may be, we should have some sort of residence for the Governor-General in the two largest States of the Commonwealth. Senator De Largie stated that when the federal capital was established it would be claimed on behalf of Melbourne that the Governor-General ought to occupy an official residence there during a certain portion of the year. Supposing that we do—I hope that we shall not—build the federal capital at Bombala or Tumut, will the Governor-General be supposed to reside in a capital carved out of the bush, which will for some time be a mere village? Will he not be allowed to visit the great centres of population? Such an idea would be perfectly monstrous; and if the people of Melbourne intimated that they expected the Governor-General to reside in Victoria for a few weeks each year, and offered to place Government-house at his disposal, would honorable senators say that they were asking for more than they were entitled to?

Senator MATHESON.—Yes, if the Commonwealth were expected to pay the expenses.

Senator DOBSON.—The idea of gathering, from the various States, upon a population basis, contributions aggregating £10,000 per annum in order to meet the expenses incurred by the Governor-General in visiting the various States was a very good one. New South Wales went so far as to pass an Act providing for her share of that sum. It was acknowledged that if the people of Sydney were to derive the benefit of the entertainments, large or small, given by the Governor-General they should be prepared to pay for it. Victoria, however, refused to vote the necessary money, and the scheme fell to the ground. The very fact, however, that such a scheme was initiated and carried to a certain length shows that some people recognise, as I do, that if the Governor-General is to be expected to travel about from State to State—and no Governor-General can move without spending a considerable sum of money—we shall have to increase his salary beyond £10,000 per annum. The only question is what is the right way to do this? No one can blame the Government for having undertaken to maintain Government-house, Sydney, for three years. They were obliged to accommodate his Excellency in Sydney at the time of the inauguration of the Commonwealth, and they did right to accept the offer of the New South Wales Government, placing Government-house at His Excellency's disposal. It is perfectly idle to try now to defeat this motion, because, if the amendment were carried, we should still have to incur the cost involved in maintaining Government-house at Sydney.

Senator MATHESON. — For eighteen months.

Senator DOBSON.—We have used Government-house, Sydney, as a residence for His Excellency the Governor-General, and having done so, we must carry out the arrangement entered into. If we adopt the amendment, it will place us in a humiliating and stupid position. I do not propose to enter at any length into the vexed question where the federal capital should be, or when it should be established.

Senator HIGGS. — The honorable and learned senator said it should be at Bombala.

Senator DOBSON.—I said nothing of the kind. What I did say was that I hoped that the establishment of the federal capital would be deferred for some years, because I should regard it as absolutely criminal and wicked for us to make any attempt to establish a federal capital until after the expiration of the book-keeping period. If we are to delay the establishment of the federal capital, as I think we must, if we have any common sense, the fact that we have residences for His Excellency the Governor-General, in Sydney as well as in Melbourne, will help us to carry out that idea without running the risk of engendering ill-feeling between the States. We should then be able to do the parent State some justice.

Senator MILLEN.—Some justice?—some pretence of justice!

Senator DOBSON.—The whole question of justice does not depend upon our beginning to lay the foundation of a federal capital in New South Wales at a time when we should be most concerned in settling the principles of government and putting our affairs in order. I say again, that the maintenance of establishments for His Excellency the Governor-General, in both Sydney and Melbourne, will assist us to consider in a proper and statesmanlike spirit the great question where the capital is to be.

Senator MATHESON.—How does the honorable and learned senator suggest that the increased expenses incurred by His Excellency in maintaining two establishments should be met?

Senator DOBSON.—I have already said that we cannot expect the Governor-General to visit all the States of the Commonwealth without making some further contribution towards his expenses.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator admits that we must give him something more.

Senator DOBSON.—Yes, freely. The honorable senator also seems to think that the expenses of the Governor-General whilst he is travelling should be paid, because he said that if the States Governments had rendered accounts for the railway travelling expenses of His Excellency the Governor-General within their respective territories, they would have made themselves odious. The honorable senator admits that if the Governor-General is travelling about, his expenses must be paid by some one. If the next Governor-General happens to be a quietly disposed man, he will probably be satisfied to settle down at Melbourne, and go nowhere and do nothing, but that is not what we expect of our Governors-General. Senator Higgs does not appear to realize the conditions under which he lives. He devoted a great part of his speech to an endeavour to pick to pieces a Constitution which is the pride of the world. He seems to have forgotten that the British Constitution is so splendidly balanced between the Crown and the people that it works more smoothly than any other he can name. The honorable senator referred in sneering terms to the Governor-General being a mere mouthpiece, but I would point out to him that His Excellency might have withheld his assent to the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill and other measures of a similar kind, and that if we go much further with such vagaries the next Governor-General may exercise his right in this direction. It is idle for the honorable senator to attempt to pick to pieces the Constitution under which we are proud to live. Senator Stewart seems to pass his nights in coining phrases, and his days in delivering himself of them in this chamber. The honorable member referred to certain persons who basked in the sunshine of Vice-Royalty, and were never satisfied unless they were crawling on their bellies before some potentate whom they considered to be better than themselves. If my honorable friend is not in love with the aristocracy of to-day, let me remind him that there is such a thing as an aristocracy of labour. There are men who climb up the ladder—whether the social or the industrial ladder—and form the aristocracy of their class, and who are proud of it, and exact respect from their fellow men. Those who do not cultivate their minds and regulate their lives cannot expect to attain to these high levels, and it is futile to argue in the way in which the honorable senator did, as if all classes should be merged into one mass, and that there should be no distinctions between the highest and the lowest. The Governor-General, as the representative of the Crown, is entitled to our fullest respect. The King had five residences. He has recently given up one to philanthropic purposes, but he still has four. To confine our Governor-General to one residence would place the whole of our arrangements upon too narrow a basis. I shall certainly vote for the motion.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—As far as the retention of Government-house in New South Wales is concerned, it means nothing to me, and I venture to say that it means very little to a large majority of the electors of my State—viewed entirely from the personal stand-point. There is one alleged reason which can have no possible weight with them. It has been stated that an attempt is being made to retain a residence for the Governor-General in Sydney on account of the money circulated by His Excellency when he is residing there. I repudiate that idea altogether.

Senator HIGGS.—That was said by Senator Gould.

Senator MILLEN.—What I am referring to was stated by Senator De Largie. It would be utterly unworthy of any honorable senator to suppose that the representatives of any State would advocate anything they did not otherwise believe to be correct, merely with a view to secure the expenditure of a few thousand pounds amongst the electors of their State. New South Wales would feel, as I do, most indignant if it were suggested that it was desired that the Governor-General should reside in Sydney merely for the sake of the few pounds the residents might make out of it.

Senator HIGGS.—Why does New South Wales want to have the Governor-General in Sydney?

Senator MILLEN.—I shall tell the honorable senator, not why we want the Governor-General to be in Sydney, but why we have a right to his presence there. We cannot help recognising one very pleasant result that has been brought about by the presentation of this motion to the Senate. It appears to have acted as a kind of magic panacea, and to have brought about the instant restoration to health of Senator Matheson. Coming from a bed of illness, he has given us an evidence of his complete restoration to mental energy and bodily vigour, which we are all delighted to see. I desire to mention the reasons why I intend to support the motion. If honorable senators will allow me to say so, it seems to me that they entirely misunderstand the position. I quite agree with those who urge that there is no absolute necessity for a second residence for the Governor-General, but the question is, where should the one residence be?

Senator BARRETT.—At the seat of Government.

Senator MILLEN.—I shall deal with that point presently. The people of New South Wales do not think that the federation is making any concession in allowing the Governor-General to reside in New South Wales. They consider that the boot is on the other foot, and that they are making a concession when the Governor-General leaves New South Wales officially. Whether that view is right or wrong I wish honorable senators—believing that they desire to maintain friendly feelings between the States—to consider the frame of mind of the people of New South Wales when they accepted the present Constitution. They were told by the Vice-President of the Executive Council—not as a candidate seeking election at the hands of the people, but as the legal adviser of the Government—that the seat of government could not under the Constitution be fixed outside of New South Wales.

Senator BARRETT.—There were other authorities who differed from him.

Senator MILLEN.—That may be so. I do not wish to put myself up in opposition to an expert legal adviser like Senator O'Connor. The point is that it was with the knowledge of that opinion that the people of New South Wales accepted the Constitution, and it is also with the knowledge of that opinion that they view the debate here to-day. What did Senator O'Connor say then. He said—

The fixing of the seat of Government even temporarily—

I desire Senator Barrett's special attention to this.

Senator BARRETT.—Lawyers give opinions that will please their clients every time.

Senator MILLEN.—There is no necessity to argue that point with the honorable senator. That excuse may suit him, but I ask him to consider the belief which animated the people of New South Wales when they accepted the Constitution, and to put himself in the position of persons who, having entered into the union upon the understanding that certain things would be granted, find that an attempt is being made to filch something from them.

Senator BARRETT.—Was the vote given solely on the ground referred to by the honorable senator?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator knows as well as I do that that vote in Sydney was the turning point in connexion with the success of the whole scheme. The Vice-President of the Executive Council said—

To fix the seat of government even temporarily outside New South Wales would be as much a breach of the Constitution as to fix it permanently outside New South Wales.

He went on to say—

For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that under no circumstances can the Federal Executive, or any other authority, legally fix the seat of the Government of the Commonwealth outside New South Wales.

Whether that opinion was right or not, it certainly was accepted by the people of New South Wales as being right; and in the belief that it was right they voted for the Constitution—a Constitution which told them that the seat of government and the residence of the Governor-General were to be within New South Wales. They were to be outside the 100 miles, but still within the territory of New South Wales. But what happened? The people having accepted the Constitution in that belief, it was discovered later on, as pointed out by Senator Matheson, that at the time the Bill was framed many things were not foreseen. It was discovered that it would be an extremely inconvenient thing to keep the Governor-General away from the place where the Parliament of the Commonwealth was sitting. That was clearly recognised; and there is not a single man in New South Wales who, recognising the exigencies of the situation, would, for one moment, object to the Governor-General living in Melbourne during the time Parliament was sitting here, although they know that, according to the view of the Vice-President of the Executive Council, it would be an illegality for him to do so. As I say, New South Wales people do not object, because the practical requirements of the situation demand that the Governor-General shall live in Melbourne while Parliament is located here. But they think, nevertheless, that they are entitled to have the Governor-General living in their midst during such times as the sittings of Parliament in Melbourne do not require his presence here. But what has resulted from that? We now know that it is claimed as a right that the Governor-General shall live in Melbourne—that it is quite right that he shall live out of New South Wales. There is not a single word in the Constitution to justify that contention. Therefore, we are not asking for a concession when we ask that the official residence of the Governor-General shall be in our State. It is a right that is conferred upon us by the Constitution, and it is a concession on our part to allow the official residence of the Governor-General to be temporarily in Melbourne. I do not believe that the people in New South Wales as a whole care very much where the Governor-General officially resides. They like to see him, I have no doubt; they show that every time he visits their State. But there is another reason why the Senate should carry this resolution. Honorable senators have had ample evidence this afternoon of an attempt which will be made sooner or later to delay the settlement of the question of the selection of the capital site. Now, there has grown up in New South Wales—I am not concerned with whether this feeling is ill or well founded, but only with the truth that it exists; I am simply relating facts—and it is a fact that in New South Wales to-day there is a strong belief that the provisions of the Constitution dealing with the allocation of the capital in that State will sooner or later be pushed aside. We have had a suggestion this afternoon that the Constitution, if it is not to be violated, should at least be suspended in that particular.

Senator STYLES.—Not from a Victorian senator, remember.

Senator MILLEN.—But we have it every week from the Victorian journals. Scarcely a week goes by without the two great journals of Victoria putting forward a plea for the breaking of that provision of the Constitution. The Argus has got to such a stage that it regularly scoffs at the idea of what it calls a “bush capital.” If we can judge from the attitude of the Victorian press, these views are put forward as a threat, and there is a feeling on the part of the people of this State against the carrying out of the provision of the Constitution.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Then they do not represent Victorian opinion.

Senator MILLEN.—I am very pleased to hear that remark from Senator Sargood. I am not concerned just now with the question whether the view that has been put forward is generally entertained in Victoria; but I ask whether in the face of these views which are urged, any one can blame the people of New South Wales if, seeing these continuous statements, they believe that there is a tendency towards the violation of the provisions of the Constitution? I ask those who wish to see this Constitution work smoothly for the good of all—those who do not want, by a policy of pin-pricking towards the mother State, to bring about friction—to vote for this resolution; otherwise I venture to say that the policy of which I complain is likely to lead to far more serious consequences than some people imagine. I ask whether it is worth while to add to the feeling of bitterness and anger that animates the large majority of the electors of my State. I have given reasons to warrant the vote I shall give. Perhaps I have spoken with some warmth; I judge from the expressions of honorable senators that I have done so. But if I have spoken warmly on the subject, I can assure the Senate that the feeling which animates me is as an iceberg compared with the feelings of the great body of the electors in the State of New South Wales.

Senator BARRETT.—It must be bad there then!

Senator MILLEN.—It is so, and if the honorable senator doubts my statement, let him visit New South Wales and judge for himself. I ask honorable senators to recognise the difficulties that must exist in the early stages of this union. I request them, in the interests of peace and good-fellowship, to give way on this point and to cast a vote which will go a long way towards satisfying the people of New South Wales. Whatever delay may take place concerning the ultimate choice of a capital, the passing of this resolution will show the people of New South Wales that there will be no ultimate attempt to deprive them of the advantages conferred upon them by the terms of the Constitution.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I am exceedingly pleased to know that this motion has restored Senator Matheson to health, and that he has succeeded in imparting some life and vigour to Senator Millen, even though his speech may have made the rest of the New South Wales senators deadly sick. Senator Millen bases the preposterous claim made on behalf of the State of New South Wales upon some provision that he says is in the Constitution. I should like to know in what particular part of the Constitution he finds the obligation which he says is cast upon us of compelling the Governor-General to reside in Sydney? Where is that provision to be found anywhere in the Constitution?

Senator MILLEN.—There is an obligation in the Constitution that the Governor-General shall reside in New South Wales.

Senator DAWSON.—When? The honorable senator has been very eloquent and very forceful in talking about carrying out a distinct obligation, and about faithfully fulfilling some understanding in accordance with which the New South Wales electors agreed to come into the federation. He says that they understood that the seat of government was to be in New South Wales, and that the Governor-General was to reside where the seat of government was located. But, surely, the honorable senator knows that it was recognised all over Australia that the distinct understanding was that, until the capital had been fixed in New South Wales, the seat of government was to be in Melbourne.

Senator MILLEN.—No.

Senator DAWSON.—I say that undoubtedly it was so. As far as concerns Queensland, it was the distinct understanding there that, until the capital site was definitely fixed upon, Melbourne was to be the seat of government. No other State was to participate in the federal government of this Commonwealth until the federal city was established somewhere in New South Wales, 100 miles from Sydney.

Senator Major GOULD.—That is not so.

Senator DAWSON.—There was even a specific condition that Sydney was not to be the seat of government. The seat of government was actually to be 100 miles from Sydney. What is the use of Senator Millen rolling out a stream of fiery eloquence such as, I have no doubt, would transfix a New South Wales audience, when he knows that the claim he has set up does not exist? It is now evident that under some circumstances these New South Wales people can become a happy family. During nearly the whole of the session we have found them to be most excellent representatives of the antipodean Kilkenny cats. When they come to divide the spoil among themselves, they fight in the most acrimonious manner, but when it is a question of collecting the spoil from the rest of the States for the benefit of New South Wales, they are the happiest family alive. To realize the truth of that remark, honorable senators who have seen how united they are on this question, have only to recollect their attitude with regard to other matters last night. I regret very much that this question should have been brought forward on a Friday, when honorable senators are desirous of closing the sitting early. Certainly, I do not wish to do anything to cause inconvenience to any honorable senator. But I confess that I feel very strongly upon the question, because I think that, hanging upon it, is the whole question of whether we are going to countenance the policy of keeping up two Government-houses in this Commonwealth. Are we going to keep up an establishment at the seat of Government and another establishment in New South Wales? If we pursue that policy, certainly we must keep up more than one Government-house; I contend that we must go the whole way and provide means for the up-keep of a Government-house in every State in the Commonwealth. Every other State has just as much claim upon the taxpayers for the up-keep of a Government-house as has New South Wales under present circumstances. If New South Wales can make good a claim that we shall keep the Sydney Government-house in a state of repair, the result will be that even after the capital has been fixed at Bombala, or elsewhere, Victoria, in its turn, will have a perfect right to put forward a claim that the Commonwealth shall keep up the Melbourne Government-house as a residence for the Governor-General at the expense of the Commonwealth of Australia. If Victoria presented a claim of that kind, we should laugh it out of court on account of its absurdity; and we ought also to laugh this claim of New South Wales out of court for the same reason. New South Wales has no more claim than has Hobart. At any rate, so far as I am concerned, I state unhesitatingly that I fail to see why the people of the Commonwealth should contribute to the up-keep of a Government-house in Sydney, when it is considered that Sydney is not at present the seat of government, whereas Melbourne certainly is. I fully recognise the other claim that has been put forward for this motion, and which is, I think, the only legitimate claim that has been urged to-day. That is, that evidently some person or other in authority has already entered into an agreement with the Government of New South Wales that they should lease Government-house, Sydney, to the Commonwealth for a period of three years. That has been done on the authority of Ministers of the Commonwealth. It is an obligation which we cannot honorably repudiate. But while sticking honestly to that agreement or contract, or whatever it may be called, there is no reason whatever which has yet been brought before me which will induce me to go beyond that point. We should stick hard and fast to our bargain as to the time for which we have leased Government-house, Sydney. The Senate should, whenever the opportunity presents itself, unmistakably declare that it is of opinion that the Governor-General should not occupy a house in Sydney as well as in Melbourne. Senator Millen supported the ridiculous argument of Senator Ewing, that to provide a residence for the Governor-General in Sydney as well as in Melbourne would be an arrangement similar to that of the States in providing town and country residences for their Governors.

Senator MILLEN.—No, I did not.

Senator DAWSON.—Some of the other speakers who support the motion certainly did so. We must not forget that most of the enthusiastic support which the proposal has received has come from representatives of New South Wales, who, I feel certain, would not have been so eloquent in praise of it if the proposal had been that the second Government-house should be in Brisbane, or in some other State. I am satisfied that the beginning and the end of Senator Millen's advocacy of the arrangement is that Sydney will reap the benefit of it. It has been suggested to us that had the people of New South Wales known before the referendum was taken that the Governor-General would not reside in Sydney because the seat of government would be in Melbourne, they would not have joined the Federation. We are to understand that they would have said, "If you do not give us a turn to look at your pretty boy, we will not play in your yard." While that statement may accurately express the feelings of the respectable little coterie who visit Government-house on Thursday afternoons, it does not express the opinions of the great body of the population of New South Wales, who, I believe, do not care two straws where the Governor-General resides either during the session or in the recess. I refuse to countenance a policy which I regard as unwise, unnecessary, and extravagant. I believe that we lost an excellent man in Lord Hopetoun, because he thought that it was incumbent upon him to maintain two residences, and he found that he could not do so without dipping too deeply into his private purse.

Senator DE LARGIE.—He did not do too badly, anyway.

Senator DAWSON.—However that may be, I believe that the main reason for his hasty resignation was that he found it impossible to fulfil what he regarded as an obligation imposed upon him by his position to maintain two residences. We should give our Governor-General to understand that that is not required of him; that he is to reside at the seat of government, and to pay visits to the States when possible. Sydney has no more call for the presence of the Governor-General than has Hobart or any other State capital. I trust that Senator Higgs will withdraw his amendment, so that I may move an amendment which I think will better fit the case, and will evade the objections which have been urged against that now before the Senate. We must faithfully carry out the contract which has been entered into with the Government of New South Wales, but we should not leave it open to whatever Ministry may be in power to make a similar contract after the expiration of the present one without our approval and consent.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator DAWSON) proposed—

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Has the Minister for Trade and Customs considered the advisability of introducing a short Bill to amend the Customs Act, so as to ameliorate in some degree the position of those who commit errors in connexion with the transaction of Customs business, without impairing the power of the Minister to deal as stringently as possible with those who are guilty of attempts to defraud the revenue?

Mr. KINGSTON.—A number of matters connected with Customs administration now form the subject of ministerial consideration, particularly in connexion with communications which I have recently received from Chambers of Commerce and other bodies in reply to my request for information. I have not finally dealt with those communications, and am unable at this moment to give my honorable friend the answer he desires; but if he will give notice of his question, I shall be glad to answer it at a later date.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN DRILL INSTRUCTORS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I wish to know from the Acting Minister of Defence whether he has received from Major-General Hutton replies to his questions as to the employment of the ten drill instructors who were recently sent to South Australia? I ask the question because I have been told on very good authority that there is a real danger of the men taking to drink as the result of sheer want of employment?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think there is the danger which the honorable member fears. The General Officer Commanding has been in Sydney for the past ten days or a fortnight, and perhaps for that reason I have not yet received replies to the questions which I have asked.

HOLIDAYS: POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yesterday, being a State holiday in South Australia, was observed in the Defence and Customs departments there, but the men belonging to the Post and Telegraph departments were, through some blunder, compelled to attend at the various offices, and were kept at work for about two hours. A similar mistake occurred in regard to the observance of Easter Saturday. I should like to know how the blunder happened, and what rule is to be adopted by the department in the future?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Postmaster-General has inquired into the matter, and has ascertained that the mistake occurred because, while the regulations issued by the Post and Telegraph department make provision for the observance of certain holidays only, these have been overridden by the determination of the Government that all holidays proclaimed by the Government of any State shall be observed by the Commonwealth officers in that State. The two holidays to which the honorable and learned member for South Australia has referred are statutory holidays which should have been, and, in future will be, observed by the Post and Telegraph officials in that State.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is it intended to give the men who were compelled to work yesterday another day?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Some concession may be extended to them; but I understand that they were kept at work for only two hours.

NORFOLK ISLAND.

Mr. FULLER.—Has the Acting Prime Minister received any communication from the Governor or Premier of New South Wales in regard to the condition of affairs at Norfolk Island, and, if so, does he object to lay it on the table?

Mr. DEAKIN.—So far as I remember, we have received no communication on the subject from the Premier of New South Wales, but a few weeks ago an enquiry was made through the Governor of that State—in whom, and not in the Government of New South Wales, the control of the island is vested—as to the willingness of the Commonwealth to take charge of Norfolk Island if he desired to transfer his authority to the Commonwealth. Our reply was that the Commonwealth is willing to accept the responsibility.

WAGES: TELEGRAPH CONSTRUCTION BRANCH.

Mr. SPENCE.—Is the Minister representing the Postmaster-General aware that some of the men of the telegraph construction branch are paid their wages at the beginning of the month, and others not until many days afterwards?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does the honorable member refer to men working at the same place?

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes; and engaged upon the same job. I am referring to what has taken place in Sydney. This practice has been in existence for several months. I wish to know if the Postmaster-General will see that it is discontinued. I have already brought it under the notice of the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The attention of the Postmaster-General will be called to the matter. This is the first occasion upon which it has been mentioned, so far as my knowledge goes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Will the Acting Prime Minister make a short statement to the House in regard to the business for the remainder of the session?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is absolutely impossible to deal with either the Judiciary Bill or the High Court Procedure Bill this session; but my former statement on the subject has been misunderstood. I did not attribute to the House the desire not to pass those measures, nor did I assert that there is a majority opposed to them. What I said was that at this period of the session a large number of honorable members, especially on the Opposition side of the Chamber, consider that time will not permit of their being dealt with. The Loan Bill, Loan Appropriation Bill, Government Inscribed Stock Bill, and Interim Payments Bill are Bills which depend upon the acceptance by the House of the Budget proposals of the Treasurer. In addition to those, I know of no measure of importance remaining to be dealt with, except the Bonus Bill, which is set down for consideration this afternoon. We have been asked to introduce a measure to amend one section of the Public Service Act, to provide for greater convenience in administration, and another minor financial measure has been mentioned, while the acting leader of the Opposition this afternoon asked the Minister for Trade and Customs if he intends to introduce an amendment of the Customs Act. With similar exceptions, the notice-papers of this and the other Chamber contain practically the whole of the business with which we intend to conclude the session. Although the message of the Senate relating to the Customs Tariff Bill cannot be received until tomorrow, it has, I believe, been published in extenso in the press, and I hope, therefore, that as time is extremely valuable, honorable members will be prepared to enter upon its consideration directly it is received.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—If we can dispose of the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill, the Customs Tariff Bill, and the Electoral Bill this week, there will be only the financial Bills to deal with, and if the Treasurer will not be prepared until this day fortnight to proceed with those measures it might be possible for the House to adjourn for a week.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Providing that we do dispose of the Bonuses for Manufactures Bill and the Customs Tariff Bill, and that the Senate does not this week dispose of the Electoral Bill, it might be unnecessary for us to meet next week, but we have to recollect that under our most inconvenient standing order both Houses must be sitting in order that a message may be transmitted from one to the other, so that any arrangement will have to be subject to the progress made this week.

RAILWAY RATES.

Mr. MAHON asked the Acting Prime Minister, upon notice.—

1. Whether section 102 of the Constitution entitles the Commonwealth to prohibit a State from giving by means of its railways any "undue and unreasonable" "preference or discrimination" in trade and commerce?

2. Whether he is aware that about one-third of the population of Western Australia resident on the gold-fields of that State are in their intercourse with the eastern side of the continent compelled to travel and to convey most of the necessities of life nearly 1,000 miles further than need be through the refusal of the Government of Western Australia to construct or allow the construction of a railway from Esperance to Coolgardie; and whether since the protection of the vested interests of a small number of property holders at Perth and Fremantle is one of the avowed grounds of such refusal, he does not consider that an "undue and unreasonable" preference or discrimination is thereby established within the meaning of this section?

3. Whether, since section 98 of the Constitution expressly endows this Parliament with power over State railways in their relations to trade and commerce, the Government will consider the propriety of immediate intervention in this case, where thousands of citizens suffer severe loss and inconvenience through trade being diverted from its natural highway and through the enforcement of special rates on the railways for the carriage of products imported from other States?

Mr. DEAKIN.—As the honorable member is aware, the preference or discrimination alluded to can be determined only by the Inter-State Commission. He is also doubtless aware that that commission can deal with only Inter-State trade.

Mr. MAHON. — Does the honorable and learned gentleman say that this is not Inter-State trade?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; but as to how far any traffic under section 102 may be Inter-State trade, I am not sufficiently informed to be able to say.

Mr. GLYNN. — Cannot the Government proceed under section 117?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think not.

Mr. GLYNN. — It is just as well to test it as regards railway rates.

Mr. DEAKIN. — The honorable and learned member refers to a disability or discrimination.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think that the Victorian and South Australian rates are bad under that section.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They would then be bad for a very special reason, and in a very special way. It would not be possible to rely on that section to the extent that the honorable member for Coolgardie evidently desires in the questions which he asks. For their solution the creation of the commission is necessary, and then the scope of its authority is limited to following what it may determine to be or the courts may hold to be Inter-State trade.

INTER-STATE TRADE.

Sir JOHN QUICK asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice.—

Whether his attention has been directed to a letter signed "Mercator," published in the Bendigo Advertiser on 16th August, in which complaint is made of the irksome regulations and formalities insisted upon in connexion with the transit of goods from one State into another; and whether, in view of the long lapse of time since the commencement of uniform Federal duties, and the gradual and probable exhaustion of stocks imported into Australia before that date, he can see his way to reduce and mitigate the severity of some of the bookkeeping forms and rules at present enforced?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable and learned member's question is as follows :—

The Government have under their most serious consideration the provision of further facilities in relation to Inter-State trade, and they propose before the end of next week to issue the necessary regulations. They have the utmost sympathy with the proposal to remove all restrictions on Inter-State free-trade, which can be removed consistently with proper regard to the Constitution Act. This removal is now more possible and desirable than originally, because of the smaller amount receivable under section 92. The amount collected under this section of the Constitution is also rapidly diminishing. It only totalled £9,130 for the half-year ending June 30th, 1902. Further, its rapid decrease is indicated by the fact that for July, 1902, it was only £1,126, as follows :—

New South Wales ...	£68
Victoria ...	126
Queensland ...	320
South Australia ...	89
Tasmania ...	226
Western Australia ...	297

Also as regards New South Wales and Tasmania, the two States in respect of which only it has been possible to yet obtain the August figures, the amounts fell from £68 and £226 to £54 and £125. Figures such as these induce consideration of the question whether future collections under the section are desirable in view of the small results as compared with the trouble involved, but the rights of the States chiefly interested must of course be specially considered.

Our wish is to make Inter-State free-trade a matter of fact at the earliest possible opportunity.

DRILL SERGEANTS.

Mr. GLYNN asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. Whether the salaries of drill sergeants transferred from one State to another are "new expenditure," and as such payable by the Commonwealth?

2. If transferred expenditure are the salaries debited to the State from which, or the State to which, the men have been transferred?

3. Have the drill sergeants recently transferred to South Australia been enrolled under the South Australian Defence Forces Act of 1895?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable and learned member's questions, I have to state—

1. No.

2. To the State to which the men have been transferred.

3. No.

HEAD-QUARTERS' STAFF : ATTESTATION.

Mr. FULLER (for Mr. CONROY) asked the Acting Minister for Defence, upon notice—

Referring to the reply given in the Senate on the 8th July last, to the effect that the members of the Head-Quarters' Staff have not been attested—

1. Has the Federal Military Commandant been sworn in?

2. If so, under what Act or Acts?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable and learned member's questions I have to state—

Nos. 1 and 2.—No.

SUNDAY WORK : SHIPPING.

Mr. GLYNN asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Whether he is aware that owing to the restrictions on work being done on Sunday in connexion with the Customs, a boat containing fruit has been detained at Renmark on a subsiding river, and in consequence arrived 30 hours late at Morgan?

2. Whether, in view of navigation difficulties and other special circumstances, he will remove in respect of river ports, restrictions on necessary Sunday work?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answers to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follow :—

1. I am so informed by the honorable member.

2. Special instructions have been issued as regards special difficulties at Queensland tidal ports and river traffic, and the general question of Sunday work in connexion with shipping in Australia will shortly be taken into further consideration. The instructions as to rivers were issued on the 23rd ultimo.

MILITARY PAY.

Mr. BATCHELOR (for Mr. POYNTON) asked the Acting Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Has his attention been called to the following telegram from Adelaide which appeared in the Age of the 26th ultimo :—

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN MILITIA PAY.

Adelaide, Monday.

The local military forces expected that under federation their pay would be increased so as to bring it up to that in the other States; but instead, a General Order just issued announces that "special pay" will be stopped. Hitherto the men received special pay for guards of honour and other special duties, the buglers and band men for practising, and non-coms. for giving instructions outside their own company, and officers for various duties. Under the new regulations a captain who subscribes to the Military Club will be about 10s. better off than a private, and a lieutenant will be £1 worse.

2. Are the following rates of military pay in the two States mentioned substantially correct :—

Rank.	South Australia.	Victoria.
Private ...	£5 0 0	£7 10 0
Corporal ...	5 5 0	10 0 0
Sergeant ...	5 10 0	11 5 0
Lieutenant ...	6 0 0	15 0 0
Captain ...	7 10 0	22 10 0
Major ...	10 0 0	30 0 0
Lieut.-Colonel ...	15 0 0	Not ascertained.

Horse allowance ...	4 0 0	Believed to be 30 0 0
---------------------	-------	-----------------------

3. Will he supply the House with information similar to the above with respect to the rate of military pay in New South Wales?

4. In view of the low rate of military pay in South Australia as compared with Victoria and New South Wales, does he not consider that the regulation recently issued which further reduces the military pay of South Australia is a great injustice ; and, if so, will he take steps to have the regulation cancelled forthwith?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable member's questions, I desire to state—

1. Yes. The General Officer Commanding reports that no General Order has been issued to that effect, and a report has been asked for from the Commandant, South Australia.

2. The rates of pay are correct as regards South Australia, but in the case of Victoria the rates for the following ranks should be—

Corporal, £9.

Sergeant, £9 15s.

Lieut.-Colonel, £40.

In regard to the respective rates of horse allowance, it is pointed out that in Victoria, officers drawing same require to be in possession of horses available for duty during the period for which the allowance is claimed, whereas in South Australia officers have only to provide suitable horses for parade purposes.

3. In New South Wales the rates of pay are as follow :—

Private, £7 8s.

Corporal, £8 12s. 8d.

Sergeant, £9 5s.

2nd Lieutenant, £15 8s. 4d.

1st Lieutenant, £18 10s.

Captain, £24 13s. 4d.

Major, £30 16s. 8d.

Lieut.-Colonel, £43 3s. 4d.

Forage allowance, £17 (horses to be the bond fide property of officers entitled to forage allowance).

Stabling, £14.

4. This is answered in reply to No. 1.

COMMONWEALTH CONTINGENTS.

Mr. FULLER (for Mr. CONROY) asked the Acting Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Under what Act were the members of Commonwealth Contingents sent to South Africa sworn in?

2. If under an Imperial law, by what process was the Commonwealth Government empowered to put it into operation?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In reply to the honorable and learned member's questions, I have to state—

1. Under the Imperial Army Act.

2. Under section 94 of the Army Act, by which enrolling officers were appointed by the Governor-General.

REFUNDS OF DUTIES.

Mr. BAMFORD asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Whether refunds have been made to importers in respect to any goods other than under-proof spirits?

2. If so, upon what goods, and to what amount?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answer to the honorable member's questions is as follows :—

1 and 2. Only upon monolines and outside packages. Monolines were held to be entitled to the same treatment as linotypes. The amount is not at this moment available, but will be furnished if so desired. The refunds in respect of outside packages were as regards duty paid before 15th November. Wines, in bond or on the water and over the prescribed strength at the time of the Tariff introduction, were allowed to be treated similarly with spirits.

MOUNTED RIFLEMEN.

Mr. SAWERS asked the Acting Minister for Defence, upon notice—

1. Have the repeated applications for the formation of a body of Mounted Riflemen at Glen Innes received the consideration of the Government?

2. If so, what determination has been arrived at?

3. If not, will early consideration be given to this question?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — In reply to the honorable member's questions, I beg to state :—

The General Officer Commanding is not in a position yet to recommend any change in the existing establishment. Many other applications besides this are involved, and consideration will be given to all of them as soon as possible.

PAPERS.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister for Home Affairs).—Several questions have been asked in reference to what action has been taken regarding a railway connexion between the eastern States and Western Australia, and I now lay upon the table a précis of the information which has been obtained up to the present time. Other questions have been asked regarding the action being taken concerning the torpedo boats and obsolete ammunition in New South Wales, and also, I think, in Victoria, and I now lay upon the table a report from the Admiral, which is being acted upon.

BONUSES FOR MANUFACTURES BILL.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—Referring to the order of the day for the further reconsideration of this Bill, I move—

That the standing orders be suspended in order to enable a motion to be moved that the Bill be referred to a select committee.

I have had an opportunity of consulting with those who are entitled to express an opinion on the question, whether, under existing circumstances, the standing orders would allow of a second attempt being made to refer the Bill to a select committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is this a motion of censure?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not know whether the honorable member is attempting to help the Government by making a remark of that sort, but so far as I can see it is not a motion of censure, particularly as I do not think that the House was fully aware of the circumstances which might occur when the standing order was passed. It provides that no proposal to refer a Bill to a select committee can be entertained after it has been reported by the Chairman. We all know that this Bill was reported by the Chairman for the purpose of assisting the Government and the House to reconsider certain proposals without the formal necessity of coming to a decision in the meantime upon the clauses subsequent to the third one, on which considerable debate had taken place. Seeing that it was done for the convenience of the House, it seems to me that the Government ought to offer no opposition to a proposal, which, under other circumstances, would have been quite in order. It may be remembered that on the last occasion the proposal to refer the Bill to a select committee was not voted upon. The proposal to create a blank was negatived, and, therefore, we did not get a decision on the main question. It seems to me that every stage of the debate on the Bill goes further to show the necessity of holding an inquiry before a final decision is arrived at.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Had not the honorable member better address himself simply to the suspension of the standing orders?

Mr. WATSON.—If the Government are willing to allow this motion to go, I do not desire to occupy the time of the House at this stage in discussing it, but if I do not now give some reasons for suspending the standing orders the debate may proceed, and I shall not have a chance to speak until I rise to reply. If it had been thought that the standing orders would debar a resort to any course which was open previous to the Chairman reporting the Bill, probably the reporting stage would not have been reached so easily as it was. In view of all these considerations, I think it would be a proper thing for the Government to agree to the motion. In any case, I submit that the House is entitled to take a vote on the question whether the Bill should not be reconsidered. I defer any argument as to the necessity for the appointment of a committee until the House has decided this motion. If the debate does take the wider range I shall have an opportunity in reply of saying something in regard to it.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—The Government do not propose to oppose the motion for the suspension of the standing orders, because they think it is an easy way of getting the opinion of the House. I point out also that it would be competent for the honorable member after we had thrashed out the Bill in committee, and probably upon the motion for the third reading, to move a similar motion to that which he now proposes to submit, and, if the course were adopted, we should have lost the time occupied in the discussion of the Bill in committee. The Government will, therefore, consent to the suspension of the standing orders in order that the motion to refer the Bill to a select committee may be moved, and to that motion we shall be happy to give our hearty opposition.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I move—

That the Bill be referred to a select committee and that such committee consist of the Minister for Trade and Customs, Sir Edward Braddon, Mr. Joseph Cook, Mr. Winter Cooke, Mr. L. E. Groom, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Kirwan, Mr. Mauger, Mr. Watkins, and the mover.

First of all, with regard to the composition of the proposed committee, I may say that it is at all times a difficult thing to propose any committee of members which will be satisfactory to the whole of the House from the variety of points of view that must necessarily be taken into consideration in respect to a matter such as this. I have attempted to provide that each State shall have some representation upon the committee, and I have attempted also to fairly divide the committee in the matter of fiscal opinion so that no undue preference shall be given to one side or the other in that regard. So far as possible, of course, I submit the names of honorable members, who from other associations have had an opportunity of hearing or knowing a little of the subject. I may further say that if the House chooses to adopt the course frequently adopted in dealing with motions of this description, the first portion of the motion may be voted upon separately, and should it be carried the composition of the committee can be arranged in the usual way. With regard to the main idea of referring the Bill to a select committee, I may in the first place point to the fact that on the last occasion when a similar proposal was made, it was confined principally to the establishment of State iron works. On this occasion I propose that the range of the committee's investigation should be very much wider. Since that time the debate in committee on the measure has disclosed, to my mind, the necessity for further detailed information; this has been more emphatically impressed upon honorable members at every stage of the Bill. If it is assumed that the House or the country is justified in granting bonuses to private individuals, the amount necessary to be set aside for that object must be a matter of moment and a matter for inquiry so far as this House is concerned. To arrive at a correct conclusion in that regard it seems to me that we ought to know first the cheapness as compared with deposits in other countries, with which the iron deposits in Australia can be worked; the amount of capital which it will be necessary to invest in the undertaking, and the probability, or otherwise, with the assistance of a bonus, of the industry being carried on without any large amount of duty in the future. All these considerations should be taken into account before we say what bonus, if any, ought to be paid. We cannot in this matter accept ex parte statements. We have already a number of statements from those who are promoting these companies as to the cost of installing the necessary plant, and I must say that there is a considerable difference of opinion as to what the amount necessary will be. It is, therefore, all the more desirable that we should have evidence, so far as it is obtainable, from all sides of the question before accepting the suggestions and statements of those immediately concerned. On the strength of a statement made to me by a gentleman who should know something of the subject, I have myself put forth the statement that £250,000 should be quite sufficient to thoroughly test the iron deposits of Australia. But against that it is stated by the Blyth River Company that they will have to spend £1,000,000 before they can hope to carry the matter through successfully. In view of the fact that all these statements are made ex parte, and without that criticism which will be afforded by evidence on both sides of this question, it is idle for this House to say—even if it is granted that bonuses are desirable—how much per ton the bonus should be or for how many years it should be maintained. This is one view of the matter which shows the necessity for some such inquiry as I propose. Again, there is the proposition put forward by the section of the House with which I am associated with regard to the establishment of State ironworks. I know that in this connexion the Sydney Morning Herald of a few days ago, referring to the motion discussed in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, the other evening, stated that I had assured the Minister for Trade and Customs that the Premier of New South Wales, Sir John See, knew nothing of the feeling of his own Legislative Assembly in this matter, and that I was able to express a more reliable opinion on this subject than himself. I need only recall to honorable members the fact that what I did say was that I did not take the assurances of Sir John See against the establishment of State ironworks as expressing the opinion of the people of New South Wales, a very distinctly different thing from the opinion of the Legislative Assembly in which Sir John See has the honour to lead a Ministry. This is an aspect of the matter which any such committee as I suggest will, if appointed, require to consider. There was a division taken the other evening in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales upon the motion dealing with this subject, and, as I anticipated, there was a considerable majority against the proposal to establish ironworks. The Speaker usually does not vote, but reckoning the full numbers, and counting pairs, 33 honorable members out of 125 voted for the establishment of State ironworks. I know of several instances in which the body of support for a particular proposal has at that stage been much smaller, and yet it has been carried by an overwhelming majority in the Parliament of New South Wales within a couple of years. For my part, therefore, I am quite satisfied with the amount of support such a proposal has received in the New South Wales Parliament, and I feel that there is every reason to believe that, notwithstanding the result of the motion recently decided there, once the people of that State have the question thoroughly debated, they will be more than likely to return a majority to the local Parliament pledged to carry this proposition through to its conclusion. Possibly the same thing may be said for the other States, of which I am not so well able to speak. I may be considered optimistic in taking this view, but I have so frequently seen changes in the personnel of the State Legislative Assembly, under pressure from outside, that I am quite prepared to believe that if another Parliament is elected, and if, in the meantime, agitation is carried on in that State for the undertaking of this work by the Government, a majority may be found in favour of the proposal. From all these points of view I think it is necessary that a committee should be appointed to report to this House before any further action is taken in the matter. Now, as to the question of delay, some of those who opposed the proposal for a committee on the last occasion argued that its only result would be to secure the defeat of the Bill, and to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the question. But it seems to me that if a select committee is agreed to under these circumstances the members of it should take every reasonable means to arrive at a report—I do not say a unanimous report, because I do not suppose it is likely, whatever committee is appointed, that we shall get a unanimous report upon such a debatable question as this; but at any rate they should be able to obtain useful information for the benefit of members of this House and of the other Chamber within a comparatively short period. We have, I am sure, quite a number of gentlemen interested in promoting these projects, who will be only too anxious to give to such a committee every information as to what their intentions are, and what their plans amount to. In addition to that, I am satisfied that we can get evidence from people who are not directly interested, but who are yet qualified to speak on the subject and to offer criticism of these proposals. All this need not take more than a few weeks, even though it should be found necessary to visit one or other of the States in order to secure evidence which may not be obtainable here.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If it is to be done at all it should be done thoroughly.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that; but I say that a very large proportion of the evidence can be obtained in Melbourne, and at first hand from those directly interested. Of course there are other questions which the committee will require to consider, but in any case I at present see no reason why such a committee should not be able to report before we adjourn. So far as I am concerned, even if it were found necessary to extend the inquiry with a view to having some decided action taken, I should still consider this the proper course to adopt in view of all the circumstances. There is another matter to which, if in order, I think I am justified in referring. There has been a provision accepted in another measure by both Houses of the Federal Parliament that contingent upon this Bill going through and certain developments taking place, the Minister for Trade and Customs may by proclamation bring into existence certain duties. This has an important bearing upon other duties which are still in dispute, which in the total do not amount to a great deal, but which are for the benefit of those who have to use iron for their raw material. I say that the degree of difference it is necessary to maintain between any encouragement given to the producers of the raw material and that given to the producers of the manufactured article is a matter for very careful inquiry, and one upon which it seems to me it is necessary for honorable members of both Houses to have definite information before coming to a decision. Would it be a proper thing, from the point of view of those who are in some degree protectionists, to allow a duty of, say 10 per cent., on the raw material, and a duty of 12½ per cent. or 15 per cent. only on the manufactured article? I do not want to play into the hands of those who do not want the industry at any time or at any price, but who will be only too ready to associate themselves with any project in order to bring about its defeat. Any possible doubt as to the attitude of New South Wales at the present moment is dispelled by the division in the local Parliament last week. What is the position to-day? Was there ever a more favorable occasion for bringing about an early accomplishment of the scheme for establishing the industry?

MR. BATCHELOR.—Yes.

MR. KINGSTON.—I think not. The scheme was never nearer its accomplishment than it is to-day. When I last spoke, not so much had been done. The scheme proposed is double—a bonus in the first instance, and a duty after the establishment of the industry. How does the second part stand now? The Senate has given its assent to every word of the provisions in Division VIA. of the Tariff, and it now remains for us to pass this Bill and send it on to the other Chamber, where I believe it will be accorded a hearty welcome. Contrast that for a moment with the proposal for delay to enable a search to be made after information already obtained. We have ransacked all possible sources of information, and what more can we learn? Shall we, for the purpose of investigation by a select committee, retrace our steps over all the work that has been done, and waste the time that has been devoted to the consideration of this measure? The scheme which we propose is of such a character that it must pay. The Commonwealth will contribute only 20 per cent. of the marketable value of the iron produced. We shall give £1 for every £5 worth of iron produced, and we shall obtain a return of five times the money we spend. Under such circumstance, how is it possible for us to gain any advantage by delay? I ask those honorable members who really believe in the iron industry to vote for carrying still further the good work that we have partly done, and not to be led away by suggestions which would involve the loss of a golden opportunity and wreck the scheme for years and years.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I think my right honorable friend is rather lacking in the sense of humour. He began by saying that it was absolutely unnecessary to go over the old ground again, and yet he has spent nearly half-an-hour in restating the principles of the measure. If honorable members will cast their memories back to the debates which took place upon Division VIA. of the Tariff, they will come to the conclusion that either the present time is inopportune for the granting of the proposed bonuses, or that at any rate the measure requires a great deal more consideration.

MR. SAWERS.—The time will always be inopportune in the view of the honorable member and his party.

SIR WILLIAM McMILLAN. — The question where the money is to come from must occur to all of us. Our finances are now in such a condition that the Treasurer can scarcely forecast results from month to month. We are under certain obligations to the smaller States, and this fact has been made use of by the Ministry as a political cry. Yet, notwithstanding the manifesto of the Prime Minister that we should provide for revenue without destruction, and maintain tottering industries, it is proposed to appropriate £250,000 for the encouragement of an industry which was not in existence at the last general election, and in connexion with a scheme which, I venture to say, has never been before the people of the Commonwealth. I hope the proposal of the honorable member for Bland will be agreed to, and that the select committee will consider a great many matters connected with the scheme. I have listened very attentively to the special pleading of my right honorable friend, and I have noted the arguments based on the conditions of the Canadian iron industry—which are not at all on all-fours with the proposed scheme—and also his special reference to the iron industry in the United States—a country populated by 80,000,000 of people. But I have not heard anything that will convince me that, at this stage of our national life, with a population of only 4,000,000, it would be to our interests to spend a large amount of public revenue upon the establishment of a new industry for which the chances of success are very doubtful, and which if once supported by the State, especially by bonuses, would require more and more assistance until it became an absolute monopoly. The establishment of a monopoly would mean one of two things. If the industry were taken up by the State of New South Wales the people there would have to pay for the reduction in the price afraid. There are those who are entirely against the encouragement by bonus of any industrial enterprise. These honorable members acknowledge that fact freely ; and all honour to them. And their honour I hope will induce them to refrain from voting for a proposition with which they do not entirely agree, simply for the sake of wrecking that to which they strongly object. On the other hand, there is a large majority of honorable members in favour of a bonus for the establishment of the iron industry. These honorable members would do anything in reason to attain that object, but they are unhappily split into two sections, one of which strongly favours the enterprise being undertaken by the State, and the other of which is not yet driven to any such conclusion, but would, in default of the State undertaking it, prefer to see the industry started at the earliest opportunity by any persons willing to embark their capital. It is said that information is required as to whether there are people ready to take advantage of the bonus ; but is there any doubt on the subject ? We read the newspapers, and our ears are open ; and there appears little room for doubt that if a Bill be passed somewhat on the lines suggested, there are people only too willing to invest their capital in the industry. Why should these people not be permitted to do so ?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—With our money ?

Mr. KINGSTON.—To what extent ? The amount proposed is £250,000.

Mr. WILKS. — In order to provide £250,000 taxation to the amount of £1,000,000 will have to be imposed.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It will not be our money, but money invested here in fostering Australian enterprise, by Australian capitalists or capitalists from elsewhere, and it will be money spent with advantage by those who have it. If I recollect rightly, the honorable member for Bland said he wanted to know what money would have to be spent, and what would be the likely profit. But the party which the honorable member leads here, and of which he is the representative in Australia—and which, I understand, is, and properly so, almost one in the various States—are haunted by no doubts as to the success of the enterprise. Last week in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, the labour party, properly, but unsuccessfully, sought to induce the Government of that State to pledge themselves to undertake the enterprise. Does the honorable member for Bland suggest that under these circumstances the party with which he is associated have any doubt as to the success of the industry ?

Mr. WATSON.—If the industry is going to be a success, there is no need for a bonus.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The labour party would not ask for such a pledge from the New South Wales Government if they did not believe in the success of the industry. I previously contended that New South Wales opinion is properly represented by the Government of the day—that the possession of the Treasury benches is generally indicative of the power to express the popular will. I am strengthened in that opinion by the recent division in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, where by 46 votes to 27, which represents a majority of nearly two-thirds over the lower number—

Mr. WATSON.—Not at all ; one-third.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Compared with 27, the figures 46 show a majority of 19, and 19 is more than two-thirds of 27. Under the circumstances, am I not right in saying that the majority was more than two-thirds ?

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable gentleman double his Customs figures in that way ?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member knows perfectly well that I place the figures in the most attractive way from my own point of view, but, at the same time, I use them with absolutely mathematical precision. We have the declaration of the New South Wales Legislative Assembly that they are not ready for a State undertaking of this character. Are we to wait, or are we to go on ? If we could define precisely when the enterprise would be undertaken by a State, there might be some reason for pleading for delay. But the Governments of the various States have informed us that they will not have anything to do with the matter, and we have been told that the New South Wales Government prefer the Bill as proposed. When that opinion is expressed by the only State likely to take advantage of the bonus, I appeal to honorable members, who really desire the early establishment of the industry, not to allow delay to be used for the purpose of defeat. I ask honorable members to look at the matter fairly and squarely, and if they come to a conclusion that the early establishment of the industry is desirable, not to play into the hands of those who do not want the industry at any time or at any price, but who will be only too ready to associate themselves with any project in order to bring about its defeat. Any possible doubt as to the attitude of New South Wales at the present moment is dispelled by the division in the local Parliament last week. What is the position to-day? Was there ever a more favorable occasion for bringing about an early accomplishment of the scheme for establishing the industry?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I think not. The scheme was never nearer its accomplishment than it is to-day. When I last spoke, not so much had been done. The scheme proposed is double—a bonus in the first instance, and a duty after the establishment of the industry. How does the second part stand now? The Senate has given its assent to every word of the provisions in Division VIA. of the Tariff, and it now remains for us to pass this Bill and send it on to the other Chamber, where I believe it will be accorded a hearty welcome. Contrast that for a moment with the proposal for delay to enable a search to be made after information already obtained. We have ransacked all possible sources of information, and what more can we learn? Shall we, for the purpose of investigation by a select committee, retrace our steps over all the work that has been done, and waste the time that has been devoted to the consideration of this measure? The scheme which we propose is of such a character that it must pay. The Commonwealth will contribute only 20 per cent. of the marketable value of the iron produced. We shall give £1 for every £5 worth of iron produced, and we shall obtain a return of five times the money we spend. Under such circumstance, how is it possible for us to gain any advantage by delay? I ask those honorable members who really believe in the iron industry to vote for carrying still further the good work that we have partly done, and not to be led away by suggestions which would involve the loss of a golden opportunity and wreck the scheme for years and years.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I think my right honorable friend is rather lacking in the sense of humour. He began by saying that it was absolutely unnecessary to go over the old ground again, and yet he has spent nearly half-an-hour in restating the principles of the measure. If honorable members will cast their memories back to the debates which took place upon Division VIA. of the Tariff, they will come to the conclusion that either the present time is inopportune for the granting of the proposed bonuses, or that at any rate the measure requires a great deal more consideration.

Mr. SAWERS.—The time will always be inopportune in the view of the honorable member and his party.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — The question where the money is to come from must occur to all of us. Our finances are now in such a condition that the Treasurer can scarcely forecast results from month to month. We are under certain obligations to the smaller States, and this fact has been made use of by the Ministry as a political cry. Yet, notwithstanding the manifesto of the Prime Minister that we should provide for revenue without destruction, and maintain tottering industries, it is proposed to appropriate £250,000 for the encouragement of an industry which was not in existence at the last general election, and in connexion with a scheme which, I venture to say, has never been before the people of the Commonwealth. I hope the proposal of the honorable member for Bland will be agreed to, and that the select committee will consider a great many matters connected with the scheme. I have listened very attentively to the special pleading of my right honorable friend, and I have noted the arguments based on the conditions of the Canadian iron industry—which are not at all on all-fours with the proposed scheme—and also his special reference to the iron industry in the United States—a country populated by 80,000,000 of people. The establishment of a monopoly would mean one of two things. If the industry were taken up by the State of New South Wales the people there would have to pay for the reduction in the price of iron to the consumer, or the State Government would require from the Commonwealth larger and larger import duties until the imposts became absolutely prohibitive. In view of the interests of the manufacturers themselves—which the protectionists are supposed to conserve—and bearing in mind that iron enters largely into almost every one of our important manufacturing concerns, this is not the time at which we should contemplate an increase in the price of the raw material. On several occasions we have lacked information such as could be obtained only by means of exhaustive inquiry, and this is a matter upon which—putting aside my fiscal faith, because I do not believe in bonuses of any kind—we should be placed in a position of much greater advantage if a patient investigation were made by a committee of this House. Why should we rush matters in connexion with this industry? We are half way through this Parliament, and the proposed industry cannot be placed upon its feet until the next Parliament is elected. Why should we commit our successors to such an enormous expenditure as that contemplated? I consider that some time might well be spent in investigation, and that the Ministry—after the tedious debates which have dragged through weeks, and which have shown that there is no determinate opinion one way or another—ought to be glad of an investigation that would throw some distinctive light on the question. Although I am opposed to bonuses, I recognise that a majority of honorable members are in favour of the bonus system under certain conditions, and I shall therefore vote for the appointment of a select committee, which will at any rate place in our hands an authoritative statement as to the actual position of affairs.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The honorable member for Wentworth was right in saying that a majority of honorable members are in favour of the granting of bonuses under proper conditions. At the same time it is curious that the majority should not have their own way. As a matter of fact, the triangular duel which has been proceeding is being made use of by the minority to impose their will upon the House. A majority of honorable members are in favour of the granting of bonuses subject to proper precautions, but that majority have unfortunately allowed themselves to be split into two divisions, one of which insists that the bonus shall not be granted, except upon certain conditions. With all respect to the honorable member for Bland, I think that he and those associated with him are making a great mistake in their own interests. The honorable member has led his party with great ability and industry, and has paid great attention to the debates in Parliament, but I cannot help thinking that he has been ill-advised in this matter.

Mr. WATSON.—We always think that about “the other fellow’s” opinion.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may be, but I am saying what I really think. I take it that the motion for the appointment of a select committee is intended to shelve the Bill, and I think it would be better for the honorable member for Bland to frankly say so. This session of Parliament is nearly at an end, and if the motion is carried providing for an inquiry with a wide scope such as the honorable member has suggested, the Bill will be shunted for this session, and we shall not know when the next session will begin.

Mr. WATSON.—That will be the fault of the Government.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member said that he desired that the committee should enquire, not only into the immediate details of the proposed scheme for the granting of bonuses, but into the whole of the circumstances of the iron industry.

Mr. WILKS.—That is the only way in which a proper investigation can take place.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I contend that we have a committee in the responsible Government which alone can give the bonuses. I feel that it would be of the greatest advantage to us if we could secure the establishment of the iron industry at a time like the present when industries are sadly needed. The primary producers have, to a large extent, failed us, and there are hundreds and thousands of men who are anxious for work, and who cannot secure it, and if there ever was a time at which it was important to develop new industries it is at present. It is not in times of stint that we should close up our purse; at such times, we should open it as far as we can. It is true that this expenditure will fall upon all the States in proportion to population, and that some of them may find it hard to pay their way. I recognise that £250,000 is a large sum.

Mr. WATSON.—That refers to only the iron industry; the total expenditure will be more than that—it will be £300,000.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is not so, but it is a very unimportant detail. The extraordinary position is that whilst the principal expenditure in connexion with this scheme will probably take place in New South Wales, the representatives of that State are most keenly opposing it.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—That shows our honesty.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Victoria has nothing to gain directly from this scheme, and yet I feel that it is regarded by some of my honorable friends on the Opposition side as a sinister deep-laid plot for the purpose of securing wealth to Victoria.

Mr. WILKS.—I never gave the suggestion a thought.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member for Wentworth also spoke of the money that would be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of New South Wales, but I would point out that the amount spent in connexion with the proposed scheme would be new expenditure, which would have to be borne by all the States upon a population basis, and that Victoria would therefore have to contribute one-third of the whole amount. We are anxious to afford an opportunity for the establishment of the iron industry. We draw no lines between Australians. We feel that it will be good for Australia to have the iron industry established, because our people move about from place to place in search of work. The iron industry is an industry of industries, and is not to be compared with any other. We cannot foretell the number of industries that it will bring in its train, if it is once well established. Free-trade and protection have nothing to do with this proposal, because the best of free-traders are advocates of the bonus system. This is not a question of imposing protectionist duties, but of granting bonuses, and the best men of the Cobdenite school are strongly in favour of bonuses.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Does the honorable and learned member wish the representatives of New South Wales to depart from their principles, because their State will benefit under the scheme proposed?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; the honorable member said that he was opposed to the granting of bonuses, and I think that his stiff, starched, and pedantic attitude on this question is to be deplored. We cannot be guided solely by theory in these matters. It should be remembered that in a new country we have to deal with new conditions. Although I should prefer to see the iron industry controlled by the States, and although I voted in favour of giving them the exclusive right for one or two years to embark upon the enterprise, I feel that we cannot expect them within that period to nationalize the undertaking. Rather than that the industry should not be established, I favour encouraging private individuals to engage in it. At the same time, I think that Parliament should insist that any company or syndicate which may be induced by the payment of a bonus to enter upon the work of iron production should pledge itself to sell its undertaking to the State in which its operations are being conducted, upon a valuation, after the lapse of a reasonable period.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The Government would be willing to agree to a fair right of purchase.

Mr. WATSON.—The representative of one company told me that that company would not agree to any provision being made in regard to resumption unless at the expiration of a very long period.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think I can understand any company making that statement; but when it comes to a choice between being granted a bonus and being denied it, the company will very quickly change their tune. If the Bill be passed, the money for the payment of the bonus will belong to the taxpayers, and therefore it would be only fair to insist that, if the people of the State in which the industry is established wish to carry on the undertaking they should be allowed the opportunity to do so. I regret that a sort of "dog-in-the-manger" attitude is shown by the House at the present time. I do not think that the Minister will carry this measure unless there is a considerable change of front on the part of those who are anxious to see the iron industry developed, even at some little cost. However, I shall assist him as far as I possibly can. I feel, however, that a great mistake is being made by a section of this House. Having regard to the vote which was taken in the New South Wales Parliament the other night, it is utterly absurd to expect that State to nationalize the work of the production of iron. After all there is a good deal to be said in favour of allowing private individuals to experiment with a new industry at their own expense, instead of at the expense of the Commonwealth. This is a very different case from that of the railways. Supplies of iron can be obtained from abroad, where the industry is controlled by trusts, but no syndicate or trust can run the Australian railways in parts outside Australia, and therefore it is safe to assume that they will be carried on by the States Governments. But, considering the huge industrial movements which have their centre at the present time in America, it by no means follows that the States will be able to supply iron and steel in sufficient quantities to satisfy the wants of our railways and our people. Our efforts in regard to iron production would be very puny as compared with those of the great iron industries abroad. But we can render this industry very valuable service here. If private individuals, with the aid of a Government bonus, are prepared to risk their money in the enterprise, either at this or any other time, I am willing to give them the opportunity of doing so. Of course, it must be clearly understood that the States can always ask for a bonus if they desire it, and I am quite sure that the Government would give them a preferential claim. But I think honorable members ought to recollect that it is a distinct advantage to Australia to have people who are prepared to risk their money, time, and labour in a novel industry of this sort. Any bonus in which they may participate will be really a small thing as compared with the good results to the Commonwealth. In the event of the Bill being carried, stringent regulations could be imposed by the Government, and I am quite sure that in framing those regulations, which have to be submitted to Parliament, we may trust the Government to protect the interests of the inhabitants of Australia.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has read those who do not support this measure a lecture upon their attitude.

Mr. KINGSTON.—They deserve it.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Probably; I hope they will deserve it still more. The honorable and learned member has said that there is a majority of this House in favour of the bonus system.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A section of the House is bringing the whole thing into contempt.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not those who are opposing the Bill who are bringing it into contempt.

Mr. RONALD.—Then the honorable member admits that he does oppose the Bill?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Of course, I do.

Mr. RONALD.—I am glad of that, because I now know the way in which I shall vote.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member knew quite well the way in which he was going to vote before I opened my mouth. He understands full well what my attitude is upon this measure. I fought it from its introduction, and as I cannot prevent it from passing, I intend to fight for, delay. But, apart from that consideration, I support the motion in favour of the measure being referred to a select committee in order that the full facts may be placed before the public. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne declared that there is a majority in favour of the bonuses. On the other hand, I am quite satisfied that a majority of honorable members are opposed to this Bill. It is only owing to the persistent whipping on the part of the Government that it has had such a long life.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The leader of the Opposition admits that there is a majority in favour of the bonus system.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I think that the leader of the Opposition is in error. To my mind, the honorable member for Bland has made out a very strong case indeed in favour of delaying the passing of this Bill till the matter has been thoroughly investigated. What is known in connexion with the proposal? We are told that certain individuals are prepared to embark upon the iron industry. On the one hand we are assured that to do so will require the expenditure of £1,000,000, whilst on the other we are told by experts that the cost of setting up an efficient plant would be £600,000.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—About £900,000.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—In the Minister for Home Affairs we apparently have still another expert. Surely honorable members ought to be given some idea of whether the cost of establishing the iron industry is likely to be £600,000, £900,000, or £1,000,000.

Mr. WATSON.—The total nominal capital of the new company which was floated in England to take over Mr. Sandford's works at Lithgow was £750,000.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—In view of the conflicting nature of the evidence before us, surely it is not too much to ask that the House should be placed in possession of definite information as to the real cost involved in the establishment of these works, so that we may know whether or not it is necessary to spend £250,000 to aid in its accomplishment. There is a difference of 40 per cent. between the estimates which have been submitted.

Mr. KINGSTON.—For every penny expended should we not obtain a return of five times the amount?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—If that be so, there is no necessity whatever to sanction the payment of a bonus in order to encourage private enterprise to undertake the work. The field is absolutely open. While we have been discussing this matter, private individuals, had they so desired, could have established iron works in our midst. I protest against the money of the Commonwealth being handed over to assist a number of individuals to establish monopolies. That is the sole ground of my objection to this measure. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne expressed surprise at the action of the honorable member for Bland who, he said, was making a great mistake from the point of view of the interests of the party with which he is associated. But if the labour party was created for any special reason, it was to prevent the establishment of monopolies.

Sir MALCOLM McEACHARN.—Is not a union one of the biggest monopolies we can have?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Certainly not, every man is eligible to join it.

Mr. WATSON.—We will admit the honorable member if he chooses.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—One of the chief reasons for the existence of the labour party is the necessity which exists for fighting against monopolies. Consequently, there is nothing inconsistent in the action of its members in refusing to lend themselves to a proposal to vote away the people's money in order to firmly establish a monopoly in Australia, and probably to hand over to it not only the production and supply of iron, but ultimately the control of our railways.

That is too big a contract to ask the labour party to indorse.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There are several members of the labour party who oppose the honorable member's view upon this matter.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I am simply expressing my own view of the case. Certainly, the bulk of the people of the State to which I belong are with the labour party in this connexion. One very important point has been referred to by the acting leader of the Opposition, although, of course, it may not appeal so strongly to other honorable members. I refer to the question of the condition of our finances. From where is the £300,000 which it is proposed to expend by way of bonus to come? It is to be taken from the whole of the Commonwealth, and given to a number of speculators. South Australia's proportion of that amount would be about £30,000; whilst Queensland's contribution would be £50,000.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The proposed expenditure is to be extended over three years.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes.

Mr. KINGSTON.—What is the difference between an enterprising man and a speculator?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This is not the place for conundrums. Private enterprise often builds up monopolies, to which I am certainly opposed. Apart from the financial question, which, as the Minister knows, is of serious importance to the State of South Australia, I would point out that if the second part of the Minister's proposals is carried into effect, and an import duty of 10 per cent. is placed upon pig-iron, the manufacture of machinery, and of iron and steel implements in Australia will be ruined. The import duty upon manufactures of iron will probably be 15 or 12½ per cent., but an import duty of 10 per cent. upon pig-iron would reduce the protection of local manufacturers to 5 or 2½ per cent., which would be a ridiculous margin. There is another matter which should be inquired into. The Minister did not propose the payment of butter bonuses in South Australia until a select committee had inquired into the advisability of doing such a thing. We have been told that there is room in Australia for several establishments for the making of iron and steel, and that, therefore, the granting of these bonuses cannot lead to the creation of a monopoly. In my opinion that statement is incorrect, but the matter forms another subject for an inquiry. Why should this Parliament, in its first session, commit itself to the expenditure of £300,000 of the people's money, when we cannot find time to deal with machinery Bills and other legislation which is urgently needed?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Parliament will commit itself to the expenditure of only so much as the Government may think fit to authorize.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is it to be thought that the Minister will not see fit to sanction the expenditure of the whole amount? Once we pass the Bill the matter will be taken out of our hands.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The regulations which must be framed to carry out the intentions of the Bill will have to be laid before Parliament for approval.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I regard that as a quibble. Does any one believe that any harm can result from the postponement of the consideration of this matter for perhaps twelve months, so as to permit of an inquiry being made into the whole subject? There are many important questions connected with it, upon which the House to-day has no information, and upon which it should be informed before authorizing the proposed expenditure.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The Government allowed the standing orders to be suspended so that this motion for the appointment of a committee might be moved, as though they intended to agree to the appointment of the committee; but now they are objecting to its appointment. The only new reason that the Minister gave for his present attitude is that he has discovered with deep regret that the Parliament of New South Wales has refused to agree to a proposal for the establishment of State ironworks. I think that I shall save the time of the House if I direct my remarks principally to that argument. The Parliament of New South Wales certainly vetoed the proposal to establish State ironworks, but I may inform the Minister that they would with equal directness have vetoed this Bonus Bill. The New South Wales Opposition, which numbers about 35 members, gave its support, with one or two exceptions, to the Ministry to defeat the labour party on the proposal to establish State ironworks, but as free-traders they are opposed to a bonus system of any kind at all.

Mr. SAWERS.—But the New South Wales Ministry are in favour of bonuses.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes, because they are protectionists. They are the unused wing of the protectionist party here. The people of New South Wales, however, as represented by their Parliament, are opposed to the bonus system. The Minister would have us believe that they are opposed to the adoption of State ironworks, but have signified their willingness to accept the Bill as it now stands. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who spoke as an Australian, with a capital A, said that he approached the consideration of the question from the Australian stand-point, and asked us, in the interests of Australia, to pass the Bill. As an Australian, and in the interests of the people of Australia, I am opposed to the Bill. No doubt, the honorable and learned member, from his training and associations, is disposed to look with favorable eyes upon judicial bodies, and what I ask is that a select committee may be appointed as a judicial body to decide between the conflicting statements which we have heard from honest men on both sides of the Chamber in regard to the matter now under consideration. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has spoken about the "dog in the manger" policy of those who refuse to vote for the Bill, but, if I may be permitted to use a similar metaphor, I would refer to the policy which he advocates as a "pig in the poke" policy. We, as the representatives of the people of Australia, cannot be expected to vote for this Bill without further information. I wish for the appointment of a select committee, not to settle the Bill, but to settle the vexed questions which its consideration has raised. I should like to know a little more about the stringent regulations to which the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has referred. Are they provided for by the Bill? That is another reason why this judicial committee composed of honorable members selected from all sides of the Chamber, and representing all fiscal views—a purely Australian body in its personnel—should be appointed. What more could the honorable and learned member require than an Australian select committee to inquire into this great Australian question? It takes a good deal to annoy me, but when the honorable and learned member appealed to the representatives of New South Wales and, as a representative of Victoria, asked—"What have we to gain? We are simply bursting with a desire to assist New South Wales. We are consumed with an anxiety to carry this Bill so that the people of New South Wales may have a noble and powerful industry established in their midst," I marvelled at the exhibition of this new concern for the interests of that State. I wish that the honorable and learned member had shown the same degree of concern for the interests of New South Wales a few days ago when the question of the suspension of the fodder duties was raised. Am I to be blamed if I look askance at his appeal? But supposing that it is made in the interests of New South Wales, I, as an Australian, have to say that New South Wales does not require patronage at all—does not ask for the assistance of Australia at the expense of the Australian people to build up any of her industries. Why should these honorable members be so concerned for her interests to-day? The honorable member for Bland believes in a State-owned iron industry, and the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, said with marked emphasis—and the Minister for Trade and Customs did not deny it—that the bulk of the people of his State were at the back of the proposal he believes in. The Minister, a representative of that State, by his silence, practically affirmed that idea. The honorable member for Bland made a very strong case when he said that in New South Wales the people had not considered the question of a State-owned iron industry, that the vote in the Legislative Assembly was practically a catch vote, and that the supporters of the principle had done very well in their first effort. Without committing myself to the idea of a State-owned iron industry, I submit that a proposal of this character could not have been made at a more inopportune time, in the affairs of New South Wales, because they are tired with regard to the management of certain State industries, and are afraid of proceeding further, and involving themselves in a larger expenditure. I do not understand the finances of this question. Both in this debate and in previous ones, it has been said that it involves an expenditure of sums ranging from £250,000 to £350,000. It has been stated, too, that four times that amount of money will have to be collected from the people of Australia before the required bonus can be obtained. When I, who closely follow the proceedings of Parliament, do not clearly understand the position, I am satisfied that thousands of persons in Australia, who may like to see the iron industry established, are not aware of how much money is required to insure its establishment. For that reason, what better body could we have than an Australian select committee to seek for full information? The appointment of a judicial body of that kind is an admirable idea. Probably, except in the case of those whose free-trade views are very strong, the information it would collect would set at rest all doubts. The Minister for Trade and Customs, who is generally pretty calm and judicious, is allowing his enthusiasm to carry him away in this matter. I refuse to be carried away by his enthusiasm. He possesses a most magnetic power, and it is with the greatest difficulty that I am opposing him. His enthusiasm is not a sufficient justification for the House to hastily sanction the expenditure of £350,000. That is a very good reason for appointing a select committee which could seek for reliable information from all quarters. I have read in the press that certain persons are bursting with a desire to establish industries for the benefit of Australia—pure philanthropists, who have no idea of seeking for profit or gain. Everybody has his own peculiarity, but their peculiarity is to place in some part of the Commonwealth an industry involving the expenditure of, as they say, £900,000, so that the people of Australia shall benefit by its operations. If that is so, sir, you can hardly wonder at my doubting the statement. I am fairly gullible, but when I read the statement I doubted it. A select committee could prove its accuracy or otherwise. If there are gentlemen with large national characteristics desirous of establishing industries purely for the gain of Australia, I should like a select committee to be appointed to thrash out the question. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne thought it was outrageous for a free-trader to oppose a bonus. While I may not be the "real Mackay," so far as economic principles are concerned, I should like to know how he stands in regard to bonuses all round. If it is good enough for the iron industry—our very own industry, as the Minister said—to receive a bonus at the expense of the great Australian public, is the honorable and learned member prepared to give a bonus for shipbuilding to a portion of the Commonwealth in which I live, and which has to use iron in the construction of ships? I wish to know whether a select committee could obtain information on the point? We can never estimate how much information the members of a select committee can collect. If you, sir, refer to the names of the proposed select committee, you will not discover the name of one honorable member who is not most industrious in political life, or who is likely to be caught by chaff. It is proposed that it be constituted of phlegmatic, judicial characters. Surely the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne is not going to insult those honorable members whom the honorable member for Bland would not think of nominating without their consent? Apparently, they all think that it is right to appoint a select committee. Is the honorable and learned member, with others, prepared to give a most violent slap in the face to honorable members who are willing to sacrifice their time in the public interest, and to undertake a most arduous political work which meets with little publicity? Surely the Minister is not prepared to slap in the face some of his most ardent supporters when they are anxious to ascertain the rights and wrongs of this question? Is he a very good judge of character? I am told that he is. Therefore, I ask him, in the most abject manner, is he prepared to leave me in this quandary—that I shall have to vote against the Bill, because I require further information than he has given?

Mr. KINGSTON.—If I am a judge of character, the honorable member will.

Mr. WILKS.—The Minister is very flippant. That is exactly how he is with the Bill. He says to the House—"Vote this sum of £300,000; never mind about the raising of £1,200,000. It will be a success." We hope that it will be a success, but we prefer to adopt Scotch caution and to obtain more information, so that Australia may not be placed in a more awkward situation, and her people may not be at a loss. I appeal to the Minister, and all those who believe in the bonus system. If their belief in its efficacy to establish industries for the benefit of Australia is so great as they represent, surely they are not afraid of going before a select committee of the House? If they are afraid of going before a select committee, then it is an admission that the bonus system is very weak, and that they are going to trust to time and chance to put the industry in a healthy condition, and the demands which may be made upon it in the future to strengthen what would otherwise be a most weak concern. If they do believe in the efficacy of the system, why are they now fighting here and trying to obtain a catch vote, which probably another place may not respect as they ought to do? It is a question of hastening slowly. There is no killing of the measure involved. If the select committee came back to the House armed at all points with information as to finances, stringent regulations, power of resumption, and all the other matters which have been mentioned in debate, then I could readily understand that many objections could not be raised to the Bill. I have not heard any reason to induce me to remove my opposition to a Bonus Bill. I trust that the Minister will not resist the motion. If his idea is to continue to resist the proposal, then he should have opposed the suspension of the standing orders. I again ask the honorable member for Northern Melbourne, has he so little faith in the efficacy of the bonus system that he is unprepared to give a select committee the benefit of his calm, deliberate judgment? I think that this great Australia has much to gain from the exercise of that judgment. I should like to see the calm, deliberate judgment of the advocates of the bonus system placed before a select committee, clothed with power to make a searching investigation. If there is anything in the system they will come out of the inquiry triumphantly. I am not afraid of a select committee. I believe that the members of it can obtain information which will guide not only the Commonwealth Parliament, but the Parliaments of the different States; and that it will be shown that at the present day, and for some years to come, the iron industry in Australia cannot be made a payable one. I believe that, in that way, the people of this Commonwealth may be saved the expense of a very costly experiment. It is not a question of £250,000, or even £1,000,000, because once the industry is started, it must be continued. Under all the circumstances, I plead with the Minister for Trade and Customs that, in the interests of the Commonwealth, he should not take action which will burden the people with more taxation, and that he should allow this select committee to be appointed in order that, irrespective of party considerations, we may know really how the question stands.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir). — It was hardly necessary for the honorable member for Dalley to take up time in supporting the proposal for a select committee, when he has told us that, no matter what the finding of the committee may be, he will be against a Bonus Bill.

Mr. WILKS. — I did not say anything of the sort ; I would not be so foolish.

Mr. KENNEDY. — The honorable member stated distinctly that he was opposed to a Bonus Bill.

Mr. WILKS. — At the present time, without further information.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Then the honorable member says that he will support this proposal for referring the Bill to a select committee, which is to make investigation.

Mr. WILKS. — In order to get more light upon the subject.

Mr. KENNEDY. — The acting leader of the Opposition accused the Minister for Trade and Customs of a lack of humour in taking so short a space of time to review the salient arguments as to the necessity for a bonus in order to secure the establishment of this industry. He also told us that he was opposed to the Bonus Bill, and would support an inquiry by a select committee.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — For the benefit of honorable members opposite. The ignorance displayed during the debate is so great that I think honorable members require further information.

Mr. KENNEDY. — We have the honorable member for Bland, and the honorable member for South Australia now proposing most strenuously the appointment of a select committee, though within the last two months they were prepared to vote the money embodied in the Bonus Bill without any question whatever, provided that the States undertook the development of the industry. They had ample information ; they had no doubt as to the deposits being valuable ; no doubt as to the skill and knowledge of the people, and, no doubt, that some of the States could find the capital necessary to successfully establish the industry. But being defeated for the time upon that score, when the Government now propose that private capitalists may embark in the enterprise, and may take advantage of the bonuses proposed under this Bill, those honorable members press most strenuously for information that apparently they did not at all require under what were exactly similar circumstances only a little while ago.

Mr. FOWLER. — Because the State would make an inquiry before taking up the industry.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Is it likely that we are going to take any further risks in paying this money to private capitalists rather than to a State ? Is it likely that one shilling of the bonuses proposed is going to be paid to private capitalists unless the material for which the bonuses given is produced ?

Mr. FOWLER. — There is still an important distinction.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I should like to know what it is. Surely, none of us is guileless enough to believe that capitalists, any more than a State, are philanthropists, pure and simple ; and that they will venture their money for the benefit of the whole community, and without hope of return. Their first object will be to secure a return upon their investments. We know that the results to labour and industry will be practically the same, from whatever source the capital is derived. Surely, no honorable member will for a moment admit that the fear of a monopoly by private enterprise is the governing consideration, deterring him, at the present time, from supporting this Bill ? Surely, Parliament will be a sufficient guarantee as between the citizens of Australia and the possibility of a monopoly by any private enterprise. We read from time to time, and have some knowledge of the condition, of trusts in other lands ; but we know that they are not altogether an unmixed evil ; there are some good, as well as some evil results accruing from their operation, and in a self-governing community such as we have here, where we have the control of such operations in our own hands, are we going to be deterred from wealth production because of the fear of a monopoly being created in connexion with this industry ? Honorable members must not lose sight of the fact that we have only a section of the British navy standing between Australia and the destruction of her national interests to-day. If from any cause, which it is not difficult to imagine, the supply of iron and steel for manufactures in Australia were cut off, what would be our position ? We should not have sufficient metal to manufacture a gun or a rifle for our own requirements.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is not that a strong argument for a State undertaking the enterprise and not leaving it to private enterprise?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is not the question now. The object now is to get the industry established, and the information we have to date is that the States will not undertake the enterprise.

Mr. THOMAS.—Ought not the States to be compelled to do so under the circumstances?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is a peculiar thing that the all powerful State of New South Wales, in which there are large iron deposits, has not developed the industry. The three chief reasons given by the mover of this motion for referring the Bill to a select committee at the present time were the cost of working the deposits, the amount of capital required for the development of the industry, and the possibility of its development by a bonus without the necessity for a high duty. As to the first point, surely no honorable member who was privileged to listen to the address of the honorable member for Parramatta on the second reading of the Bill can overlook the fund of information which he gave to the House with regard to the deposits available, and the estimated cost of working them given by reliable authorities? Then as to the amount of capital required, we have information from different sources, and the total capital involved appears to be entirely a question as to the quantity proposed to be produced by the different companies supplying estimates. The honorable member for South Australia laid great stress upon the point that we can establish the industry without any bonus at all, and that there is a possibility of its being established merely by the imposition of a slight duty. The difficulty of dealing with the matter from that standpoint is that we all know that by the imposition of a duty at the outset, before the production of iron is established here, the cost of the raw material to the users of iron and steel will be at once increased. That is a difficulty the Government and the community generally are interested in avoiding, by giving a bonus upon the material produced until such time as iron and steel are produced in quantities approximating closely to the amount required for the Commonwealth. Personally, I regret to see the small trivial differences that divide those who are earnest in their desire to see this industry established. The difference of opinion simply amounts to this: that there is a section of honorable members who are very desirous that the States should embark in the enterprise. Personally, I have no objection whatever to that. I should be very glad indeed to see the States embark in this enterprise. But failing that, no action of mine will be taken to prevent private enterprise being allowed to develop this industry, because seeing that we have the raw material available, I look upon it as one of the most important and beneficent industries that could be established for the welfare of the community. I am prepared to support this Bill without any further enquiry whatever.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—Having to vote in this instance contrary to the party with which I generally vote, I must explain why I do so, and my explanation shall be brief. I believe in the bonus system, and so long as it appeared possible to secure that this industry should become a State monopoly, I worked in that direction. I was inclined to support this motion for a select committee so long as I believed that it was sought to be appointed in the interests of the bonus system, and in the interest of the industry being undertaken by the State. But the mover of the motion confesses that he believes in bonuses, and that this committee is simply a proposal to find out what is the best means of getting the greatest amount of good out of the bonus system.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not say that I believed in bonuses; not at all.

Mr. RONALD.—I understood the honorable member in his speech to-day to say that he proposed the committee in the interests of the bonus system. If I remember aright, there was first an effort made to give the States a monopoly of the industry; then an effort was made to give the States a monopoly of the industry for two years, and then an effort was made to give the States a monopoly of the industry for one year. Finally, in order to put the matter into the hands of the State, as I understood it, this select committee was to make enquiries as to what it would cost, and as to how a State could raise the money necessary to start ironworks. So long as the final object and aim in view is to carry out the development of the iron industry, whether by a State or by an individual, by the assistance of bonuses, I have been in favour of the line of action proposed. But when we have it avowed that this select committee is to be appointed to stifle and destroy the bonus system altogether, I say that I am against its appointment.

Mr. FOWLER.—Then the honorable member has not much faith in an enquiry.

Mr. RONALD.—So long as it is an honest, bona fide enquiry into facts that will help us to get the greatest amount of good out of the bonus system, I am for it, but when it is proposed as an inquiry into everything that will tend to destroy the bonus system, and is confessedly proposed for the purpose of delaying and destroying the Bonus Bill, I think I am justified in opposing it. I am against all kinds of hypocrisy.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Is the honorable member the only pure man in the labour party?

Mr. RONALD.—I speak only for myself.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Then the honorable member ought to leave the party. We do not want a saint.

Mr. RONALD.—I was explaining that I am against the proposed committee of inquiry, because it turns out to be a committee of destruction. Its avowed purpose is to kill the Bill. Honorable members have said that they desire only delay, but delays are dangerous, proverbially, and in this case delay will be very dangerous. The honorable member for South Australia asked where would be the danger and evil of delay in this case? It lies in the fact that at the present time we have hundreds and thousands of unemployed with whom we do not know what to do. Meanwhile there are a great many works which are depending upon the iron industry, and I say that at the present time, when we have the assurance of the Government that capital is ready to be launched in this great venture, it is criminal and sinful for us to stand in the way, in view of the present state of affairs in the industrial world. I am honestly and earnestly in favour of going on with the work without a moment's delay; and, therefore, I am against the appointment of a select committee. I do not believe in needless delay or in subterfuges. So long as there was an honest effort in the direction of a State monopoly, I was in favour of it; but I am against any subterfuge which has for its object the killing of the Bill. The bonus offer has been unfairly stated over and over again this afternoon. It has been stated that the proposal is to here and now vote away £250,000 or £300,000 of the public money. The fact has been obscured and hidden that payment is by results, and that not one penny of the taxpayers' money is compromised. The terms are—no iron, no bonus; and if we are to get our money's worth from the raw material brought from the bowels of the earth, we are, by opposing the Bill, standing in the way of the development of a native industry. It has been asked where the money is to come from with which to pay the bonus. But how much would it require to meet the initial expenses of a State monopoly. I favour a State monopoly, but I see no chance of that until we have money of our own to embark in the industry. Under the present circumstances, State monopoly would simply mean a monopoly of financiers in London, seeing that we should have to borrow the money in order to undertake the enterprise. That would be simply handing the industry over to capitalists in London, and leaving us as far as ever from State monopoly. If a select committee be appointed, will it make inquiries, and set, side by side, the expense of initiating a State monopoly, and the expense of giving bonuses to private individuals? If that were done, I believe it would be found that the initial expense of making a State monopoly would be infinitely greater than that of a bonus system which, from beginning to end, safe-guards the people's money by the principle of payment by results. I regard the bonus principle as the supplement or complement of the protectionist principle, of which I am an avowed advocate. On the hustings, I told the electors that the two went hand in hand, and I am only carrying out my pledges to my constituents, who are largely interested in the iron industry, when I endeavour to expedite the establishment of the bonus system by every possible means. The iron industry is the parent of a hundred and one other industries, and I shall do everything in my power to prevent one moment's delay in the realization of a proposal which will be a fruitful source of development throughout Australia.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania). — As a member of the labour party, I deem it my duty to protest against the charges which we have just heard made by a member of that party.

Mr. RONALD.—I have made no charges.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—It is a sad case, if out of the 24 members of the labour party, there is only one angelic saint.

The SPEAKER.—The question which we are discussing is the appointment of the select committee to inquire into the bonus system.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—That is so; but an aspersion has been cast on the labour party. The honoured leader of that party has submitted a motion which has for its object the acquisition of knowledge on the subject now before us. Without inquiry we should be darting "out in the blind." Like men drawing certain deductions from certain inferences, we should never be certain as to the result. A select committee is required in order to hear evidence from men who are thoroughly proficient in the iron business. By some people we are told that the establishment of the industry will mean the expenditure of £1,000,000, and by others we are told that the cost will be less; and inquiry is needed to clear up this and other points. Are we to allow a few private syndicators to use this bonus for the purpose of floating, in London, companies which it is admitted they cannot float now? The Hebrew children of London will not take on the speculation unless £250,000 is granted by this Parliament. I have offered to erect the works for £250,000, and I am so confident that I now repeat the offer. The proposal is to have a select committee composed of members, half of whom are from each side of the House. There are gentlemen living in the Commonwealth able to come before the committee, and, by their evidence, put us in possession of knowledge which we require. The honorable member for Southern Melbourne declared that he opposes a select committee, because the proposal looks like a conspiracy to defeat the investment of private capital. That honorable member charges the labour party with being conspirators; and I object to any honorable member, however humble in morality or intellectuality, being so charged by a man who is over-loaded with morality.

The SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Tasmania, Mr. O'Malley, must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. RONALD.—I made no charge.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The honorable member for Southern Melbourne declared that he would have voted for the appointment of a select committee, but for his belief that a committee meant a conspiracy to prevent iron works being established.

Sir MALCOLM MCEACHARN.—The honorable member for Southern Melbourne states the truth.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I should like to know where the honorable member for Melbourne obtains his knowledge.

Mr. RONALD.—The fact is avowed here.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Where is the evidence? It may be rumoured that the honorable member for Southern Melbourne will turn a somersault to-morrow, but there is no certainty on the point. No honorable member should make charges which he is not prepared to support. The honorable member for Melbourne stands as the very essence of dignity and honour, and is always upbraiding honorable members for making charges of the kind to which I now object. The honorable member asserts that there is a conspiracy; but I deny the statement, and contend that there is not an honorable member who would be guilty of such an offence. We hold that this is a matter which goes beyond private enterprise. The railways of the country are owned by the people, and iron works also ought to be owned by the people. Had I dreamt for one moment that this industry would get into the hands of a private syndicate—into the hands of Goulds, Vanderbilts, and Astors—I should certainly have voted against a duty of 15 per cent. on raw iron. It is proposed to tax the people of the country to the extent of £250,000 in order to enable a private syndicate to erect works. Then it is proposed to give a monopoly, and compel every man interested in primary production to contribute towards enriching a few syndicators. If ever Australia were at war, we should, under the proposals of the Government, have to go on our knees to these monopolists, as America had to do in her great war, and ask what they would take for their iron; and the price asked would not be governed by the cost of production, plus the cost of the raw material, but governed by the rates in New York, Montreal, and London. If the giving of this bonus be agreed to, it will go down to history as a stupendous act of infamy which plundered unborn millions of their inheritance.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—In addition to the ordinary responsibility which Parliament always has in connexion with any legislation, we have a further responsibility in this particular matter. During the whole debate we have had the very haziest information as to the exact standing of the gentlemen who are going to embark in this industry. Once before, on the floor of the House, I challenged those gentlemen to produce evidence that the money was actually available to carry on the work. I have had no reply to that challenge, which I now repeat. If the money be available, let evidence to that effect be produced; and to that extent, at least, we shall then know where we stand. But we know perfectly well that the gentlemen interested are going to the markets of the world with their leases, and that they intend to dangle this bonus before the wealthy classes in order to bring about the formation of a company. We are responsible to the extent that we offer a bonus, and the assumption is that this Parliament considers the industry to be one with every likelihood of success. But are we in a position to say we believe the industry, if initiated by the company, will be successful to the degree which the company have a right to expect? We have no evidence whatever to that effect. In the interests of the people who are prepared to enter into a bonâ fide industry of this kind, it is our duty to appoint a committee of investigation. If the proposed company be sound, and have reasonable ground for assuming that they will carry on the industry successfully, I fail to see what objection they can have to the appointment of a committee, which, if the evidence be thoroughly satisfactory, will materially assist them in obtaining the money they require. In this way the appointment of a select committee will accelerate the establishment of the industry, and on that ground alone the motion is justified. If the result of the inquiry is to satisfy this House that there is reasonable prospect of success, those who are floating the company will have no difficulty in inducing investors to subscribe the required money. For these reasons alone I believe a select committee ought to be appointed to proceed at once with the necessary investigation.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I do not think it necessary at this stage to repeat speeches in which I have already shown my strong opposition to socialism. The proposal for a select committee seems to have been made in consequence of the debate which took place in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly the other night on a motion that the Government of that State should pledge itself to take advantage of the Commonwealth Bonus Bill. Mr. Fitzpatrick suggested, not only on that occasion, but also when a member of a deputation to the State Minister of Public Works, that in addition to the iron industry, coal-mining, gold-mining, clothes-making, and, in fact, every other industry, should be brought under State control. The design of the labour party in New South Wales has therefore been clearly indicated. The labour party in this House are following their example, and having failed to carry out their socialistic ideas, are only consistent in doing their best to defeat the Bill, by shelving it for three or five years. This will be the result of referring it to a select committee. I am not so well able to arrive at the motive which has led the leader of the Opposition to support the proposal to refer the Bill to a select committee. Some honorable members have not dared to vote against the socialistic principle embodied in the proposal for the establishment of ironworks by the States Governments. They do not like socialism, but they are uncertain as to how their constituencies would regard their actions if they directly opposed it. The proposal for the appointment of a select committee, therefore, affords them a means of achieving their end without directly committing themselves. Some honorable members of the Opposition have professed to be absolutely ignorant of the details of the Government proposal and of the consequences which would follow the passing of the Bill now before us. They therefore say, they favour the appointment of a select committee in order that the fullest information may be placed in the hands of honorable members. I would, however, ask those honorable members who are now so anxious to obtain every information upon the subject now before us, why they did not realize the same necessity for a full investigation in connexion with the Pacific Island Labourers Act and the Immigration Restriction Act. Those were measures which involved the most important considerations affecting the relations of Australia with the Pacific and the Empire; the vast interests of sugar growers, merchants, ship-owners, and vast industrial and mercantile concerns, and yet when it was proposed that it should be referred to a select committee they argued that this House was quite competent to deal with the matter. In the present case honorable members should be just as capable of transacting the business before them without waiting for an investigation by a select committee. Their opinions are not likely to be altered by the conclusions arrived at by any committee. If honorable members feel that they cannot venture to openly vote against socialistic proposals, they are quite justified in supporting the appointment of a select committee, which will have the effect of shelving the Bill for some time. It would be preferable if they were to demonstrate that they had the courage of their opinions by voting directly against the proposal for the establishment of ironworks by the States Governments, and so at the outset crush a project which, if carried into effect, would create a monster that in time would swallow up every industry in the Commonwealth. Honorable members, whose sole reason for existence as members of this House is that they have devoted years to the study of political economy and social functions, should come out into the open and vote fearlessly in support of their opinions. I find that of those honorable members whom it is proposed to appoint as a select committee, the honorable member for Bland and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, the Minister for Trade and Customs, the honorable member for West Sydney, and the honorable member for Parramatta have declared themselves strongly in favour of nationalizing the iron industry.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Parramatta and the Minister for Trade and Customs voted against the proposal to nationalize the iron industry.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does the honorable member for Bland deny my statement that the honorable member for Parramatta stated that he was in favour of nationalizing the iron industry?

Mr. WATSON.—He voted against the proposal on the ground that it was not opportune.

Mr. CROUCH.—Whether that be so or not, the honorable member is reported at page 13612 of Hansard to have stated that he was in favour of nationalizing the iron industry. The Minister for Trade and Customs also similarly declared himself. The honorable member for Darling Downs stated that he was in favour of State control of the industry for two years, and that he could not go any further. The honorable member for Newcastle, as a member of the labour party, must support State socialism; and the honorable member for Kalgoorlie voted in favour of the State socialistic proposal of the honorable member for Bland. Therefore, eight members of a committee of ten have expressed themselves in favour of having the iron industry established as a State enterprise. I have not been able to trace any expression of opinion by the honorable member for Wannon, or the honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon. I have some doubt as to the views held by the latter honorable member, but I should judge that the honorable member for Wannon would be opposed to State socialism. If a fair and honest inquiry is to be made into the merits of the Government proposal, and as to the desirableness of the iron industry being established under State control, the committee should be differently constituted, and should not comprise eight members who are already committed to support State socialism.

Mr. WATSON.—Only four members of the proposed committee have voted in favour of nationalizing the iron industry.

Mr. CROUCH.—I should like to know which members of the committee are in favour of individualism?

Mr. WATSON.—No one in this House except the honorable member is in favour of individualism.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member is mistaken. I should like to see the honorable and learned member for Parkes appointed to the committee, if for that reason only. He would prove a useful member of such an investigating body, because he has devoted a large amount of attention to the study of political economy. If the committee is appointed, and is constituted as now proposed, it will not serve the interests which the honorable member for Bland seeks to advance, because it will not possess the confidence of this House to the same degree as if it were evenly balanced.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—It is scarcely necessary for me to say that I am a firm believer in the importance of establishing the iron industry. I do not think that the appointment of a select committee, as proposed, will postpone the accomplishment of that object. In Victoria the application of the bonus system to the manufacture of beet sugar was followed by disaster, and the loss of a large sum of money would probably have been obviated if an exhaustive inquiry had been made prior to the establishment of the Maffra Beet Sugar Works. If the committee proposed by the honorable member for Bland, after an impartial inquiry, recommend that we should adopt the bonus system, I shall support them. I do not agree with the honorable and learned member for Corio that the opinions of honorable members are fixed upon the subject of the establishment of the iron industry as a State monopoly, and I do not share his anxiety as to the results. Even if the personnel of the committee is not altered, only four members out of ten will stand committed to the nationalization of the iron industry, because the honorable member for Parramatta and the Minister for Trade and Customs voted against the proposal made by the honorable member for Bland. The honorable and learned member for Corio stated that it was singular that honorable members had not been willing to refer the Pacific Island Labourers Bill to a select committee for the purposes of investigation. I would point out, however, that the voice of the Australian people had been raised unmistakably in favour of the abolition of the kanaka traffic, and that in passing the measure referred to we were carrying out the specific mandate of the people. On the other hand, the question of granting bonuses for the establishment of the iron industry was not raised at one meeting out of fifty held in connexion with the Federal elections. If the select committee is appointed, I hope that it will be able to bring up a report early next session, and I do not fear that the result will be to seriously delay the passing of the measure now before us.

Mr. MACDONALD-PATERSON (Brisbane).—The question with which we are now dealing is a vast one, but I do not share the feeling of the honorable and learned member for Corio, with regard to responsibility which rests upon honorable members. Some few weeks ago I suggested to the Minister for Trade and Customs that it would be advisable to abandon this measure, seeing that the question of granting bonuses for the establishment of the iron industry was not brought before the public at the last election. The first I heard of it was in this Chamber some months ago, and I am sure that many honorable members are in a fog as to how they should deal with the present proposal. Personally I feel no responsibility in regard to it. How can any honorable member feel sure that he is representing his constituents by voting for or against the measure? He cannot possibly know what their views are. I regard the sudden appearance of this measure upon the political horizon as utterly unreasonable. When I spoke regarding this measure a few weeks ago, one or two honorable members thought that I expressed myself very warmly. When I feel strongly it is natural I should speak with some warmth. But I have no desire to speak warmly tonight. I wish honorable members to understand that I am speaking as coolly as if I were dealing with a business matter of my own, or with one in which I was acting as a trustee, and I say that there is absolutely no warrant for intruding this vast matter upon the House, either during the present session or the next. The only solution of the difficulty which has arisen—a solution satisfactory alike to the labour party, to members of the Opposition, and to Ministerial supporters—is to drop the Bill. I ask the Minister to give honorable members breathing time—time to examine the question thoroughly in all its bearings. It is only reasonable that they should be allowed an opportunity of conferring during the recess with the leading people in their constituencies, and of informing themselves—by means of public meetings—of what the opinions of the electors upon this matter really are. Let us come into contact with those who take an interest in it. If the Bill be passed, is the payment of the bonus to be limited to one State? From advices which I have received from experienced and reputable thinkers in Queensland, I know that they favour giving equal consideration to all the States which choose to embark upon this enterprise. I mention that fact to emphasize the desirableness of delaying the further consideration of this matter. If the Government refuse to drop the Bill—a course which I respectfully counsel them to follow—I shall support the motion of the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask if you will be good enough to put my motion in two parts—the first portion affirming the desirableness of referring the Bill to a select committee, and the second relating to the personnel of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If that is the desire of the House I shall do so.

Question—That the Bill be referred to a select committee—put. The House divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—With the permission of the House, I should like to add to the committee the names of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable and learned member for Illawarra. I understand that the Ministry have no objection to that course being adopted. If we do not add these names, there may be some difficulty about obtaining the attendance of a quorum at the sittings of the committee.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister for Home Affairs).—I wish to ask whether any further debate can take place at this stage?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No. The motion as a whole would have been put just now, but at the express desire of the House it was divided into two parts. It is competent, however, if six honorable members so desire, to require a ballot to be taken in connexion with the second part of the motion.

Question—That such committee consist of the Minister for Trade and Customs, Sir Edward Braddon, Mr. Joseph Cook, Mr. Winter Cooke, Mr. L. E. Groom, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Kirwan, Mr. Mauger, Mr. Watkins, Mr. McCay, Mr. Fuller and the mover—resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL.—PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS — PROROGATION — SOUTH AUSTRALIAN DRILL INSTRUCTORS—FEDERAL CAPITAL SITES.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

There is no other measure upon the business paper with which we can proceed this afternoon, and, under the circumstances, it is necessary for me to submit this motion, although I regret that we cannot employ the hours of an ordinary sitting which still remain to us upon the consideration of the measure that we shall receive from the Senate to-morrow. I again invite honorable members to make themselves familiar with that measure by consulting the proceedings in which the proposals that will be brought before us in regard to the Customs Tariff Bill are to be found, so that when the message is presented we may be able to proceed at once with its consideration. In this connexion it is very important that there shall be no more delay than is absolutely essential, and if honorable members will do the Government the favour of consulting those proceedings, I think that they will be fairly equipped for dealing with the Bill when it comes before us to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he does not shortly intend to set apart a day for the consideration of private members' business?

Mr. SALMON.—Next session.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I may be dead next session.

Mr. TUDOR.—Others will be left.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—But others will not undertake my work. I have important motions upon the business paper relating to the adoption of a system of old-age pensions and to the establishment of a reciprocal treaty with New Zealand. It is time that these matters were discussed. Another question which ought to be debated has reference to foreign steam-ships which are not paying their crews the same rate of wages that is being paid by the Australian steam-ship owners with whom they are competing, by carrying goods between Australian ports. Unless prompt action is taken in connexion with this matter, I fear that the Australian steam-ship owners will be compelled to reduce the wages of their hands to the level of those paid by their competitors.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (New South Wales).—I again wish to direct the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to the question of the prorogation. It appears to me that an effort might be made to close the present session before the close of the current month. It is possible that, apart from the financial Bills, we may get through most of the measures remaining to be dealt with during the current week. I know that we shall be glad to bring that about. I have learned, too, in an unofficial way, that the Treasurer will not be able to make his Budget speech until nearly the close of the month, but it seems to me that a big effort should be made to close the session this month. Paragraphs have appeared in the newspapers which speak of the possibility of the session being prolonged until the end of October, but that would be a great calamity. We have now been sitting for a longer period than any House of Parliament with which I am acquainted has sat during late years, and, therefore, I think that a supreme effort should be made to close the session this month. I hope that the House will help the Government to do that.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—This afternoon I asked the Acting Minister for Defence whether the salaries of the drill instructors who have been sent to South Australia are to be regarded as new expenditure, since the officers in question have been transferred from New South Wales to South Australia without being re-enlisted under the laws of the latter State. As a matter of constitutional principle I wished to know whether the salaries of these drill instructors are to be debited to South Australia as the salaries of transferred officers or as new expenditure. The Minister replied that the salaries were to be regarded not as new but as transferred expenditure, and were to be debited, not to New South Wales, but to South Australia, although the officers have not been re-enlisted under the South Australian Act. The view I hold is that if the officers have not been re-enlisted under the South Australian Act, they remain under the New South Wales Act, because there is no Federal Act. If they do not remain under the New South Wales Act, they are not enlisted at all, because they have not been re-sworn under the South Australian Act; but if they remain under the New South Wales Act, and the expenditure is not new expenditure, it must be debited to New South Wales. If they have been transferred to South Australia without being re-enlisted, and the expenditure is not to be debited to New South Wales, it must be regarded as new expenditure, because it is expenditure, not for the maintenance of the department as it existed in South Australia at the time of its transfer to the Commonwealth, but expenditure in addition to that. I do not know how the Minister came to the conclusion that the expenditure is not new expenditure, or that, if transferred expenditure, it can be debited to South Australia instead of to New South Wales. I mention the matter because I am not satisfied that the opinion given by the Minister is correct in law.

Mr. MACDONALD-PATERSON (Brisbane).—When it was arranged in May last that a trip, as it was called, should be taken to view the suggested sites for a federal capital, many honorable members declined to go, because they felt that by going they would risk their health. It was understood, however, that a subsequent trip would be arranged to meet their convenience, and I should therefore like to know from the Minister for Home Affairs, not later than next week, what arrangements he intends to make with that object. There are about 50 honorable members who were not able to take part in the last trip. The average number of those who took part in that trip was eighteen or twenty, the maximum number present at any one time being 28, while only thirteen or fourteen visited all the sites.

Under these circumstances, I ask, on behalf of myself and other honorable members, if the Minister will take the matter into his consideration, and let us know as soon as practicable what conveniences he proposes to place at the disposal of the 50 members who have not yet visited these sites.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister for Home Affairs).—I can reply to the question of the honorable member for Brisbane without waiting until next week. A great deal of trouble and some expense was undertaken to give members of both the House of Representatives and the Senate opportunities to visit the suggested sites for the federal capital, and at the time I tried to induce as many as I could to take advantage of it. A larger number of honorable members have visited those sites than the honorable member for Brisbane appears to think, and there are not many who have not visited some of them. That being so, I do not think it should be expected that another trip will be arranged for. But if a few honorable members who have not visited the sites desire to make an informal visit, facilities could be given to enable them to do so in their own time. I am disappointed that more honorable members did not make it convenient to take advantage of the opportunity which was provided for them in May. All sorts of wild statements as to the cost of the inspection by the Senate and the House of Representatives have appeared in the newspapers, but my secretary informs me that the amount expended upon the last trip will be considerably under the sum voted by this House. The honorable member for Gippsland is, of course, unable to get about as easily as most other honorable members, and he told me that he would like to visit the various sites in company with six or seven other members in a quiet way. I think that under the circumstances I should be quite justified in affording an opportunity for seven or eight members to do that.

Mr. WATSON.—If facilities are provided for any, they should be provided for all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think it can be expected that arrangements should be made for another series of special trains. What I suggest is that, if honorable members who have not visited the proposed sites, are willing to avail themselves of the ordinary trains, facilities can be provided for travelling from the nearest railway stations to the various sites. The honorable member for Gippsland wishes to travel from Bombala to the border, and thence to Sale. I do not think it would be possible to drive a coach and four through that district. For the examination of that country the lightest and strongest vehicles obtainable would be required. However, if honorable members will inform me when they wish to go in the way I describe, I shall try to make the necessary arrangements. The work of my department and of Ministers has been very heavy of late; but I intend to submit at the next meeting of the Cabinet, or at the following meeting, a proposal for dealing further with the capital site question. What I desire to do is to get my colleagues to agree to a reduction in the number of the proposed sites. There are only three or four which are really open for consideration. I should like to see those sites placed before Parliament for consideration, in such a way that honorable members can add to their number any they think fit. That being done, I propose to submit the names of certain experts to form a committee to report upon various subjects connected with the question—with which only experts can deal—and to have the whole matter ready for submission to Parliament next session. With regard to the comments of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, upon the answer to his question this afternoon, I may say that I took legal advice upon the subject. So far as I can see, there is only this in his point, that the instructors, not having been sworn in under the South Australian Act, there is a doubt as to which State—South Australia or New South Wales—should pay their salaries at the present time. But the difficulty he raises can be overcome at any moment by swearing in the men under the South Australian Act. Personally, I do not suppose that New South Wales would object very much to have to bear the whole charge herself.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The people of South Australia do not ask for that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They are making a lot of trouble over what seems to me a small matter. I think the question might fairly be left alone now, because I have asked, in as emphatic a manner as I could, for certain information in regard to it which has not yet been obtained.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—When does the honorable member expect to get it?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The General Officer Commanding has been in Sydney for some little time past, so that I have not had an opportunity to speak with him on the subject, but I hope that this burning question to South Australia will be settled without undue delay. I have armed myself with all information available, and it appears to me that if the defence forces of Australia are to be put upon one footing—and that must be done sooner or later—the services of extra drill instructors are necessary in South Australia to bring the men of that State up to the same standard as exists in the larger States.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—We deny that that is necessary.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In point of strength the instructing staff in South Australia is materially below that in Victoria and New South Wales. There is no desire on my part to force upon South Australia this terrible outrage of sending these instructors there, and I shall be only too glad to find that her forces are so highly instructed that there is no necessity for them to have further instruction, and that I can remove some of the men to whom great exception has been taken. I venture to think, however, that it will mean their discharge, because they could not fairly be taken back to the other States. Already 40 odd have been discharged, and some seven or eight have just returned from South Africa. I have given instructions that the latter are to be continued in the offices which they hold, and that as vacancies occur among the present instructors they are to take the vacant places. I do not wish the men who went to South Africa in answer to a call to find on their return that their places are taken, and that they are to be thrown upon their own resources. By the non-filling in other ways of vacancies as they arise, I hope to absorb in a legitimate way the men who have come from South Africa instead of discharging them as they otherwise would have to be.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—No complaint was made by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, about what the Acting Minister of Defence was doing. I think that honorable members are quite satisfied that the honorable and learned member is taking a right course in endeavouring to get an answer to the queries which he put. We are waiting until the answers are given. I protest against the suggestion in the Minister's remarks that South Australia asks New South Wales to pay these drill instructors.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say that.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable gentleman insinuated that if South Australia was not prepared to pay the men, he had no doubt that New South Wales, out of her large-minded generosity, would do so. No objection has been made by South Australia to the payment of the men if it can be shown that it is desirable that they should stay there. The objection has been to what is believed to be an unnecessary expenditure. If the Minister would not make these somewhat taunting suggestions he would do something to allay the irritation which has been caused by the action taken so far.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (In explanation).—The honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, has accused me of using taunting expressions. There was nothing further from my mind than that. What I said was that if an objection were taken by South Australia to the payment of these instructors, and as the honorable and learned member, Mr. Glynn, held they really belonged to New South Wales, the latter State might not object to pay them for the time being.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 5.49 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 3 September, 1902.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers:—

Torpedo Boats, retention of: Report of Board of Officers.

Ordered to be printed.

Commissions in Royal Australian Artillery: Alterations of Regulations.

Sugar and Drawback Regulations.

POST AND TELEGRAPH RATES BILL.

Bill returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

RETIREMENT OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Referring to his reply to Senator Lt.-Col. Neild on the 27th August, will the Minister explain why officers of the partially-paid and volunteer forces in New South Wales are being compulsorily retired by the authority of the Regulations of the 6th May, 1902, which are said by him to have been framed under the Military and Naval Forces Regulation Act, 1871?

2. Is it not a fact that the said Act relates exclusively to the fully-paid or professional forces, and has no connexion whatever with the partially-paid and volunteer forces?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions, which will cover also the other question of which he has given notice, are as follows:—

In the original Order in Council the authority conferred by the Volunteer Force Regulation Act of New South Wales 1867, to make such regulations regarding the volunteer and partially-paid forces in New South Wales, was not cited. Since the reply given to Senator Lt.-Col. Neild on the 27th August, this omission has been rectified; but the failure to quote the Act would not affect the legality of the Regulation.

SMALL ARMS AMMUNITION.

Senator HIGGS asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice:—

Is there any provision in the contracts for the supply of small arms ammunition stipulating that the said ammunition shall be manufactured within the Commonwealth?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

Yes. To be made from cordite supplied by the Government as far as the capacity of the output by the Colonial Ammunition Company is concerned. Ammunition in excess of this output is ordered through the War Office.

SILVER COINAGE.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Have any steps been taken by the Prime Minister at the Premiers' Conference in London to obtain for the Commonwealth the right of coining silver for our own requirements?

2. If so, has the right been conceded?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

The subject came under the consideration of the Premiers' Conference in London, but the Government is not yet in a position to state the result of the negotiations.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS.

Ordered (on the motion of Senator PEARCE)—

That a return of the attendances of members of the Senate be compiled, showing the number of sittings since the opening of the session up to 29th August, and the attendances thereat.

GOVERNMENT HOUSES: EXPENDITURE.

Debate resumed from 29th August (vide page 15601), on motion by Senator O'CONNOR:—

That an expenditure upon Government Houses of £5,500 a year, as submitted in the statement laid upon the table of the Senate on 20th August, 1902, is approved, during the term of office of the next Governor-General.

Upon which Senator DAWSON had moved—

That the following words be added to the motion:—"but this House deprecates the maintenance of two Government Houses, and suggests that the expenditure on Sydney Government House be limited to the term of three years."

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—It is such a long time since the session was opened that I think some honorable senators are losing sight of the position of things at that time, and of events which occurred before or about the time of the inauguration of the Commonwealth. We find that suggestions are being made very freely that New South Wales is straining every effort to get advantages, terms, money, or something or other to which she is not entitled. I think nothing is further than that from the mind of every member of the New South Wales delegation, and certainly I know nothing in the public utterances of men in New South Wales to warrant any such supposition. It is worth while to note that with regard to the reception and entertainment of the Governor-General, New South Wales went to enormous expense. Since we adjourned last week I have looked up the figures in regard to Government House. I find that prior to the arrival of Lord Hopetoun — in 1897-8-9 — about £10,000 was spent in putting in an electric installation and effecting various repairs. Immediately prior to the inauguration of the Federation Government House was in good order. But, notwithstanding that fact, the Government of that State spent in the year ending 30th June, 1901, a further sum of £22,000, chiefly in making additions and providing further furniture and new stabling, and so on. Not only did New South Wales spend £22,000 in that year, but this valuable property—which, with its expensive grounds and water frontages, is believed to represent fully £500,000—has been put under the care of the Federal Government for the use of the Governor-General and to maintain the dignity of the Commonwealth. The State has parted, for the time being at any rate, with its Government House, and as a consequence of that act, it has had to rent a property for its own Governor, and to lay out a large sum—I think it is £7,700—in furnishing the new place, which is called Cranbrook. As a consequence of the changes that have been made, I find that New South Wales has paid altogether £30,000, and now we are told, when a small amount of about £2,000 is suggested to be spent, that she is trying to get the better of the Commonwealth. Surely that is a statement which would not be made were all the facts known. I find objections taken to this proposal by honorable senators who are so desirous of being fair in all their dealings, that I can only think that their apprehensions arise from an incomplete knowledge of the facts surrounding the business. Out of this vote of £5,500, the sum of £500 would come back to the various services, because it includes some hundreds of pounds for postage, and a considerable amount for telephones. If anything were wanting to show the ludicrousness of that statement in regard to New South Wales, I might point out that towards this vote of £5,500 she will have to contribute the solid sum of £2,000. So that, while she has acted very generously in the past with regard to the Governor-General and the Commonwealth at large, she has no chance at present of obtaining anything. The small amount of £2,000 will all be expended on a valuable property which, representing a capital value of half-a-million, has been lent to the Commonwealth free of rent and other charges. This matter has, to some extent, been mixed up with the question of the capital, and statements have been made in some quarters which indicate a willingness to dispute the rights of New South Wales, or, at any rate, to unduly defer the execution of the requirements of the Constitution with regard to the capital. Certainly in New South Wales there is a suspicion which, perhaps, has been considerably increased by the dispute that has arisen with regard to this small amount. Last year, I believe, the Governor-General did reside in Government House, Sydney, from the time of the inauguration of the Commonwealth, on the 1st January, until some six months afterwards. He used the place on various occasions subsequently. Therefore, I cannot see for the life of me how it is possible to raise any objections from the point of view of the Commonwealth to the small demand which is now made. If I thought for one moment that the sum in question savoured of undue expenditure—if I thought it would commit the Commonwealth to a waste of public money—I should be one of the first to oppose it. But I do not take that view of the matter. As was stated last week, if the amount that is proposed for the Sydney establishment were omitted, probably by nearly as much would the expenditure upon the other establishment have to be increased. As the total amount is only £5,500, and compares for economy so markedly with what has been spent since the inauguration of federation, I do not think that any just grounds can be found for complaint in this direction when we notice that the amount before us is made to apply only during the term of the next Governor-General, and that it is desirable that the terms under which the new Governor-General comes to Australia shall be fully known. I indulge the hope, not only that the motion will be carried by a substantial majority if it goes to a vote, but that Senator Dawson will see his way under all the circumstances to withdraw his amendment, and that the proposal of the Government will be carried unanimously on the voices.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I wish to enter my protest against the proposal to keep up a separate establishment for the Governor-General in Sydney, just as I should enter a protest if it were proposed to keep up a separate establishment in Adelaide. In fact, if there is any justification for a second establishment of the kind, Adelaide has a prior claim in the present instance over Sydney, because the Acting Governor-General is also the State Governor of South Australia. There might, therefore, have been some justification for South Australia saying that in view of the peculiar circumstances in which her State Governor has been promoted to the higher position of Governor-General, she considered that Adelaide should have his presence, and that a separate residence should be provided for him by the Commonwealth in the State which has been deprived of his services on account of the sudden emergency that has arisen. But I am against the up-keep of two separate Government-houses in two separate States, because it seems to me that if we adopt that plan, we must have a residence for the Governor-General in every State. I could understand the proposition being put forward that there should be two residences for the Governor-General on the ground of health—a summer residence and a winter residence. That might be reasonable, but I cannot understand the plea that there should be a residence for the Governor-General in New South Wales and another in Victoria. There is nothing in the Constitution which seems to provide any reasonable ground for that plea which is not put forward for reasons of health or convenience. In fact, everyone admits that it would be very inconvenient to the Governor-General to keep up two establishments, one in Sydney, and one in Melbourne, and I am sure that if the Governor-General himself were consulted he would be perfectly satisfied to have the one residence, and to remain in Melbourne, with occasional visits to the other States. The New South Wales senators are taking up a position which is opposed to the interests of their own State, in advocating what is now proposed. That position militates against giving New South Wales what the Constitution lays down that she should get as a matter of right, namely, the settlement in her favour of the federal capital question. If they were to advocate an early settlement of that question, and if the site were chosen, they would have some excuse for maintaining that the Governor-General should have a separate residence in Sydney, because they could then point out that the capital, for some years to come, would practically be a bush town, and that there was need to have a residence for the Governor-General in a central city like Sydney. But that argument cannot be put forward now. Melbourne is just as civilized and as far advanced in the social scale as is Sydney, and, if the Governor-General is looked upon as the head of our social order, as Senator Dobson so lovingly puts it, he can just as well carry out his duties in Melbourne as in Sydney, although there might be many good arguments against asking him to reside in a back-country town like Yass or Wagga Wagga. I was very much surprised to hear the pessimistic remarks of Senator Dobson regarding the selection of the capital site. He said that he hoped the matter would be postponed for twenty years. I remember the honorable and learned senator making an enthusiastic speech at Bombala which led the people there to believe that he would move heaven and earth to have Bombala chosen as the capital site at the earliest opportunity.

Senator DOBSON.—Do not misquote me, please.

Senator PEARCE.—I very distinctly object to the view taken by Senator Dobson that lavish expenditure on the Governor-General's establishment is necessary, because His Excellency is the head of our social order—the order of aristocracy, as he puts it. He has pointed out that there is an aristocracy of labour and an aristocracy in other branches of life. Which particular part of labour Senator Dobson designates the aristocracy of labour I do not know.

Senator DOBSON.—It is not my phrase.

Senator PEARCE.—It certainly is not a phrase that has originated amongst working people. I object to Senator Dobson's assumption that the class of people amongst whom the Governor-General moves, and whom he entertains, are the aristocracy of intellect, which is practically what he says. Nor do I assent to his proposition that by voting this sum of money we are encouraging intellect and merit. Every one knows that the aristocracy referred to is an aristocracy of wealth, and not of intellect; and that by encouraging a lavish expenditure on one or two Government Houses, we are merely voting money for the entertainment of a wealthy aristocracy, and not for the encouragement of an aristocracy of intellect or of merit. Looking at the question from that point of view, it is merely a matter of whether the aristocracy of Toorak shall have this money spent amongst them, or whether it shall be divided amongst the aristocracy of Toorak and the aristocracy of Potts' Point. I should not have touched upon this phase of the question had not the honorable and learned senator alluded to it, and contended that by voting this money we shall encourage intellect and merit, which reign supreme in the assumed higher orders of our social scale. Senator Gould brought forward an astonishing contention. I am sorry that he did not explain more fully to us the theory according to which he urges that by permitting this expenditure of money in Sydney we shall be benefiting the people of Sydney, and consequently benefiting the whole Commonwealth. Why does not the honorable and learned senator follow out that argument to its logical conclusion? If it is right, on the same ground it might be proper to propose to pay every member of the Federal Parliament £10,000 a year, because undoubtedly the members of the Parliament could spend that money just as well as could the Governor-General. According to Senator Gould's argument such an expenditure would be a benefit to the community. The argument only needs to be carried to its logical conclusion for its absurdity to be seen, and for one to realize the folly of voting money to be expended in this manner in the belief that, by so doing, we are conferring a benefit on the whole Commonwealth. I do not think that any reasonable advocate of this expenditure would put it upon those grounds; and if those are the best reasons for supporting the up-keep of a second establishment in Sydney, they are very shallow and hollow indeed. Senator Pulsford's plea is that because New South Wales has spent something like half-a-million of money upon the establishment of Government House, Sydney, and upon its up-keep, the Commonwealth Parliament should bear the burden; because she has built a white elephant in Sydney, the Commonwealth Government should come to her rescue, pay the interest on the money, and keep up the establishment. If we are to bear the burden of State extravagance the principle should be applied all round. We have had some lavish expenditure in Western Australia. On the same grounds, therefore, that State should come to the Federal Parliament and say—"Here is a department upon which we have wasted money; we admit that we have been extravagant, but the interest has to be met and the up-keep of the establishment has to be paid. We therefore ask you to take it over because it is an extravagance, and we find that it is a burden upon the community." It is very significant that Senator Dobson and others who are so very enthusiastic in regard to any vote for the up-keep of vice-regal magnificence, and to whom nothing is too preposterous and extravagant, but everything is right, when it is proposed to vote moneys in such directions, are the same honorable senators who wailed about the burden sought to be imposed upon the people of the Commonwealth when we were voting in favour of £2 2s. a week as a minimum being paid to the public servants under the Public Service Bill. That action was estimated to involve an expenditure of £40,000 to the whole Commonwealth—not much more than the vice-regal establishment cost for the past year. The honorable senators to whom I allude are perfectly willing to vote for a Governor-General's establishment, even if it costs £40,000, but they deprecate a similar expenditure when it is for the benefit of those who actually earn the money we pay to them, and who in many cases—in the State Senator Dobson represents, for instance—were underpaid. It is a pity that these honorable senators, before they cast a vote designed to benefit those who do not need it, do not remember the votes they cast against the interests of those who had need of the money it was proposed to spend upon them. Strange to say, the opposition to the proposal for a living wage to the civil service came from the very honorable senators who are now prepared to support extravagance in other quarters for officials who generally have large private incomes in addition to the salaries provided by the Commonwealth. I believe that the people of the Commonwealth are indifferent as to whether the Governor-General entertains or does not entertain. They are indifferent as to whether he is the leader of social life or whether he is unknown in social circles. All they are concerned about is that the Governor-General shall carry out efficiently the duties of his official position. It is no part of the duty of Parliament to vote public moneys for the ostensible purpose of creating a social caste in our community, and of providing social entertainments limited to that caste. I believe that there is a spirit of reasonableness taking possession of the public mind in regard to this question, and that it is that which has caused the trouble during the last year or two. The public are beginning to say—"Why should we vote money for the purpose of keeping up a social standard? Why should public money be voted for the purpose of inculcating ideas of social caste amongst the people." If there are a number of people who consider that intellectually, or from a monetary point of view, they are superior to the rest of the community, they have a right to pay for that opinion. They should not ask the public to pay for these little social frivolities. I must express my disappointment that, following on the establishment of the Commonwealth, the plan laid down by the leaders of the various conventions has not been observed—that the States Parliaments have not followed up the inauguration of the Commonwealth by placing the appointment of the States Governors and the maintenance of their establishments upon a reasonable and economical basis. The States Governments could have mitigated much of the dissatisfaction which has been caused during the last year if, upon the accomplishment of federation and the appointment of a Governor-General to represent the Imperial Government here, they had requested the Home authorities to give them permission to nominate some well-known resident for the position of Governor in each State. That would have resulted in a great saving.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Does the honorable senator think that would have been desirable?

Senator PEARCE.—I think so. It would have resulted in considerable savings throughout the States, and we should then have been able to reasonably ask the people to sanction a larger expenditure upon the establishment of the Governor-General. In view of the fact that the establishments of the States Governors are costing as much as they did prior to federation, we must see that we are actually placing an additional burden upon the shoulders of the people. The leaders of the federal movement told us that upon the establishment of the Commonwealth we should be able to reduce the scale of the up-keep of the States vice-regal establishments. They told us that we should have one Governor-General to represent the Imperial Government in Australia, and that the positions of States Governors could be filled by the Chief Justice, or some other prominent person in each State. In Canada they do not import all their State Governors from England, and the occupants of those offices are not expected to keep up style on the scale of magnitude demanded of them here.

Senator CHARLESTON.—But their Constitution is very different from ours.

Senator PEARCE.—The Federal Constitution does not affect the position of States Governors. That is a matter with which States Parliaments have to deal and the States Parliaments could have assisted the Federal Government by effecting savings in regard to the appointment of their Governors.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—They have done so.

Senator PEARCE.—I cannot see any indication of it. In Western Australia, at all events, they have not done so. There the Governor is receiving the same salary as before federation, and he is still provided with two residences.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—The other States have effected savings.

Senator PEARCE.—We know that ambition brings to the front the best men in public life. If the position of a State Governor were within the reach of our public men, it would be an additional inducement for the best men in the community to enter upon a public career. It would be known that after a man had served his country well and faithfully for a certain time, the position of State Governor would be within his reach. I am not arguing that we should have elective States Governors, although personally I consider they ought to be elective. The names of persons fitted for the position should be submitted to the Imperial Government, either by the Federal or the State Ministry, and the office would then be placed within the reach of public men of proved probity. Why should such men be shut out from it when any party leader in England is eligible for the position, no matter how incompetent he may be? If he happens to be in the confidence of his party, and has friends able and willing to pull the strings for him, he can secure an appointment. The States Parliaments might very well take notice of this difficulty, and assist the Federal Legislature by effecting savings in their expenditure upon the States Government-houses, and placing the appointment of States Governors upon a different basis. Let the Imperial Government be represented by one Governor-General. The Governor-General's office should also be placed upon merely an official basis, and those who wish to make the Governor-General the head of their social order should dip their hands into their pockets and pay for it.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—Senator Pearce points out that the State from which he comes provides two official residences for its Governor, but he objects to the Governor-General,—whom he recognises to be an official occupying a higher plane than that of a State Governor—being provided for in a similar way. According to the honorable senator, it is all very well for the States Governors to have two places of abode, but the Governor-General must be restricted to one. This seems to be his view, because in a lengthy speech, in which he scarcely touched the question before the Chair, but dealt with a number of side issues such as elective State Governors and other matters, the honorable senator, whilst advocating a reduction of the expenditure in connexion with the appointment of State Governors, did not point out that he entertained the slightest objection to each of the States Governors having two residences. I do not suppose there is a State in the Commonwealth the Governor of which has not a second abode.

Senator PEARCE.—The State Parliament have to deal with that matter.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think that the remarks I have made are perfectly justified by the speech made by the honorable senator. Senator Pearce also bases his opposition to the Government proposal upon a question of social distinction and social expenditure. I do not care a snap of the fingers for either of those reasons. I do not stand here either to support or to oppose the proposition from any such stand-point. In passing, however, I may point out to the honorable senator that entertainments of an official character, such as those given by Governors and Governor-Generals, provide a large amount of employment, and put many an honestly-earned pound into the pockets of the drivers of licensed vehicles, who make a harvest in connexion with them. This is, therefore, not a question alone of public expenditure, but also of private expenditure. I do not suppose that in either Melbourne or Sydney a vice-regal entertainment is given without the cabmen of the city earning £200 or £300. Perhaps they earn a great deal more. I know that the hansom cabs of Sydney number something over 1,000, and that when an entertainment is given at Government House, it is almost impossible to hire a cab for love or money. Such entertainments involve useful expenditure for the benefit of people whose hard earnings are of the greatest consequence to them. I am alluding to these matters only because Senator Pearce expressed regret that Senator Gould had not supported his arguments with illustrations; I am supplying what occur to me as illustrations. For instance, has the honorable senator considered the amount of money which the florists earn in connexion with vice-regal entertainments, and that they are of great value to the classes who are busily engaged from week to week? I shall not pursue this line of argument further than to say that in decorations, clothing, and artificial adornment both of persons and buildings, there is every opportunity for expenditure, in connexion with these entertainments, that benefits those who earn their daily bread by the nimbleness of their fingers or the sweat of their brow. I support this motion, however, upon entirely different grounds. I support it upon the grounds of public good faith, and that being so, I think that the vote which I shall give will stand upon a much more substantial basis than the vote which may be given because of any reason connected with either vice-regal expenditure or vice-regal entertainment. I do not attach importance to the proposition that these gatherings or entertainments tend to any intellectual advancement. The honorable senator who made use of that expression no doubt had his reasons for doing so, but they do not appeal to me, and I am not going to support the Government on that ground. I support them upon the ground that to refuse the Governor-General a residence in Sydney would be an absolute and positive breach of the spirit of the Constitution.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The Constitution, if it makes any reference to the matter at all, says that the Governor-General shall not reside in Sydney.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The place of residence of the Governor-General is to a large extent bound up with the question of the position of the capital. I admit that the Governor-General can live where the capital is not, but I do say that it is an undoubted obligation that the Governor-General shall have a permanent residence in the State which is designed by the Constitution to supply the federal capital. It seems to me that I need not rely upon any arguments of my own. Certainly I am not going to rely upon my own personal assertions. I prefer to call as a witness a high legal authority. I propose to quote from the records a question and answer relating to this subject which embodied at the time the opinions of the Vice-President of the Executive Council, then as now Counsel for the Crown, and one of the framers of the Constitution. I propose to quote the honorable and learned senator's opinion given to the Government of New South Wales, and upon which that Government acted in providing a separate House for the State Governor, in order to leave what is known as Government House, Sydney, for the use of the Governor-General. The giving of that opinion induced many thousands of people to vote for the adoption of the Constitution who had previously voted in the opposite way.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The Constitution says that the seat of government shall be anywhere in New South Wales, except within 100 miles radius of Sydney.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I know all about that, but I am going to quote the opinion of the Vice-President of the Executive Council—

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Does the honorable senator know that that opinion has been questioned?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It happens to be the only opinion that I have before me, and I intend to give it for what it is worth. I think there is no member of the Senate who, if he were entering into expensive litigation, would not feel his position very highly fortified if the favorable opinion of the learned gentleman whom I am about to quote were given in his behalf. This is what the honorable and learned gentleman said with reference to section 125 of the Commonwealth Constitution.

That section, which takes effect the moment the Constitution comes into force, enacts, in mandatory terms, that the seat of government of the Commonwealth shall be in New South Wales. From that moment it becomes impossible that the seat of government can legally be anywhere outside of New South Wales.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable and learned senator say that it shall be in Sydney?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If the honorable senator will repress his transports a little I will try to go through with this quotation. The last paragraph of the opinion to which I refer runs thus—

For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that, under no circumstances can the Federal Executive or any other authority, legally fix the seat of government of the Commonwealth out of New South Wales.

Upon that I wish to base this argument. Though I admit that Sydney itself is barred as the seat of the capital, still it is more in consonance with the Constitution and the ideas which actuated the people in the adoption of the Constitution that the seat of government should be in New South Wales than that it should be in Victoria, even temporarily. Of necessity there is, I submit, a greater right to expect that the Governor-General shall reside somewhere in New South Wales than in Victoria. I am raising no objection to his residence in Victoria. I have not a word to suggest in opposition to that. By all means, for so long as the Federal Parliament meets in Victoria the Governor-General should have a residence in that State, and I shall always be found voting for it. No member of the Senate, therefore, and no person outside can have the slightest reason for supposing that I am narrow-minded in this matter. But I think that, on the ground of public good faith, there should be no objection to the Governor-General having a residence, not as the seat of government, but at least a residence in that State which is under the Commonwealth Constitution the proper State for the capital of the Commonwealth. Some portion of New South Wales is designated as the site of the capital, and surely in that State, selected by the Constitution as the proper State in which to establish the capital for all time, it must be right that the Governor-General should have, not a suite of rooms in an hotel or a boarding-house, but an official residence that he can visit and reside in at such times as are convenient to himself and to the public service. While I am not going to discuss seriously a proposal that is not before us, and which could not be put before us except by means of an amendment which nobody would support, I think I am justified in submitting for the consideration of honorable senators that there is a great deal of difference between a proposal to provide an official residence for the Governor-General in every State, and a proposal that he should be provided with an official residence first of all where the Federal Parliament meets, and, secondly, in the State designated by the Constitution as the proper place for the permanent capital of the Commonwealth. The difference between the two propositions is, in my opinion, so vast that, as the lawyers say, it is hardly arguable. May I also say something, not only on behalf of the maintenance of the Constitution, but on behalf of good faith being kept with the people of New South Wales. I do not know how much of the proposed expenditure of £5,500 a year is to be allocated to Government House, Sydney, and how much in respect of Government House, Melbourne.

Senator CHARLESTON.—£2,077 for Sydney Government House.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I find that, according to the Customs duties now being paid by the different States, New South Wales will pay fully one-third of the whole, or £1,800 out of the £5,500 as their proportion.

Senator Major GOULD.—And they will also have to pay their proportion of the expense of maintaining the Government House, Melbourne.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Exactly. The people of New South Wales will have to pay one-third of that. One-third of the amount of £5,500 is something over £1,800, leaving £3,700 to be divided amongst the other five States. When the brunt of the expenditure will fall upon New South Wales surely the people of that State are entitled to have some little consideration shown them. Though I do not desire to enter upon matters which may possibly raise ill-feeling, I am surely entitled to point out that in some respects this debate has given very little evidence of the great and beneficent federal spirit of which we heard so much while the votes of the people were being asked in support of federation. I would ask where are the evidences of that spirit in some of the speeches which we have heard, not from any class or party in the Chamber, but from individual senators for the objection to what is proposed has come as much from my own bench as from any other part of the Chamber? New South Wales has given up more in connexion with the adoption of the Federal Constitution than any other State. It is the only State of the whole group that abandoned a national policy, confirmed by every general election which had taken place from the time the colony enjoyed the blessings, or otherwise, of responsible government. The people of New South Wales, according to the latest returns, have to bear to-day, for the purposes of federation, a taxation through the customs amounting to something between £1,000,000 and £1,200,000, or in round figures £100,000 a month of additional taxation for the benefits of federation. We know that when that taxation has reached the home and the housekeeper, it has been increased in various ways, until instead of being £100,000 per month, it is not less than £150,000 per month. That is the price the people of New South Wales are paying for federation. If we take the £1,800,000 a year of additional expenditure and divide it amongst the 400,000 male wage-earners of New South Wales—because it is of no use distributing taxation of this kind over every person in the community—if we place it upon the backs of those who have to pay the piper and keep the house going, it means that every one of the 400,000 male wage-earners in New South Wales has to bear an additional tax of £4 10s. per annum placed upon him. If this is one of the burdens we have undertaken in the interests of federation and with the distinct provision in the Constitution that the capital of the Commonwealth shall be located within the boundaries of New South Wales, what kind of federal spirit is that which induces honorable senators to say—"We will not permit the Governor-General to live within the borders of New South Wales except at an hotel or lodging-house"—because that is what it comes to? The Governor-General cannot be the guest of the States Governors except to a very limited extent; the position would not be tenable, and the issues involved would not be tolerable for either the Governor-General or the States Governors. Unless he is provided with an official residence in New South Wales the Governor-General cannot live, except for very brief periods, away from Melbourne. He may pay occasional visits to New South Wales, but if there is to be anything like a lengthy residence in that State we must have an official house provided for him. I do not go into the question dealt with by Senator Pulsford in connexion with the outlay upon Government House, Sydney, but the honorable senator was misunderstood by Senator Pearce. Senator Pearce was under the impression that Senator Pulsford had said that £500,000 had been spent upon Government House, Sydney, for the purpose of making it fit for residence by the Governor-General. That was a misapprehension. What Senator Pulsford said was that the property was valued at about £500,000, and the larger part of that value attaches to the land and water frontage and not to the building. How much was spent in good faith to prepare Government House, Sydney, as a suitable residence for the Governor-General — because it must be remembered that the Governor-General came first of all to Sydney, and announced that he was going to live at Sydney — I am not in a position to say. But it was not a question, as Senator Pearce has said, of State extravagance in providing for his residence at Government House, Sydney. It was rather a necessity of the position brought about by federation that he should be provided with a residence there. Possibly a few thousands of pounds were spent, but it would not require to have been a very large sum, because Government House, Sydney, was not a ruin. There may have been a few extra rooms built, but £5,000 or £10,000 would much more nearly represent the expenditure than the £500,000 which Senator Pearce so inaccurately understood Senator Pulsford to say.

Senator CHARLESTON.—The vote for repairs and maintenance last year was £2,500.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That would not include all that was spent, because I am referring to the expenditure which took place in the previous year, in order that the building might be ready upon the arrival of the Governor-General on the 1st January.

Senator GLASSEY.—And that expenditure was incurred by New South Wales.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Exactly; and under the circumstances that the Governor-General was sent from England to Sydney to reside there.

Senator STYLES.—To proclaim the Commonwealth; not necessarily to reside there.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—He stayed there for over four months until he came over to Melbourne for the opening of the Federal Parliament and the reception of the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York. It is rather late in the day to cavil at expenditure incurred by New South Wales to meet circumstances arising from the necessities of the situation. It was an absolute obligation, and to call it State extravagance is altogether wide of the question. If Parliament refuses to pass the motion — and I am speaking of a proposal by a Government which in New South Wales we do not look upon as one at all disposed to favour its interests; quite the contrary — it will add, not to the pin-pricks, but to the many grievances which, rightly or wrongly — I think rightly — the people of New South Wales consider they have against the Federation. Three years ago nobody could be reviled more enthusiastically in the streets of Sydney and its press than a man who uttered an opinion adverse to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. To-day you can walk the streets of Sydney and you will run no risk in offering a reward of £5 to any one who will own that he voted for the adoption of the Constitution. You can not find such a man.

Senator WALKER.—Yes.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My honorable friend has only just come back from a trip, and he is not quite so closely in touch with local feeling as he will be after he has been at home for a week.

Senator STYLES.—Offer the £5, and we will see whether we can find a man.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It would be carrying coals to Newcastle to offer it to the honorable senator. I should be quite safe in making an offer to my honorable colleague, because, no matter what his views were and how willing he might be to own up to having voted for the acceptance of the Constitution, he would not accept so paltry a sum. He was one of those who could not deny the fact now. His one swallow does not make a summer, and his enthusiasm for the past as well as for the present does not alter the fact that I have met people by the score in the course of the day and found no one who had not an anathema at the end of his tongue for federation as it exists from the New South Wales stand-point.

Senator CHARLESTON.—It is unpopular everywhere just now.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not suppose that New South Wales is the only State in which it is unpopular. A Judge, in Queensland, has stated his opinion that not 10 per cent. of the persons who voted for the acceptance of the Constitution would vote in that way now. I feel absolutely certain that in New South Wales you could not get 10,000 voters in favour of its adoption, unless it was just on the border, where they have got rid of the stock tax. And it was only the border vote which carried federation in that State.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that his remarks are relevant to the motion.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — I think they are as relevant as some of the speeches I have listened to, but I shall not pursue the subject any further. What I have sought to show is that New South Wales considers that under the Constitution she is entitled to certain things. One of these is to have within her borders, at times at least, the presence of the Governor-General. I desire to be understood as having offered reasons for showing that, if this were denied by the Senate—and I cannot believe that it will be—it would lead to an even greater feeling of hardship, annoyance, and wrong, than is felt by tens of thousands in that State to-day in connexion with the failure of the Federation to convey to the State some of the advantages which we looked forward to with hope, if not with assurance. Instead of promoting that high federal spirit that we all desire shall be cultivated and extended throughout the Commonwealth, we shall have a sense of outraged feeling.

Senator STYLES.—The people of New South Wales do not care two straws where the Governor-General resides.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator, perhaps, does not know as much as I do upon that point.

Senator STYLES.—I do not know as much as the honorable senator does upon anything.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I would not question my honorable friend's knowledge of the state of feeling in Victoria, because I do not live here sufficiently to be able to speak; but he need not profess to know more of the feeling in the State from which I come than I do, because he does not live there, and can only have his knowledge at second-hand, or, perhaps, even more remotely than that. I have said that I cannot believe that the Senate will undo, or attempt to undo, that which has been done by the House of Representatives who practically sent this proposal here, because it was submitted in that Chamber first. I trust that the motion will be carried by a sufficient majority to show that there is amongst the representatives of the different States here a feeling of loyalty to the provisions expressed and implied in the Constitution.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I hope that I shall be able to discuss this question in a federal spirit. But if the federal spirit means that we are to accept the motion as it was moved, then I am afraid that I am about to do that which may be considered unfriendly from the federal point of view. Senator Neild has given us good advice with regard to fostering the federal spirit, and told us of the critical position in which we stand. I do not believe that the unfederal spirit attributed to people exists. I believe that throughout Australia as a whole the people are as keen for federation to-day as they were when they voted for the acceptance of the Constitution Bill; and, certainly, I am not going to be scared by any statements of that character into voting for the motion. There are one or two points which, I think, ought to be cleared up. To me there had always been a mystery about the whole of this business, until I heard the speech of Senator Matheson, who traced its history from the time when Sir William Lyne entered into negotiations with the Home authorities down to the present stage. It seems to me that the representatives of New South Wales were determined, from the very first, to have the Governor-General located in Sydney; and, therefore, from time to time, they took certain steps in order to secure an official residence for him there. Senator Neild has just told us that the fact that the Earl of Hopetoun came to Sydney is an evidence—or, at any rate, a reason—why we should vote for this motion.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator misunderstood me. I pointed out that it was a reason for the expenditure.

Senator BARRETT.—I am very sorry if I misunderstood the honorable senator, but he appeared to me to argue that because His Excellency arrived in Sydney to inaugurate the Federation, the up-keep of Government House must go on for ever. That is a proposition to which I take strong exception. If there has been a mistake made—and I think there has—we should have the courage to retrace our steps and say that it shall not be continued. The position has been simplified to a very great extent by the amendment of Senator Dawson, that the expenditure on Government House, Sydney, shall be continued for the term of only three years.

Senator STYLES.—From when?

Senator BARRETT.—I suppose from the time when the undertaking was entered into by the Commonwealth Government. I have been troubled throughout the discussion by the fact that there was an understanding between the Federal Government and the New South Wales State Ministry with regard to the up-keep of Government House, although, so far as I can judge from the knowledge I have gained in the debate, and from the despatches from the Colonial-office, there was no justification in the first place for its being made. I shall not go to the length of punishing the Government because they have done an unwise act, and consequently I am prepared to vote for the amendment. I am quite willing to admit all that the mother State has done in this connexion. The burden of Senator Pulsford's contention was that the Government of New South Wales had expended £30,000 upon additions to their Government House. Certainly they were extremely lavish in their expenditure. All honour to the Government for doing that. But the fact that they incurred that expenditure on a residence for the Governor-General does not justify the maintenance of an establishment in Sydney for a second residence for His Excellency for all time. I should like to allay, if I can, any suspicion which the representatives of New South Wales may have with regard to disputing its right to the capital. I move about a good deal, and meet with a good many persons, but I have not heard one so far who has denied its right to the capital. There has been a bargain made in that regard, and so far as I know there is no one who desires to get away from that bargain, although, let me say here, that it was not authorized by the people of Australia.

Senator KEATING.—It was indorsed by the electors.

Senator BARRETT.—Sir George Turner had no authority from the people of Victoria to say that the capital of the Commonwealth should be in New South Wales.

Senator KEATING.—They indorsed that by accepting it afterwards.

Senator BARRETT.—I know that the people of Victoria indorsed it by their votes, but it was not merely that provision that the people of this State and other States voted upon. There were a good many other questions submitted, and many clauses of the original Bill had been modified. The desire for federation was so strong in all the States that the people were prepared to accept even the provision in question which the Premiers had put in the Bill. But that does not alter the fact that the Premiers of the States had not authority for what they did, and I, for one, am sorry that the provision relating to the federal capital was not left to be determined by the Federal Parliament, in order that the whole of Australia might have a voice in connexion with the settlement. Senator Neild has made a good deal out of the legal opinion given by Senator O'Connor. The New South Wales senators work themselves up into a kind of frenzy when they talk about the federal capital. For instance, last Friday afternoon Senator Millen, who is usually calm and collected, was almost beside himself when he commenced to discuss this question; but he said that he was as an iceberg to a volcano, comparing his feeling with the feeling in New South Wales. I interjected that if that were the case the feeling there must be bad indeed. I wish to allay the feelings of the New South Wales senators. This compact has been entered into by the people of Australia, and, as far as we in Victoria are concerned—I am not speaking for myself, but as one who at present holds one-sixth of the voting power of the State in the Senate—I have no intention of robbing the New South Wales people of their rights. Therefore it cannot be said that I entertain the feelings that seem to be attributed to the Victorians. As to the legal opinion given by Senator O'Connor, I do not suppose that any view that I may have with regard to the Constitution would have much weight as compared with the view expressed by the legal members, but as far as I can see, no one disputes Senator O'Connor's opinion. As far as I can gather from the records of the Senate, Senator O'Connor lays it down that the federal capital cannot be in any other place than in New South Wales, and must not be within 100 miles from Sydney. But we have not yet decided where the federal capital shall be located, and there is a provision implied in the Constitution, that until a certain event takes place, Melbourne shall be the place where Parliament shall meet. In my opinion, it must follow that where Parliament meets, the seat of government must be located. Therefore, we are simply carrying out the compact by determining that until we have decided on the other question of where the capital shall be located, Melbourne shall be the seat of government for the time being. There is another point which I want to emphasize before sitting down. There is no necessity at present to have two residences for the Governor-General. I may re-echo the sentiment expressed by Senator Pearce, and say that it would be better for the representatives of New South Wales if they were to press for the early settlement of the federal capital question. If that were settled, it might to a very large extent influence the settlement of the question we are now discussing. But under present circumstances, I cannot see what necessity there is for a second Government House. I very much appreciate the arguments that have been advanced, that if Sydney is to have a second Government House for the Governor-General, the same privilege can be claimed for any other State. If it is to be successfully claimed that the Governor-General shall reside in Sydney, an equally good claim could be made with regard to any other capital city in the union. If the honorable senators from the various States urged that view, it would, of course, seem ridiculous. Consequently, I think that at present it is only necessary to have only one establishment for the Governor-General, and I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by Senator Dawson.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—As I had not the privilege of being present last week and did not hear the speeches then made, I cannot refer to them, but dealing with the arguments advanced to-day, I would say, in reply to the last speaker, that his allusions to the alterations made in the Constitution by the Premiers remind me of the fact that had those alterations not been made in the Constitution New South Wales would not have been a member of the Federation to-day.

Senator STYLES.—Was it the alteration made in regard to the capital that induced New South Wales to enter the Federation?

Senator WALKER.—It was largely the alteration with respect to the capital being located in New South Wales. I can speak with some authority on this point, because I was one of those who through thick and thin endeavoured to induce New South Wales to come into the Federation.

Senator STYLES.—Did that particular alteration affect the votes at the second referendum?

Senator WALKER.—I think that undoubtedly it did. Even then not a few objected to the provision necessitating the capital being 100 miles from Sydney. I wish to state first of all why I intend to vote against the amendment. It mentions three years. I understand that the Governor-General, whoever he may be, will be appointed for five years, so that by the amendment it is practically said that for three years His Excellency is to have two residences, whilst for the other two years he is only to have one. Had it been proposed that the Government House, Sydney, should be occupied for five years, or for the term of appointment of the next Governor-General, I could have understood it.

Senator DRAKE.—The proposal of the Government is to limit it to a term of five years.

Senator WALKER.—I am now speaking against the amendment. Even after the federal capital is established in New South Wales, I see strong reasons why we should still have an official residence for the Governor-General in Melbourne; and the same reasons which operate in favour of the present proposal of the Government would then, it seems to me, necessitate there being a second residence in Melbourne. Sydney and Melbourne are unique. They represent the most populous States of the group. Sydney is the head naval station of Australasia. Melbourne is at present the head station of the military forces of the Commonwealth. There need be no jealousy between the two places. New South Wales has shown her liberality in this matter in a very marked manner. The New South Wales Parliament agreed without a division to vote the sum of £3,000 per annum towards the Governor-General's salary, if the money were required for the purpose. Therefore, it is not fair to represent this matter as being one of pounds shillings and pence so far as New South Wales is concerned. Sydney is the old historic capital of Australia, and we cannot disguise from ourselves the fact that the inhabitants of New South Wales have made unusual sacrifices in regard to the Federation. They did their duty nobly in connexion with the inaugural ceremonies, and they submitted with a tolerably good grace to sink their own fiscal views for the benefit of the Federation.

Senator STYLES.—But they secured Inter-State free-trade thereby, and that had something to do with it.

Senator WALKER.—Some people think that we have not quite got Inter-State free-trade yet, but we hope to have it soon.

Senator Neild has referred to the fact that our State Governors are at liberty, in the larger States of Victoria and New South Wales, to occupy country residences. Why should not Sydney be the residence for the Governor-General in the winter months, whilst Melbourne is his residence in the summer months? Sydney in winter enjoys the most delightful climate in Australia. Having recently returned from the old country, I can say this—that one of the few grievances which Ireland possesses is that she has no residence for the Sovereign within her borders. I should like to see one established there. In a similar manner, I should like to see each of the larger States of Australia have a Governor-General's residence; and, if I have the honour of occupying a seat in the Senate when the site for the federal capital is determined, I shall not be one of those who will oppose giving this right to Melbourne. In one of the leading newspapers this morning—one of the leading papers in Australia—it is said that Melbourne is to be practically the federal capital of Australia for the next ten years. If that is not a challenge to the people of New South Wales to take every opportunity to have the federal territory proclaimed as soon as possible, I do not know what is. But until that territory is proclaimed, I trust that the Senate will see its way clear to allow the motion to pass, and I hope that it will be passed unanimously. Senator Neild has somewhat exaggerated the feeling in Sydney at present, but still it is a very prevalent feeling. When I told some of my friends in Sydney that I was coming to Melbourne to-day to vote in favour of this motion, they said—"Oh! we know what that means; it means that Melbourne is to be the great place." The anti-federalists in Sydney have a very strong feeling on this subject. Personally I have always been a federalist, and have never spoken a word against Melbourne in my life. I respect the inhabitants of Victoria. I am a thorough federalist, and although it is unpopular to say so in Sydney, I shall be prepared to say so everywhere I go. I hope the motion will be carried.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD (Victoria).—The amount of money involved in the proposed vote is, comparatively speaking, unimportant. But there evidently is involved in it a rather important principle, as may clearly be seen from the way in which the matter has been discussed by the senators from the mother State. I certainly was astonished last week to see the large amount of energy thrown into the discussion by certain honorable senators, because it appeared to me that this was not a matter which required or justified any loss of temper. The matter, after all, is a very simple one, namely—shall the Governor-General have two residences, or shall he have one? Unhesitatingly I say that if he desires to have two, he ought to have two; but I do not think that the decision as to the second residence should remain with a State, whether it be New South Wales or any other State. We must bear in mind that the possession of two residences would entail a very heavy total expenditure by the Governor-General. As we are now limiting the amount which he is to receive, I think it is reasonable that we should consult his wishes before finally deciding that there should be a second residence. What is the position at the present time? The Parliament is meeting, and must, for some years at all events, continue to meet in Melbourne. Therefore, the Governor-General must necessarily reside here in order to be close at hand to receive the advice of his Ministers, and for the purpose of consultation. The consequence is that the second residence can be occupied by him only during the summer months, and no one with any sense would dream of living in Sydney during that part of the year. Therefore, whatever may be the ultimate result, I cannot see how Government House, Sydney, can possibly be used by the Governor-General as long as the Parliament meets in Melbourne. I am not one of those who desire to retain the Federal Parliament in this city one day longer than is absolutely necessary. On the other hand, however, I should deprecate the rash expenditure at the present time of a large sum of money in building a new federal city. The seat of government must ultimately—and at no very distant date—be in New South Wales. It cannot be within less than 100 miles of Sydney, but I think we may safely say that it will be within easy reach of that capital. Then Sydney will undoubtedly be the head-quarters of the Governor-General. The federal capital will not be far away from that city.

Senator STYLES.—I am not so sure of that.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—I think we may safely say that it will be within a few hours by rail of Sydney, and that there will not be anything to prevent the Governor-General from occupying Government House in that city from the time of the establishment of the federal capital in New South Wales. But he will never think of stopping there during the hot weather. He may have a second residence in New South Wales, or he may prefer to have one in Tasmania. I would remind the Senate that it is stated in to-day's newspapers that the Acting Governor-General has decided to go to Tasmania during the summer months, notwithstanding that Government House, Sydney, is available to him. I do not wish it to be thought for one moment that there is any desire on the part of Victoria to retain the Federal Parliament here longer than is necessary. I have known Victoria for more than half-a-century, and I am satisfied that there is no such desire. We shall be quite willing to assist our honorable friends from New South Wales to select a site for the federal capital in that State, and to build it within a reasonable time. In the meantime, I urge the Senate not to tie the hands of a future Governor-General during the whole of his term of office to what must necessarily be a white elephant as long as Parliament meets here. I do not want to go into the constitutional question, because I think it is perfectly clear that if it be a fact that we have no right to demand that the Governor-General shall remain here, because this is not the federal capital, then Sydney can have no claim to his residence there, because Sydney is not, and never will be, the federal capital. It is, after all, merely a matter of convenience. I would urge the Senate to allow the question to be left as it stands. It was not unnatural that the Minister for Home Affairs, who was Premier of New South Wales at the time, should have sought to make Sydney the head-quarters of the Governor-General. The Federal Government have indorsed his action by taking Government House for three years, and whether we like it or not we ought to indorse that action and legislate to carry out the agreement. But do not let us go beyond the agreement until the Governor-General has been appointed and arrives in Australia. We shall then be able to consult his wishes, and I shall be very much mistaken if the Commonwealth is not prepared to do anything within reason to carry out his desires.

It may be said that the course I propose would place the present Government in a rather awkward position when dealing with the Governor-General to be appointed, and that we should be able to tell him definitely that during his sojourn here he will have the absolute use of the Government Houses at Sydney and Melbourne. I do not think that there is any ground for such a contention. It will be sufficient for the Governor-General to know that he will have Government House, Melbourne, during his term of office, and that Government House, Sydney, will also be available for his use during a term of three years. I think we must also bear in mind that the Governor-General will be expected to visit the other States, and that the possession of a second residence in Sydney would very considerably hamper his movements by entailing increased expense upon him. The only way in which we can enable him to meet the desire of the people of the other States that he should visit those parts of the Commonwealth, is to pass a vote to cover his travelling expenses, instead of providing a second permanent residence for him. I do not imagine that Western Australia, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, would be content never to see the Governor-General, and that he should always reside in New South Wales or Victoria.

Senator GLASSEY.—When he comes to Queensland he will be the guest of the State.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—For these reasons I find that I cannot support the amendment as it stands, because I am not prepared to say that under no circumstances should the Governor-General have a second residence. Circumstances might arise that would warrant us in meeting his wishes in this direction, and I do not think the Commonwealth would be backward in complying, to a reasonable extent, with his desires. In my opinion we should absolutely indorse the action of the Government in accepting Government House, Sydney, for three years, leaving the future to take care of itself. If Senator Dawson will withdraw his amendment, I propose to move to amend the motion by omitting the words "during the term of office of the next Governor-General," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "but this House suggests that the expenditure on Sydney Government House be limited to the term of three years from 1st January, 1901."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD) proposed—

That the words "during the term of office of the next Governor-General" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "but this House suggests that the expenditure on Sydney Government House be limited to the term of three years, from 1st January, 1901."

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I somewhat regret that I shall have to support the amendment, and I may say, that if Senator Higgs had persisted in his proposal, I should certainly have voted for it. Senator Sargood, in a very well-thought-out speech, following another well-thought-out one made by Senator Barrett, has made some of the principal points which I wished to put before the Senate. I think the Senate is indebted to Senator Matheson for the trouble he has taken to place before us so much information relating to this question. I cannot say that I approve of all the remarks made by Senator Higgs—although his speech as a whole meets with my acceptance—and I regret that so broad-minded a man should have seen fit to direct attention to the fact that honorable members from New South Wales did not join in visiting all the proposed sites for the federal capital on the occasion of the senatorial inspection. I can readily understand that they did not find it necessary to make the complete tour. No doubt most of them knew every place which it was proposed to visit, and I am satisfied that, upon reflection, Senator Higgs will regret that he should have referred to the action taken by them. I know very well that if a site had to be selected in Victoria it would not be necessary for me or for any other honorable senator representing this State to make a complete inspection. Most of the sites would be known to us, and therefore I can very well understand the absence of several honorable senators from New South Wales from the trip. No doubt some of them thought that if they visited only a few of the sites it might be considered that they favoured some particular site at the expense of others, and naturally they would not like such an impression to get abroad. We have heard two or three references to the amount of money which was expended upon the last occupant of the Governor-General's office.

I am not complaining of that expenditure, but I desire to state that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, something like £46,150 was expended in connexion with the office during the eighteen months in which the Earl of Hopetoun was here. I should like the Home papers to "please copy." The figures I have quoted show that the Earl of Hopetoun received £30,000 in round numbers in addition to his salary. Surely if that be so, the people of the old country should not through the press accuse the people of the Commonwealth of meanness in the treatment of the first Governor-General! Retrenchment is now the cry throughout the Commonwealth. Rightly or wrongly this Parliament is retrenching the defence forces very largely, yet we are proposing now to increase to an unlimited extent, so far as we know, the expenditure upon the Governor-General. I take some exception to the amendment of the motion made in the first instance by the leader of the Senate. As originally put forward the motion was to this effect—

That an expenditure upon the Governor-General's establishment of £5,500, and upon the Federal Council of £1,925 a year, as submitted in the statement laid on the table of the Senate on the 20th August is approved.

Certain words were struck out of the motion, and others inserted, so that it now reads—

That the expenditure upon Government Houses of £5,500 . . . be approved.

It appears to me that it is not an amendment in the strict sense of the word. The word "establishment" was used in the original motion, but the words "Government Houses" have been substituted for it. We are asked to vote £5,500 a year upon Government Houses. I apprehend that there is a great deal of difference between Government House and the Governor-General's establishment, and I should like to know what additional sum we shall be asked to vote when we have voted this amount. There is no indication given of the amount by which we shall be asked to supplement this vote for the Governor-General's establishment. This vote is only for the maintenance of two Government Houses, two vice-regal palaces. I should like to get some statement from the Vice-President of the Executive Council as to whether the sum of £5,500 is intended to cover all expenses, apart from travelling expenses, for which I see a sum of £1,000 on the Estimates. Do the Government intend to come down with another proposal to supplement this sum?

Senator O'CONNOR.—No.

Senator STYLES.—Then this 5,500 is intended to cover all expenses.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It is intended to cover all expenses, with the exception, it may be, of some travelling expenses.

Senator STYLES.—I see that a vote of £1,000 a year appears on the Estimates to provide for travelling expenses. I have looked through the Constitution Act as well as other honorable senators, and I can see no provision in it for the payment of any moneys to the Governor-General beyond his salary of £10,000 a year.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—There is nothing to prevent it.

Senator STYLES.—The Federal Parliament, I know, is all-powerful in that matter, and there is nothing to prevent our spending £100,000 a year, but there is no provision in the Constitution for any expenditure for the Governor-General beyond the £10,000 which is fixed as his salary. If it was intended that there should be other expenditure provided for, it could easily have been stated in the Constitution by the Imperial Parliament. No such provision was made by the Imperial Parliament, though there was no reason why it should not have been made. Had it appeared in the Commonwealth Bill, as placed before the people of the States, that there would probably be an expenditure of £10,000 in addition to the £10,000 fixed as the salary of the Governor-General, there is a strong probability that the people would never have accepted the Bill. They would have said that the expense proposed was too great.

Senator HIGGS.—Many objected that the £10,000 was too much.

Senator STYLES.—Some honorable senator following me may say that it is not customary to refer to any expenditure in the Constitution Act, but that is not so. In the Victorian Constitution Act, which came into operation on the 3rd November, 1855, the Governor's salary is stated in schedule D as £10,000. "Salaries of staff, repairs to Government House, travelling and other expenses, £5,000." That is what appears in the Victorian Constitution Act, and if it had been the intention of the Imperial Parliament that we should pay, in addition to the salary of £10,000, such sums as are now proposed, why was it not stated in the Constitution? The Imperial Parliament could have done as it liked in the matter while the Constitution was before it. The people of Victoria thought that the expense provided for in their Constitution was too much, and that Act was amended, as honorable senators will find, in the Consolidated Statutes, compiled by the late Chief Justice Higinbotham, under date 1st July, 1890. I refer to this as showing honorable senators what the people of Victoria thought ought to be done after paying the sum provided for in the Victorian Constitution Act after so many years. They struck out absolutely the reference to the £5,000, and allowed the salary to stand at £10,000. This is the section of the amended Act:—

The Governor shall not receive in any year for the salaries of the staff, or for travelling expenses, or for any other allowances or contingencies whatsoever, any sum beyond the sum of £10,000 for the Governor's salary, named in the first part of the schedule annexed to the Constitution Act, and marked D; and shall defray the salaries of his staff, his travelling and all other expenses, except repairs to Government House out of such salary.

There is a precedent to show that provision for this expenditure could have been inserted in the Constitution if it was intended that we should pay these large sums of money. A later amendment was made in the Victorian Constitution in 1895 by the Governor's Salary Reduction Act, when the salary was reduced from £10,000 to £7,000; but the Governor had still to pay all expenses, except repairs to Government House. Senator Sargood referred to summer and winter residences. I would suggest that if we are going to dictate to the Governor-General where he shall reside, we should require him to spend the summer at Hobart, and to spend his winter on the Darling Downs in Queensland, where I was for many years, and where I know there is the finest climate in Australia. Are we going to dictate to the Governor-General where he shall live? As has been pointed out by Senator Sargood, when the Federal Parliament is in session in the winter he will require to be here. If he desires to go away in the summer time when Parliament is not in session, he will hardly select Sydney as a summer residence. Supposing Lord Tennyson, who is now Acting Governor-General, were appointed Governor-General of Australia—and we might make a worse selection—I do not see why we should desire to go further. We may go further and fare worse, from what I have read about his Lordship—supposing the Home Government saw fit to appoint him as Governor-General of the Commonwealth. After the session is over he might say—"I do not care about going to Sydney. I have been in South Australia for some years, myself and family have formed friendships there, and if you permit me to go to some other State and provide funds for the purpose I should prefer to go to Marble Hill to spend my time there amongst people I know."

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—I hear that Marble Hill is not going to be kept up.

Senator STYLES.—His Lordship might make that selection, and, as Senator Sargood has pointed out, it would not be the proper thing to dictate to the Governor-General as to where he should live. We must give him a voice in the selection of his residence. Then when we have the federal capital fixed upon—and I am so weary of the constant nagging about the federal capital, and of the stale old platitudes about the envy and jealousy of one State towards another, that I should not be sorry if it were fixed upon to-morrow—how many Government Houses shall we have? We must have one at the federal capital. Senator Sargood said that the federal capital must be 100 miles from Sydney, but I should not blame the Sydney people for doing their best, as they probably will, to have it fixed at Sydney. If, however, it were established at Bombala—half-way between Melbourne and Sydney—it would be something like 350 miles from Sydney. We could not expect the Governor-General to run backwards and forwards between those places every week. We would require to provide him with a residence there. I hope we shall all go there to reside for four months in the year. Are we then going to provide a residence for the Governor-General at Melbourne, Sydney, and Marble Hill? It seems to me that by-and-by we shall have a great number of Federal Government Houses. I can understand that during the inauguration ceremonies it was necessary to provide a residence for the Governor-General in Sydney, but if an unwise bargain were made by the then Premier of New South Wales before he became a member of the Federal Ministry, it does not follow that this Parliament should relieve him of the consequences of that unwise bargain. I do not see why we should step in and pay something that Sir William Lyne and his Government as State Ministers of New South Wales undertook to pay. I do not feel that, as one of the representatives of Victoria, I am called upon to take over what I regard as an unwise bargain made by the then Premier of New South Wales, and if Senator Higgs had not withdrawn his amendment I should have voted for it in order that not one shilling should be paid on account of that arrangement. Supposing that arrangement had involved an expenditure of £10,000 a year, would the Federal Parliament have then taken it over? Upon the same principle, it certainly would have had to do it. The question is whether the people of the Commonwealth ought to pay this money or not, and the amount, whether it be £2,000, £3,000, or £20,000, should not affect the principle. I feel sure that the people of the other States would have entered a very strong protest against paying this money if the sum involved had been a large sum. As it happens to be only a bagatelle, there is not much said about it, but I remind honorable senators that the principle is exactly the same. We were told the other day by Senator Gould that the voting of a lot of money for the Governor-General was not such a bad thing as it looked at first, because it meant the circulation of money amongst the people. He told us also that a private person might spend £20,000 a year, and it would be the means of giving employment to people. The honorable and learned senator, in using such an argument, overlooked the fact that a private person would be spending his own money, and he would be entitled to spend it in any way he chose, but the money we are voting in this case is the taxpayers' money. It does not belong to us, and in dealing with it we are merely the agents of the taxpayer.

Senator Major GOULD.—The money asked for at the present time would be no portion of the money which would be so spent. This is simply for the maintenance of grounds and buildings.

Senator STYLES.—It is for the maintenance of Government Houses, and that is the point I raised some time ago. We may be called upon to spend large sums of money in addition to this vote, in Melbourne as well as in Sydney. Senator Gould twitted Senator Drake with being a party to this arrangement though he represents Queensland, and represents that State very well. We can quite agree with that, but I should like to know from the honorable and learned senator how Senator Drake could remain a member of the Government who brought down this proposal, without agreeing to it?

Senator Major GOULD.—I said that the whole of the States were represented in the arrangement made in the first instance.

Senator STYLES.—Naturally. It has been stated two or three times that the large population of New South Wales entitles Sydney to have a share of the Governor-General's time. Since the States are all equally represented in the Senate, Tasmania has just as much right to expect the presence of His Excellency as New South Wales has. I do not believe that the people of New South Wales care two straws where he lives. But there is a place called Potts' Point, where, I am told, the aristocracy live, and a select few want His Excellency to be the head of society. Toorak wants the Governor-General in Melbourne, not because he ought to be where Parliament is sitting—

Senator FRASER.—Not they.

Senator STYLES.—I am sure that the honorable senator does not care two straws, but he is not a typical Toorakian. Like myself, he is an ex-contractor, and contractors as a rule do not belong to Toorak. Senator Gould also told us that the President of the United States has an allowance of £20,000 a year, and that we will not vote an allowance of £5,500 a year to our Governor-General. The President of the United States is not the nominal, but the actual ruler of 76,000,000 persons. In Europe there are not more than two or three crowned heads, of any magnitude, who have as much power as he possesses. He rules over 44 States, but he has only one White House. According to Senator Gould's argument, if there are two vice-regal palaces here, in proportion to the population there should be 40 white houses in the United States.

Senator Major GOULD.—They have a federal capital, and we have not.

Senator STYLES.—The honorable senator will not tell the Senate that if he were here at the time, he would refuse to vote a sufficient sum to keep up a Government House at Melbourne when the federal capital was established in New South Wales.

Senator Major GOULD.—I would be prepared to do so.

Senator STYLES.—Ruling over an area a great deal larger than that of Australia, the President of the United States has one official residence, and has an annual allowance of £20,000 for its up-keep and, I presume, for other expenses. If we were to pay our Governor-General in proportion, we should pay him £1,000 a year. To put the converse position: If £5,500 is a proper amount for a population of 3,800,000, to pay for the up-keep of two Government Houses, then an annual sum of £110,000 should be handed over to the President of the United States for the up-keep of the White House. These are no arguments which we have heard. I am only showing how hard-up are my honorable friends for arguments in favour of this expenditure, when they bring forward such reasons in support of their contention. Senator Walker has repeated what Senator Millen stated very emphatically the other day—that it was owing to the provision inserted in the Commonwealth Bill by the Premiers' Conference in January, 1899, that the federal capital should be in New South Wales, that such a big affirmative vote was polled in that State at the second referendum. That seems to be a reasonable thing, at first sight. But I think a great deal more highly of the people of that State than to believe that one in a thousand electors was influenced by such a paltry consideration. Like many thousands in all the States, they were led by their public men, who accepted the second Bill mainly because of the amendment in the third paragraph of clause 57. No doubt Queensland and Western Australia, which had stood out, were influenced by the insertion of clause 96 by the Premiers' Conference. But to say that the people of New South Wales, who come from the same stock as we do, were influenced by such a paltry consideration when such a big question as the acceptance of a Federal Constitution was submitted, is to sum them up as a paltry-minded people. I do not believe they are, and I shall prove that that consideration had no weight with them. The people of Victoria are no better than the people of New South Wales. They do not pretend to be, for they are practically the same people. If that were so then the people of Victoria ought to have voted against the acceptance of the second Bill. If they were not a much better people than the people of New South Wales, they would have done so if it be true that the latter were influenced by the insertion of the provision referring to the seat of government. I decline to believe that one elector in a thousand was so influenced. There might be a few hundred families round Potts Point who were influenced by that consideration, but the great bulk of the electors were led by their public men, who threw in their lot with the Bill at the second referendum. The opinion of Senator O'Connor as to where the seat of government should be from the outset has been dealt with by Senators Barrett and Sargood. My opinion coincides exactly with theirs—that wherever the Parliament is sitting, the Executive Council must, for the sake of convenience, meet in its neighbourhood, and wherever the Executive Government is to meet, the Governor-General, who is a member of that body, should reside. Whatever the Constitution Act may convey, so far as the letter is concerned, there is no doubt in my mind, and I think there is no doubt in the mind of any layman, that the common-sense construction of the provision is that the official home of the Governor-General is wherever the Parliament is sitting. I find that the people of New South Wales recorded 35,825 more votes for the second Bill than for the first. If it were a fact that the location of the capital in New South Wales influenced that number to vote for the Bill, it ought to have decreased the vote in Victoria, unless we are a very much better people than are the people over the Murray.

Senator Major GOULD. — There were several other amendments made in the Bill.

Senator STYLES.—The principal amendment, and the one which caused me to vote for the second Bill—I voted against the first Bill—was paragraph 3 in clause 57, which absolutely prevents the four small States from finally deciding any dispute between the two Houses. In the first Bill it was provided that at a joint sitting a three-fifths majority should decide the fate of a Bill. The Premiers' Conference provided for the decision to be given by an absolute majority of the two Houses. No doubt it was seen by the Premier of New South Wales, and the Premier of Victoria, that that alteration would prevent the four small States from imposing upon the Commonwealth taxation of which two-thirds would be paid by the two big States and the balance by the four small States. In the two Houses, the four small States are represented by 51 members, but to command an absolute majority of both Houses at a joint sitting, they would require to be represented by 56 members. That is the reason why so many thousands of persons who voted against the first Bill voted for the second one. In Victoria, notwithstanding the fact that it was definitely settled that the capital was to be in New South Wales, the increase in the affirmative vote was 52,133. In South Australia, the affirmative votes numbered 35,800 at the first referendum and 65,990 at the second one. It seems to me that if the location of the capital in New South Wales affected the voting, both Victoria and South Australia ought to have voted against the Bill on the second occasion. On the contrary, the affirmative vote was increased to a very much greater extent in those States than in New South Wales. In Victoria, the negative vote numbered 22,000 on the first occasion, and less than 10,000 on the second occasion. Every public speaker explained about the capital being located in New South Wales, but the people of Victoria did not care two straws about that, nor did the people of New South Wales. The real reason why the second Bill was accepted in New South Wales was because other amendments had been made by the Premiers' Conference. We were asked a little while ago to state why we agreed to all these things. Senator Barrett said that the Premier of Victoria had no authority from Parliament, let alone from the people, to make the amendments in the Bill. That is quite true. Senator Smith asked why did we accept the Bill, but he knows that we had to accept or to reject the Bill as a whole. There was not one elector in a thousand who would have rejected the Bill on account of the location of the capital in New South Wales. That provision had nothing to do with its acceptance by the States. Therefore, no claim can be advanced by New South Wales on that account. We voted for the Bill on the second occasion, notwithstanding the provision had been inserted at the Premiers' Conference that the federal capital was to be in New South Wales. I regret that the Government has taken up this matter at all, but as they have taken it up, I, as a Government supporter, may, perhaps, be expected to vote for it. But I shall do nothing of the sort for this or any other Government. If Senator Higgs had not withdrawn his amendment I should have voted for it. I do not know what this kind of expenditure will lead to. The next demand will be, I suppose, that when the Governor-General is residing in New South Wales the Executive Council shall sit there. Members of the Executive Council will have to go from all parts of Australia to Sydney, although Melbourne is the more central spot. It has been stated that the amount asked for will cover all the expenditure, but, in my belief, it will do nothing of the kind. I am convinced that another large demand will have to be made upon the Commonwealth taxpayers later on in connexion with the matter.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I do not know that this question is sufficiently important to warrant the long debate that has taken place upon it; but as we are not particularly busy, and the work in hand is not very great, I suppose we may just as well occupy our time in discussing this matter as do anything else. Moreover, it is just possible that by giving a silent vote one might run the risk of having one's position misunderstood. The question is not of very great importance, and if the carrying of this motion will alleviate any little feeling that may exist in New South Wales, it may reasonably be adopted. I am not in the habit of going to Government House. I do not suppose that I am any worse than those who do go there, nor do I think that I am any the better for staying away. But I am not fond of attending big social functions, or of mixing in what is called society. Therefore, the vote I shall give cannot be considered as given from a selfish point of view. I shall support the motion—not Senator Dawson's amendment, nor Senator Sargood's—because, though the matter, boiled down is not very important, New South Wales attaches considerable weight to it. It has been argued that if there are to be two official residences for the Governor-General, one in Melbourne and one in Sydney, the other capital cities have an equal claim to an official residence for His Excellency being maintained in each of them. I do not think that the claim thus made is one to which the other States attach any importance. When the federal movement was being agitated New South Wales asked for some concessions to which she thought she was entitled. Had not those concessions been granted there would have been no federation. If New South Wales had decided to stand out—and she did stand out until her public men were assured that these concessions would be granted—the federal movement would have been a failure. One of the concessions was that the federal capital should be within the territory of New South Wales, but not within 100 miles of Sydney. That being the history of the matter, it is not fair to say that Tasmania, South Australia, Queensland, and Western Australia have an equal claim to have a residence for the Governor-General, maintained by the Commonwealth, in each of their capital cities. It must be remembered that the great bulk of the population of Australia resides in New South Wales and Victoria. If it were necessary to defend the Commonwealth against foreign aggression—and I trust that none of us will live to see the day when that will be necessary—New South Wales and Victoria would have to bear the brunt in supplying both men and money to maintain our position. These two States contain about 2,600,000 people between them out of an aggregate of about 4,000,000. I am just as alive to the interests of my own State as any one can be; but I cannot put forward the claim that we have an equal right with New South Wales, and that a residence for the Governor-General should be maintained in Brisbane. I have noticed that there is a good deal of jealousy between Victoria and New South Wales. I am bound to confess that during my fifteen months' residence in Victoria—and I have mixed a good deal with all sections and all ranks—I have not noticed any feeling of jealousy against New South Wales. I am bound to say, on the other hand, that a good deal of feeling exists in New South Wales with regard to the claims of Victoria. Why should these jealous feelings exist? Surely representative men ought to take higher ground than to watch with jealousy what Victoria is doing, for fear that she gets some advantage from the Federation which New South Wales does not also secure. Unless the little concession which is now asked for is granted, there is a danger that the feeling to which I have alluded will be perpetuated and increased. I am extremely anxious that such feelings should be removed; and, if the granting of this small concession will tend in any way to bring about that end, it will be a good thing to grant it. I have always opposed unnecessary expenditure, but there is no ground for supposing that if the £2,000 set down for the maintenance of Government House, Sydney, is omitted, and if one residence only be maintained, that sum will be saved. It seems to be clear that if only one residence is maintained for the Governor-General it will cost £5,000, which is the cost now proposed for both Houses: and, therefore, we cannot effect any saving by not passing the motion, whereas by passing it we shall allay the feelings to which I have alluded. The money will, therefore, be well spent. It is alleged that what is proposed is in the direction of extravagance. But it must be remembered that New South Wales has behaved in a very liberal manner. Those who took part in the inauguration of the Federation in Sydney are aware that the people of New South Wales then behaved admirably. They treated the people of the Commonwealth with a spirit of liberality, generosity, good feeling, kindness, and hospitality, which was worthy of all praise. We were all delighted to share in the hospitality. Surely, in return for that, we might do what we can to bring about a better understanding, and to promote the smoother working of Federal Government, so as to lead to greater harmony between all the States. But let us see where the extravagance which is complained of will come in? First of all, for the Melbourne Government House the cost of maintenance is £500 per annum; the expenditure on the up-keep of the grounds amounts to £900. An expenditure of £550 is proposed in connexion with caretakers, charwomen, &c., £126 upon insurance, £125 upon fittings and furniture, £150 to cover breakages of and additions to china and glass, £100 upon flags, £240 in connexion with postal charges, £110 on telephones, and £300 for lighting upon public occasions and for offices, &c., making a total of £3,101. In Sydney the State Government have provided free of rent a magnificent house for the use of the Governor-General. As we have been told, it has been put into first-class order, at a cost to the State of New South Wales of something like £5,000, and certainly the provision proposed to be made for its maintenance is not upon extravagant lines. A sum of £740 is provided to pay the caretakers and other servants of the household who have to take care of the premises. Those engaged in maintaining the house will receive £250, whilst £750 is to be set apart for the maintenance of grounds, and the payment of those engaged in looking after them. It can not be said that there is any extravagance in providing £100 for the insurance of the building, and a sum of £87 for telephones for the use of the Governor-General. As a public man who is obliged to keep up an extensive correspondence, it seems to me that the sum of £50, proposed to be set apart to meet the postal charges, is exceptionally small. Then £50 is to be set apart for china and glass, and a like sum for flags, making a total expenditure on Sydney Government House of £2,077 per annum. Is it really worth while to do anything to cause any misunderstanding in regard to this matter, and to give rise to the ill-feeling which was so clearly manifested on Friday by some honorable senators from New South Wales? Is it worth while for us to perpetuate this ill-feeling, and to give occasion for inflammatory and unnecessary comments upon our action? If we oppose this proposal we shall only strengthen the position of some persons who have been from the first hostile to federation, and who are extremely anxious to clutch at any straw in the current of events which may help to maintain that feeling of hostility. Should we help these people to say to those who voted for the union—"We told you so. Even a paltry sum of £2,077 for the maintenance of Sydney Government House will not be provided by the Federal Parliament." I accept the statement made by honorable senators from New South Wales, who should be the best judges of public opinion in their own State, that there are many thousands there who will feel aggrieved if this proposal is not carried out. I am satisfied that if the statement had not been correct Senator Millen and other honorable senators from that State would not have shown so much anxiety and warmth in dealing with this matter. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment proposed by Senator Sargood. I think the Government proposition is exceedingly reasonable, especially in view of the feeling manifested in New South Wales. If this small concession will help to create a better understanding, the Senate will act wisely and prudently in voting for the expenditure.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I think, Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT.—Has not the honorable senator spoken already upon this motion?

Senator HIGGS.—I have spoken to the original question, but, under Standing Order 126, I have a right to speak to any question, and I propose now to address myself to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT.—Standing Order 126 provides that—

A member may speak to any question before the House or upon a question or amendment to be proposed by himself.

The honorable senator has not proposed this amendment, and therefore he cannot speak again.

Senator HIGGS.—I took it that the question before the Chair was the amendment moved by Senator Sargood.

The PRESIDENT.—Under our new standing orders the practice will be altered, but until then we must stand by these which provide that upon a question an honorable senator can make only one speech.

Senator O'CONNOR (In reply). — Although this debate has extended over a considerable time, and covered a very wide field, there is really not very much which calls for any reply, for the simple reason that the series of amendments which have been proposed have really narrowed down the question to very small limits. I would ask the attention of the Senate to what is the real object of the Government in making this proposal. Of course, the Government might very well have treated this as an ordinary matter of administration. They might have taken upon themselves the responsibility of informing the Colonial-office that they would be prepared to ask the Parliament to grant a certain expenditure, and to provide for certain maintenance of residences, in connexion with future Governors-General. But they thought that, considering first of all the uncertainty there was in regard to the actual amount of expenditure required, and considering also the events of the last three or four months in relation to the office of the Governor-General, it would be very much better to put themselves in the position of having a decision by Parliament upon the matter, and being able to inform the Imperial Government that they would be prepared to make a certain offer to any person who was to be appointed to the office of Governor-General. I think that honorable senators will see that the reason which actuated us in putting this motion before the Senate as well as before the House of Representatives, was that we desired to obtain the sanction of Parliament to this offer before it was made, so that although the offer is not to be put in the form of an Act of Parliament, and although there is nothing binding in it, Parliament will be honorably bound not to interfere with the terms of the proposal after the motion has been carried. That is the object of the motion, and unless that object is carried out, it will be of no value. I mention this for the purpose of showing that all the amendments which have been proposed—the one last proposed as well as the one first put before the Senate—would detract from the completeness—and, if I may say so, from the firmness—of the offer which it is necessary we should make to the Imperial Government. A great deal was said at the outset of the debate as to the want of any necessity for the establishment of both these Government Houses; but long ago it has been admitted, by the withdrawal of the amendment by Senator Higgs, and the substitution of that proposed by Senator Dawson, that the Government are honorably bound to the State of New South Wales to carry out the existing arrangements for a certain period. That has been admitted by the amendment moved by Senator Dawson and that substituted for it by Senator Sargood. It is unnecessary to discuss the history of this matter and the reason why this particular arrangement was brought about. It is admitted that the arrangement must be sanctioned, and that effect must be given to it. Are we simply to give effect to the bare arrangement, and to go no step beyond it when making this offer to the Imperial authorities? It seems to me that Senator Glassey was quite right when he said that the opposition shown to the Government proposal was really a paltry way of regarding a question of this kind. What is really between us? It is admitted that this proposal must be carried out at all events for three years beyond the year 1901—that is to say that it must subsist until 1904. It is contended, however, that it should not subsist beyond that time. The Government proposal is that the arrangement should continue during the term of office of the Governor-General. We know that the term of office of the States Governors is something like five years, and probably the Governor-General's term will not be more than that. Therefore, the whole question between us is whether we should make this offer for the term of office of the Governor-General so that it would apply only to a period of five years, or whether we should say to the gentleman to be appointed, "You are going to have Government House, Melbourne, and Government House, Sydney, until 1904, but we shall not make any guarantee in regard to the use of Sydney Government House after that time." That would place us in this position: that assuming a Governor-General is appointed to take office at the beginning of next year—and I hardly think that he would be ready to assume office before then—an establishment will be provided for him for one year in Sydney, and for the rest of his term of office he will only have one Government House, in Melbourne. If he accepts office on those terms, is it likely that he will take any steps to furnish Government House, Sydney, or towards making it habitable for him for a period of only a year? He might very well say—"Why should I enter into arrangements to keep Government House, Sydney, going for a year when at the end of that time my occupation of it will come to an end?" He would probably say that he would have nothing to do with it. In that event we should be obliged to maintain Government House, Sydney, under the existing arrangement, and obtain absolutely no benefit from it. If what we wish to do is to avoid friction over these small matters in the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth, surely we are going the wrong way about it. Is there any way in which we could more emphasize the narrow and, perhaps, I might say, the rather niggardly view of the obligations of the Commonwealth to the Governor-General than by putting the Governor-General in the position of preparing to either reside in Sydney Government House for one year, or portion of the year, or leaving the place empty—the maintenance of it still being paid—as a standing monument to the sectional jealousy of different portions of the Commonwealth, and as a standing monument to what I could not help describing as a most illiberal failure to recognise the magnificent generosity of the people of New South Wales when the Commonwealth was first established?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—But a second house is not wanted.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is a matter for the Governor-General to determine. We want to be in a position to make an offer. If we are to make an offer at all, surely it should be a reasonable offer extending over the whole period of his service. Honorable senators ought not to put upon the Government of the Commonwealth the necessity of having to approach the Imperial Government with an offer that we will give His Excellency the up-keep of Government House, Melbourne, for the whole term of his office, but with regard to the up-keep of Government House, Sydney, although he may be obliged to go there upon official business, and although he may feel it necessary to reside for some time in that very important part of the Commonwealth, he shall have his own house there only for the period of a year and no more. I say that would not be worthy of the Commonwealth, or of the position we assume to take in the Empire. It would not be in consonance with the boast which we make of the importance and magnitude of the Commonwealth as a part of the Empire. It would not be worthy of the Senate, or of the spirit in which this subject ought to be approached. I can quite understand honorable senators on certain grounds taking exception to any but one residence for the Governor-General, but I say that when we recognise what the position is, and how it has been brought about, and when we recognise the real feeling of interest there is in this question, however small it may appear from a monetary point of view, in the city of Sydney itself, it is not a very great stretch of the federal spirit in which these things ought to be regarded, for us to ask that we shall be put into a position in which we can make an offer to the Governor-General that his residence shall be secured to him for the whole term of the office, if he cares to accept the offer. I should like to refer shortly to what the position really is as regards the amount of expenditure involved. Supposing my honorable friend's amendment were carried, what we should save would be something like £2,000 for two years at the outside.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—It is a very small matter.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It is a very small matter indeed compared with the irritating effect the amendment would have, and compared with the position in which it would put the Governor-General and the Government in regard to the whole business. I think it is fair on this occasion to make some reference to what the Government have already done in the matter of cutting down this expenditure. I can assure honorable senators that the matter has given my honorable colleague, Sir George Turner, a great deal of anxiety and consideration. His object has been to bring this expenditure down to the lowest possible limit, and at the same time be fair and reasonable in the treatment extended to the holder of this very high office. The result is that, whereas in regard to these two items there were appropriated in 1901 £13,030, the Federal Parliament is now asked to sanction a vote of only £5,500, the up-keep and different expenditure incurred in connexion with the Governor-General's establishment as to Melbourne Government House, amounting in 1901 to £9,392, and as to Sydney Government House to £3,630. We now ask, so far as Melbourne Government House is concerned, £3,101, and in regard to Sydney Government House, £2,077.

Senator STYLES.—The Royal visit and inauguration ceremonies increased the expenditure last year.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There is included in the vote for Melbourne last year, in connexion with the expenses of the Governor-General, a sum of £5,000, a portion of which, of course, will probably not be a recurring expenditure; but, in regard to the ordinary expenditure, honorable senators will see that we are proposing to cut it down to the very lowest possible amount. Senator Styles asked a very pertinent question as to whether this was to be the end of it, and whether this was to cover all expenses. I tell the honorable senator at once that, in regard to future expenditure, this vote provides for everything except the sum which may be required for travelling expenses for the Governor-General. I think it is admitted that the Governor-General must visit the different States, and in visiting them we hope that he will be treated in the same way as Members of Parliament have been treated, and that he will have the use of the railways free. If he does not have the use of the railways free as has hitherto been the case, it may be necessary to pay his travelling expenses in the same way as the travelling expenses of members of the Federal Parliament are paid.

Senator HIGGS.—Will members of the Federal Parliament get £1,000 a year for travelling expenses?

Senator O'CONNOR.—Fortunately for the honorable senator and for myself we do not require to travel with the same number of adherents and attendants as the Governor-General. If we did, I think that £1,000 a year would go but a very small way to meet our travelling expenses. This expenditure may not, and I hope will not, be incurred. I hope the States will see the necessity of making the same concession to the Governor-General of Australia that they have made in the past to members of the States Parliaments. That is, surely, not very much to ask of them. I hope it will be done, but if it is not done, it seems to me that the Commonwealth cannot ask the Governor-General to meet this expenditure out of his own pocket.

Senator STYLES.—What is the meaning of the £1,000 on the Estimates—"Travelling, telegrams, and other incidental expenses"?

Senator O'CONNOR.—I cannot tell the honorable senator anything more than what appears here. He will see at once that there must be some expenditure upon official services which the Governor-General cannot be expected to defray. For instance, in the case of official telegrams and cablegrams sent by the Governor-General, not for his own private benefit but as Governor-General of the Commonwealth, it is clear that the Commonwealth must pay for them.

Senator STYLES.—They will be franked.

Senator O'CONNOR.—They will not be franked. The honorable senator must recognise that even Government telegrams are not franked. Cablegrams sent over the lines of the cable companies have to be paid for under some arrangement or upon a certain scale. I do not think it necessary to deal with other matters. But I am glad to be able to answer the pertinent question put by Senator Styles by saying that this vote represents all the expenditure beyond salary, except such expenses as may be incurred in carrying out the official work of the Governor-General, whether in the matter of telegrams, stationery, or matters of that sort, or as travelling expenses. Beyond such expenses, this vote represents what will be charged in addition to the Governor-General's salary. I hope, therefore, that honorable senators will see that this motion will fail of its effect if the amendment is carried; and as the opinion of the Senate seems so general, that this arrangement should be adhered to, at all events, up to the beginning of 1904, I hope they will see the necessity for continuing it to the end of the term of office of the next Governor-General. After that, it will be open to us to make fresh arrangements. I hope that by that time the federal capital site will not only be fixed, but that we shall be a long way towards having arrangements completed for the reception of the Governor-General there. With regard to what has been said about this, though I have no wish to wander from the question, I must say that it has always seemed to me that one of the most important matters which we have to consider, and one of the most important duties cast upon the Commonwealth Parliament, is that of providing at the earliest possible moment a Parliament House of our own in our own territory, as contemplated in the Constitution, in which we may carry on our business.

COMMONWEALTH PRINTING.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I have the honour to bring up a report from the Printing Committee. I move—

That the document be read by the Clerk.

After it has been read, I shall move that it be printed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Report read by the Clerk, as follows :—

1. REFERENCE.—In November, 1901, the Printing Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives were authorized to confer.

2. SCOPE OF INQUIRY.—The immediate occasion of this action was certain misleading statements respecting the cost of federal printing which had been persistently published to the effect—

(a) That whereas the Convention estimate of the federal printing bill was £14,500 per year, “£40,500 would be nearer the amount.”

(b) That the annual federal printing bill “bids fair to average £800 per week all the year round.”

(c) That the federal printing bill amounts to something like £78,000 per year.

3. NEW EXPENDITURE.—The first and second of these statements were evidently intended to refer to the new and original cost of printing in connexion with newly-created departments. This is conclusively proved by the comparison of the predicted expenditure with the Convention estimate. The evidence submitted to your committee shows, beyond all doubt, that both these statements were quite unwarrantable. At the instance of your committee, a return has been prepared (complete for all the States except Western Australia), which shows that the total cost of printing in connexion with the Federal Parliament and the newly-created departments, from the establishment of the Commonwealth to the 31st March, 1902, a period of fifteen months, amounted to the sum of £24,647, being at the rate of £1,643 per month, or £19,716 per year. This return includes the cost of printing all the Bills submitted to Parliament during the period covered by it, including the Customs Bill, the Tariff Bill, the Distillation Bill, the Post and Telegraph Bill, and the Defence Bill, the cost of which, strictly speaking, should be charged to the transferred departments. It is hardly necessary to comment on the injustice of criticism which, whether made recklessly and without proper inquiry, or with the express desire to injure our Federal institutions, would persistently give prominence to statements so utterly unfounded as those quoted (a) and (b) supra. It must be borne in mind that, even with reference to the actual expenditure of £19,716 for the first year, the requirements necessarily involved in launching a new system of Government during a Parliamentary session of unparalleled duration, have been for that year much greater than what they will be in normal years.

4. TRANSFERRED EXPENDITURE.—The third of the above-quoted statements, representing the cost of federal printing at £78,000 per year, is evidently founded on a confusion between the new federal expenditure and the old pre-federation expenditure in connexion with transferred departments, such as those of Customs, Post and Telegraph, and Defence. The federal system cannot fairly be charged with being the cause of this latter class of expenditure, for, as pointed out by the Clerk of the House of Representatives in his evidence, "as an actual fact, however, three-fourths of the printing to which so much reference has recently been made, had to be done before federation took place. The same work was carried out by the Customs, Postal, and Defence departments before they were taken over by the Commonwealth."

Your committee find that in the departments taken over from the States there has been, during the first year under federation, an expenditure in printing slightly in excess of what will be the ordinary annual cost of the same. The Government Printer explains that that excess has not been owing to any extravagant or unnecessary outlay, but because "everything is new," such as new regulations, new forms, and new documents required to be printed in conformity with new Federal laws. This special expenditure for the first year will not be a continuous expense, recurring from year to year, like the new and original expenditure, but will only be of temporary duration. Even under the separate colony régime these same Departments were from time to time subject to the cost of printing new laws, new regulations, and new forms, as on the occasion of every consolidation which, on an average, may be assumed to take place every ten years. Such general consolidations by the several colonies would involve no less in printing in the aggregate than has had to be spent on the occasion of the establishment of the Federal system; indeed, there has been less under the latter, seeing that there has been only one consolidation of laws, regulations, and forms, whilst under the separate colony system there would have been six separate consolidations and six separate printing bills.

5. PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING.—Your committee find that the ordinary printing in connexion with the Federal Parliament consists of Journals, Votes and Proceedings, Notice-papers, Parliamentary Papers, Reports of Divisions, Bills, and Parliamentary Debates. This is the class of printing usually incidental to every Parliament conducted on the British model.

At the commencement of the Session the Government Printer was ordered to provide for each sitting—

Notice-papers for Senate	500 copies.
Notice-papers for the House	800 "
Journals of the Senate	900 "
Votes and Proceedings of the House	950 "

In addition to those numbers which were delivered at Parliament-house for distribution and stock purposes, he was ordered to print and hold in reserve for binding at the end of the session 1,000 copies of Journals, Votes and Proceedings, Papers, and Acts. The number printed for the purpose of being bound was afterwards reduced to 500.

Among other printing not necessarily recurring from sitting to sitting, but done as occasion arises, is—Bills introduced, divisions in committee, and other parliamentary papers, amounting when printed to 1,050 of each for the Senate and 1,150 of each for the House.

Comparing the average cost of this class of work done for the Federal Parliament during the current session, 1901-2, with the average cost of the same class of work done for the Victorian Parliament for the sessions of 1899, 1900, and 1901, your committee find that the Federal expenditure has been less than that of the State.

The cost of printing Bills relating to subjects of exclusively federal jurisdiction, newly-organized and newly-projected federal departments—such as the Judiciary Bill, the Inter-State Commission Bill, the Service and Execution of Process Bill, the Audit Bill, the Property Acquisition Bill, the Public Service Bill, and the Electoral Bill—has, of course, involved new federal expenditure of an amount much greater than will ever be again required in any future session, even if amending Bills become necessary.

6. CIRCULATION OF PARLIAMENTARY DOCUMENTS.—On an examination of the list of persons and public bodies among whom parliamentary printed matter has been circulated, your committee are of opinion that the list could with reason and propriety be considerably reduced, and a substantial saving thus effected. If, in a session of four months, the number of copies of each of the parliamentary documents referred to in paragraph 5 of this report were reduced by 300 per sitting, it is estimated that it would result in a saving of £1,169 11s. 6d. during that period.

7. DEBATES.—With reference to the printing of Parliamentary Debates, your committee were informed that, at the beginning of the session, 5,500 copies of each weekly issue—of which 3,000 copies were circulated, and the balance kept in hand for stock and binding at the end of the session—were ordered to be printed; the number has since been reduced by 800.

The cost of printing the Debates from 9th May to 30th September, 1901, was £6,531 15s.; from 1st October, 1901, to 28th February, 1902, embracing about the same number of sittings as in the first period, the cost was £5,634 13s., being a reduction of about £900, or involving an average expenditure of about £300 per week. This reduction was effected by a condensation of the reports of the Debates in committee. Assuming that an ordinary session extended over a term of four months or seventeen weeks, the cost for each session would, on the present basis, amount to a little over £5,000.

This, in the opinion of your committee, is not a very heavy expenditure for the printing and publication of the Debates of two Federal Houses, one of which has usually sat four days per week, and the other three days per week. Your committee find that it is much below the average cost per sitting of printing the Debates of the Victorian Parliament, and also less than the cost per sitting of printing the Debates of the Canadian Parliament.

Your committee consider that the result of the comparison of the three Hansards is particularly satisfactory to that of the Commonwealth, especially in view of the fact that the compositors employed by the Commonwealth have been paid at the rate of 1s. 3d. per thousand as against 1s. per thousand, the ordinary rate; this increased rate having been allowed as a compensation for frequent waitings for copy, and for the long hours during which the men had been kept working or ready for work.

Your committee cannot recommend any further contraction of the official reports of speeches. At the beginning of the session the proceedings of the Federal Parliament were fairly well reported in the metropolitan newspapers. There has been of late a distinct falling-off in the character and value of those reports, and a tendency on the part of some of the leading newspapers to condense their reports into mere skeleton summaries, whilst in some cases even the pretence of reports is dispensed with, and sketches of an amusing description, but sometimes inaccurate and unjust, have been substituted. For the information of those of the Australian people desirous of obtaining full accounts of the proceedings of the national Parliament, as well as for the protection of honorable members against inaccuracies contained in imperfect newspaper versions, your committee recommend that the Federal Hansard be maintained in unimpaired efficiency.

It has been suggested that the sale and circulation of Hansard would be promoted by authorizing the officers in charge of the principal post-offices throughout Australia to sell copies and to take the names of those who wish to subscribe.

8. PRESENTED PAPERS.—Papers presented to both Houses by command, or pursuant to Act of Parliament, are sometimes ordered by each House to be printed. In this manner two sets of the same paper are printed, differing only in the title-page, viz., Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be. At first copies of each set were circulated, but this double circulation has been stopped for some time.

Your committee suggest that a common title-page be adopted in the case of all papers presented to both Houses. One set of papers would then suffice for the two Houses, each House receiving a certain number of copies, the balance being retained by the Government Printer for general stock.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Your committee beg to recommend—

- (1) That the practice of printing questions and answers in the Senate journals be discontinued.
- (2) That the practice of printing weekly reports of divisions in committee of the House of Representatives be discontinued.
- (3) That in future no Bill in its progress through either House be printed with amendments or new clauses in block type, or erased type, unless specially ordered by the House concerned.
- (4) That no despatch, report, or paper presented either to the Senate or the House be printed, except—(a) On a motion proposed by some responsible Minister of the Crown for special reasons duly stated; or (b) on the recommendation of the printing committee of either Chamber, duly confirmed.
- (5) That, should a similar despatch, report, or paper be presented to both the Senate and the House, in order to render one set of papers sufficient for both Houses, such despatch, report, or paper be printed with a common title-page.

- (6) That if, after an order has been made for the printing of any despatch, report, or paper under our fourth recommendation, the Clerk of the House in which the order has been made finds that the cost of printing the same will be very great, and that there are reasons why such order for printing should be reconsidered, he shall report his opinion to the President or the Speaker, as the case may be, and the President, if he concurs in such opinion, shall report the same to the Senate, and the Speaker, in the like case, shall report the same to the House.

- (7) That the number of copies of Notice-Papers, Journals, Votes and Proceedings, and Papers issued as described in paragraph 5 of our Report be reduced by at least 300.

Ordered to be printed.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—I propose to move that the consideration of the report be made an order of the day for Friday next.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is too soon, because the report will not be circulated by then. Fix its consideration for this day month.

The PRESIDENT.—The only part of the report which has been ordered to be printed is that which has been read. The evidence on which the report has been founded has not been ordered to be printed.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—As the other House will have printed more copies of the proceedings and evidence than are required for the use of its members, it is not necessary for the Senate to order that they be printed as well as the report. An ample number of copies to supply the members of both Houses will be printed to the order of the other House. It is simply the report as it has been read which will be printed for the Senate.

Senator Major GOULD.—We ought to have sufficient time in which to consider the report before it is discussed.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I understand, sir, that the report has been ordered to be printed?

The PRESIDENT.—Yes, but not the minutes of proceedings and the evidence. If the Senate relies on its own motion, it will not get a printed copy of the minutes of proceedings and the evidence.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales).—May I ask, sir, whether it was not arranged some time ago, by yourself and the Speaker, that all papers which were laid upon the table of either House should be supplied to all members of the Parliament?

The PRESIDENT.—That arrangement has been in force for some time. For a great many months duplicate printing has been abolished. Every paper which is laid before one House is laid before the other as a matter of course, and every member gets a copy of every paper which is printed.

Senator O'CONNOR.—As I understand that the minutes of proceedings and the evidence are to be printed to the order of the other House, and that as a matter of course every honorable senator will be supplied with a copy of the document, there is no need to do more here than to move for the printing of the report.

The PRESIDENT.—Perhaps the honorable and learned senator did not catch my point. Do I understand that the wish of the Senate is that, in addition to any document the other House may order to be printed, the Senate desires to order the report only to be printed as a separate document? I do not see the object of that.

Senator Major GOULD.—I understand that the other House is having everything printed?

Senator STYLES.—Except our report.

Senator Major GOULD.—When we have our report printed, we shall also have the evidence, quite apart from what the House of Representatives may do.

The PRESIDENT.—Then I take it that the Senate only wishes me to have one document printed, containing the minutes of evidence, as well as the report.

Senator Lt.-Col NEILD (New South Wales).—Do not honorable senators think that it would be more in consonance with the dignity of the Senate if we ordered the printing, and did not place ourselves at the mercy of the other House? I do not want any extra printing to be done, but if we passed a motion, our officers would see that there was no duplicate printing. We certainly ought not to be at the mercy of the other House.

The PRESIDENT.—I will take it that what I have said is the wish of the Senate.

Senator O'CONNOR.—As far as concerns fixing the date, perhaps next Wednesday will be the most convenient day for the discussion. I move—

That the report be considered on Wednesday next.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

VOTES OF THE PRESIDENT.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I rise to mention a matter of privilege, arising out of the division which was taken on the motion with regard to the allowances of the Governor-General. In that division I understand that you, sir, did not record a vote, although you were within the precincts of the chamber. I wish to bring the matter before the Senate in order to determine whether it is in order, and in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution, for any member of the Senate, or for the President, to remain within the chamber during a division and not to record a vote for or against a question. Of course I understand that we are governed first of all by the Constitution, and secondly by the standing orders which we have adopted temporarily, in so far as they do not contravene the provisions of the Constitution. Section 23 of the Constitution provides that—

Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote. The President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote, and when the votes are equal the question shall pass in the negative.

Senator MILLEN.—I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether this is a matter which can now be brought up, other business having intervened?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think it can, nor do I think that this is a matter of privilege, but I did not want to stop the proceedings. I did not wish the objection to come from me, but my ruling, now that the point has been raised, is that the subject cannot be brought up at this stage.

Senator PEARCE.—On the point of order, I should like to draw your attention, sir, to Standing Order No. 147.

The PRESIDENT.—Our standing orders are founded on the supposition that the President does not vote. The point raised by Senator Pearce cannot be discussed now. It can be raised at some other time. A point of this kind must be taken when the occasion arises, and not after any other business has intervened.

frequent waitings for copy, and for the long hours during which the men had been kept working or ready for work.

Your committee cannot recommend any further contraction of the official reports of speeches. At the beginning of the session the proceedings of the Federal Parliament were fairly well reported in the metropolitan newspapers. There has been of late a distinct falling-off in the character and value of those reports, and a tendency on the part of some of the leading newspapers to condense their reports into mere skeleton summaries, whilst in some cases even the pretence of reports is dispensed with, and sketches of an amusing description, but sometimes inaccurate and unjust, have been substituted. For the information of those of the Australian people desirous of obtaining full accounts of the proceedings of the national Parliament, as well as for the protection of honorable members against inaccuracies contained in imperfect newspaper versions, your committee recommend that the Federal Hansard be maintained in unimpaired efficiency.

It has been suggested that the sale and circulation of Hansard would be promoted by authorizing the officers in charge of the principal post-offices throughout Australia to sell copies and to take the names of those who wish to subscribe.

8. PRESENTED PAPERS.—Papers presented to both Houses by command, or pursuant to Act of Parliament, are sometimes ordered by each House to be printed. In this manner two sets of the same paper are printed, differing only in the title-page, viz., Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be. At first copies of each set were circulated, but this double circulation has been stopped for some time.

Your committee suggest that a common title-page be adopted in the case of all papers presented to both Houses. One set of papers would then suffice for the two Houses, each House receiving a certain number of copies, the balance being retained by the Government Printer for general stock.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Your committee beg to recommend—

- (1) That the practice of printing questions and answers in the Senate journals be discontinued.
- (2) That the practice of printing weekly reports of divisions in committee of the House of Representatives be discontinued.
- (3) That in future no Bill in its progress through either House be printed with amendments or new clauses in block type, or erased type, unless specially ordered by the House concerned.
- (4) That no despatch, report, or paper presented either to the Senate or the House be printed, except—(a) On a motion proposed by some responsible Minister of the Crown for special reasons duly stated; or (b) on the recommendation of the printing committee of either Chamber, duly confirmed.
- (5) That, should a similar despatch, report, or paper be presented to both the Senate and the House, in order to render one set of papers sufficient for both Houses, such despatch, report, or paper be printed with a common title-page.

- (6) That if, after an order has been made for the printing of any despatch, report, or paper under our fourth recommendation, the Clerk of the House in which the order has been made finds that the cost of printing the same will be very great, and that there are reasons why such order for printing should be reconsidered, he shall report his opinion to the President or the Speaker, as the case may be, and the President, if he concurs in such opinion, shall report the same to the Senate, and the Speaker, in the like case, shall report the same to the House.

- (7) That the number of copies of Notice-Papers, Journals, Votes and Proceedings, and Papers issued as described in paragraph 5 of our Report be reduced by at least 300.

Senator PEARCE.—Surely I am in order in discussing the point of order raised by Senator MilLEN?

Senator MILLEN.—Not after the President has ruled.

The PRESIDENT.—My ruling is that a point of order must be brought up when the occasion arises. If the honorable senator had wished to bring before the Senate the question of whether I was obliged to vote he should have done it when the division list was declared, and should not have allowed other business to intervene.

Senator PEARCE.—It was not known that the President had not voted when the numbers were declared.

The PRESIDENT.—During the whole of the session I have exercised my right to abstain from voting when I thought fit, and no one has objected. Any other honorable senator who does not want to vote can leave the chamber, but I cannot leave the chair.

Senator EWING.—No one dreamed that you would break the standing orders.

The PRESIDENT.—I am not breaking the standing orders. I now call on the next business.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

As honorable senators are no doubt aware, the Executive Council of the Commonwealth has power to appoint Royal commissions, or rather the Governor-General has vested in him that power as one of the functions of the King. That prerogative power is assigned to the Governor-General under section 2 of the Constitution constituting the office of Governor-General. But though the power of issuing letters patent is vested in the Governor-General, he cannot give any authority to examine witnesses upon oath, or to compel the attendance of witnesses, or to compel the production of documents. It is quite evident that the power to appoint Royal commissions is of no value whatever unless you can give power to examine witnesses on oath, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of documents. This very short measure is introduced for the purpose of giving such power to Royal commissions appointed by the Governor-General. It follows the lines of Acts in force now in all the different States. It simply gives the necessary power to examine witnesses on oath, or take affirmations in lieu of the oath. It attaches to affirmations and oaths so taken the penalties of false swearing before a court. It compels attendance under a summons, and compels the production of documents, books or writings, subject to a penalty on summary conviction for non-compliance not exceeding £50. It gives the commissioners the same protection as is given to a High Court of Justice, and it also gives protection to witnesses. It further permits the making of regulations prescribing a scale of allowances to be paid to witnesses, the claim to such allowances having to be certified by the president or chairman of the commission, and to be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament for the purpose of the commission. In fact, the Bill confers all the necessary powers for making Royal commissions a reality.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I merely rise to say that I do not like one clause in the Bill, which provides practically that a witness may decline to give evidence on the payment of £50. That is not a wise provision, because there may be occasions when a Royal commission may deal with a very important matter affecting the Commonwealth and its citizens. Certain witnesses may be able to give very important evidence, and the Royal commission ought to have all the powers of a Supreme Court, so that if any witness refused to answer questions that the commission was legally entitled to put to him, he might be dealt with in the same way as he would be dealt with by a Supreme Court. I trust that Senator O'Connor will see his way clear to agree to some amendment to alter that provision.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—So far as I understand the situation with which this Bill attempts to deal, there is a commission now in existence which is sitting without any legal warrant.

Senator O'CONNOR.—No; but the commission is without the power of summoning witnesses, and of examining them on oath. It has nearly concluded its work now.

Senator MILLEN.—I understand that the oath has been administered by the commission. If that be so, it might be well to put another clause in the Bill validating their actions.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do not know that that commission has administered oaths.

Senator MILLEN.—If Senator O'Connor is perfectly satisfied as to the position, I have nothing more to say. But it appears to me that there is a possibility of some trouble arising, and that it might be possible, by means of a simple clause, to validate what the commission has done.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee.

Clauses 1 to 8 agreed to.

Senator O'CONNOR.—With regard to the question asked by Senator Millen before we went into committee, as to whether the evidence taken by the Royal commission which has recently been sitting was taken on oath, I wish to say that I do not think it has been. But as the question has been raised I have sent to ascertain definitely whether the evidence was taken on oath or not. Should there be any necessity to validate what has been done by the commission, the matter can be reconsidered on the motion for the third reading.

Bill reported without amendment; report adopted.

ELECTORAL BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of amendments of the House of Representatives resumed from 22nd August, vide page 15310):

Motion (by Senator DRAKE) proposed—

That the committee agree to new clause 140A, as amended, viz. :—

Any elector may vote at the polling place for which he is enrolled, or if he is absent from the polling place for which he is enrolled may vote at any other polling place for the same division at any election whether for the Senate or the House of Representatives, if he makes and signs before the presiding officer a declaration in the form R 1 in the schedule.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—When this amendment was last before us, I made some very warm comments upon the system of pairing followed upon that occasion. As some of my remarks may have been construed as a reflection upon the Government whip, Senator Keating, I wish to say that I had no intention of insinuating that he had interfered in any way with the system of pairing. I relieve him altogether of any responsibility for the pairs which were arranged if there was anything wrong in regard to them. I understand that the clause is to be postponed.

Senator DRAKE.—It was pointed out when the matter was last before us that as the new clause had been amended, it could not be postponed.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I had not the pleasure of being present when this proposed new clause was discussed last week, but I must say that I have very grave apprehensions as to the danger to the purity of elections that may result from it. It will most undoubtedly give great scope for personation. Unless I am mistaken as to the wording of the clause, it appears to me that under it any handful of unscrupulous men—and there is no State, unfortunately, which does not possess them—could go from polling place to polling place and vote again and again. I have had, in New South Wales, in bygone years, a very considerable experience of the possibilities in this direction, and I have no hesitation in saying that a clause which opens the door as this appears to do, will lead to very gross and extensive personation. I do not see how it is to be checked. I know of many cases of personation which were proved in New South Wales, and for which men were sent to gaol. But we know very well that for one man who was punished, there were scores, if not hundreds, who escaped. Every one who was acquainted with the old electoral laws of New South Wales knew that thoroughly well, and the Legislature found it necessary to take steps to check, if not to stop, the practice altogether. With that object, changes were made in the electoral laws. For example, instead of having some 40 different electorates for the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, the State was divided into 125 single electorates. Every one could see that the smaller the area of the electorates the less was the chance of personation. Provision was also made for voters' certificates, so that no man could possibly vote more than once on the same certificate. A man might purloin the certificate of some absent voter and vote on it, but the possibility of anything of the sort was infinitesimal, and was hardly worth considering. The average division in New South Wales for the House of Representatives embraces five of the State House electorates, and under this provision, which does not require the production of any certificate, a voter could go to ever so many polling places in one division, and vote over and over again. I understand that the clause gives any voter for the Senate a right to go from division to division. The metropolitan divisions for the House of Representatives, so far as Melbourne and Sydney are concerned, are about ten in number, and in each division there are a number of polling places. What is to prevent an unknown man, who has just got his name on the rolls, from going from one polling place to another and personating some other voter, or repeating his own vote? The matter is one of very great importance, and I earnestly hope that the committee will object to the clause. I am prepared to vote for its excision.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I also am prepared to vote for the excision of the clause. I think it is a very great mistake. In the first place, we allow a man who cannot attend the polling place for which he is enrolled to vote by post. We also allow a man who cannot be at the polling place for which he is enrolled on the day of election to have his vote transferred to another polling booth. Now it is proposed to give him a right which, so far as divisions are concerned, does away with the necessity for the two provisions I have named, and which we have made for his convenience. If we allow a voter to vote in any polling place within the division, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, then we should certainly allow a voter for the Senate to record his vote in any part of a State, as each State is polled as one electorate. Some of the divisions for the House of Representatives comprise enormous areas, with distances ranging up to something like 1,000 miles. I should imagine that there are some divisions in Queensland—there are certainly some in South Australia—which are larger than the whole of Tasmania.

Senator GLASSEY.—In Queensland we have a division which is larger than Victoria.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That being so, I am against this clause. There is no necessity for it. It is an absurdity and an excrescence on the Bill. It appears to have been inserted simply because another place struck out the provision which we had made for voters' certificates. We have had made all the provision that is necessary to meet the case of the absent voter. We have done it in the two ways I have named, and now we are asked to give him a privilege which can be abused to a very considerable extent. It will be possible to abuse it to a still greater extent than would otherwise be the case, owing to the absence of the provision for voters' certificates. It would be much better for the Government to drop this clause. I understood that the Government were prepared to move the reconsideration of this clause in some way. I wish only to indicate the way in which I shall vote.

Senator DRAKE.—As we propose to reconsider the clause almost immediately, I think we should formally agree to it, in order that that may be done.

Question — That the amendment, as amended, be agreed to—put. The committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Amendment in clause 141 agreed to.

Clause 142 (Questions to be put if voter challenged).

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—The amendments in this clause are almost entirely drafting ones. The other House has omitted the words, "if the right of any person claiming to vote is challenged," so that the clause now provides that the presiding officer may, and at the request of a scrutineer, shall put to any person claiming to vote all or any of the questions which follow. There is no necessity for any form of challenge. I move—

That the committee agree to the amendments omitting the words "if the right of any person claiming to vote is challenged," and substituting for the word "him" the words "any person claiming to vote."

Motion agreed to.

Senator DRAKE.—I move—

That the committee agree to the amendment omitting paragraph II., and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraph:—"II. Are you of the full age of 21 years?"

This amendment is necessary in consequence of the voter's certificate having been done away with. It will be observed that the second question was—

Are you the person to whom this voter's certificate was issued?

It has been altered by the other House to read—

Are you of the full age of 21 years?

There is no voter's certificate provided, but it may be necessary in certain cases to ask a voter if he is of the full age of 21 years.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I do not know that this is of very much importance; but, in view of the alteration to which Senator Drake has referred, is the second question necessary? Before a person can get his name placed on the roll he must have answered that question, and therefore, when in the polling booth, he has answered the first question, namely, that he is the person whose name appears on the roll for the division, he has answered the second question. It seems to me that under these circumstances the second question is not necessary. It proceeds to open up his right to be on the roll. There is no necessity to challenge his qualification to be on the roll after he is enrolled.

Senator DAWSON.—But supposing that he is only seventeen years of age?

Senator MILLEN.—That question ought to have been inquired into before his name was put on the roll. Having once got his name put on the roll, and passed by the revision court, there ought to be no authority in the presiding officer on polling day to question his qualifications. His qualifications have or should have been inquired into before his name was put on the roll.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They never are, and never can be.

Senator MILLEN.—They ought not to be inquired into at a later stage. Having once got his name put on the roll, for the purpose of the clause the only thing for him to do is to satisfy the presiding officer that he is the person whose name appears on the roll for the division. Whether he got there legally or illegally is not the business of the presiding officer. It is turning the polling-booth into another revision court. We need only one revision court, and that is the one which finally determines the roll, and until the next revision court sits no one ought to challenge the qualifications by virtue of which a person got his name placed on the roll.

Senator DRAKE.—The object of the question is to insure that the person who claims to vote is entitled to do so. In the first place, a person puts in a written application to get his name placed upon the roll without ever being seen by the revision court. Supposing that a person offers to vote who is manifestly a minor or who is apparently under the age of 21 years, why should not the presiding officer be allowed to ask him the question—"Are you of the full age of 21 years?" If he is the person whose name is on the roll, and he is properly enrolled, he is over 21 years of age, and he need have no objection to answering that question in the affirmative.

Senator MILLEN.—The Minister admits that it is making another revision court of the polling booth?

Senator DRAKE.—It is not another revision court. The applicant does not appear personally before any one when he applies to have his name put on the roll. He sends in a written application. The position may not have been properly explained to him, and he may have been an innocent party to a wrong statement. He may have been under 21 years of age when he filled in the form and got his name enrolled, but when he comes to record his vote he appears to be below that age. This clause simply authorizes the presiding officer, if required to do so by a scrutineer, to put the question to him. If he is properly on the roll he says "yes," and there is an end to the matter; but if he cannot say "yes," he has no right to vote.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—The contention of the Postmaster-General is that it is desirable in the polling booth to open up the question of an elector's qualifications. Why does the clause stop at asking the question as to a man's age? Why are not inquiries made as to his other qualifications?

Senator DRAKE.—He is asked—"Are you disqualified from voting?"

Senator MILLEN.—He is not asked whether he has lived in the electorate for the prescribed time. What is the real reason why the second question was altered? When the voters' certificate was abolished the second question became unnecessary, with and without much thought its form was altered. If the polling booth is to be made a revision court, the work ought to be done properly. I do not think it ought to be a revision court. An answer to the second clause should be sufficient, namely, that the person who claims to vote is the person whose name appears on the roll. If his right to be on the roll is to be inquired into in the polling booth, he should be asked the other questions which would enable the presiding officer to determine whether he had been within the electorate for the prescribed time before he claimed to have his name put on the roll.

Senator DAWSON.—Look at form B.

Senator MILLEN.—That form furnishes a direct answer to the contention of Senator Drake, that a person who is under the age of 21 years may have innocently sent in a written application to have his name put on the roll. In the form of application he is required to say—"I am of the age of 21 years."

Senator DRAKE.—He does not apply personally.

Senator Major GOULD. — The revision court has to revise the list and to be satisfied that he is entitled to vote.

Senator DRAKE.—The revision court do not see the person, and the presiding officer does.

Senator MILLEN.—If the whole of the persons qualifications are to be inquired into, why should he not be asked all the questions which are set down in form B, and not merely one of them? For instance, why should he not be asked whether he is a natural born or naturalized subject of the King, or whether he is an inhabitant of Australia.

Senator DRAKE.—Senator Millen seems to ignore my point. To a certain extent the age may be indicated by a man's appearance, and that is not tested until he applies to vote. There is no reason why he should be asked whether he has been living in the electorate for the prescribed time or the other questions because his personal appearance will not assist the presiding officer in deciding whether he is speaking the truth or not. The applicant may have stated in writing that he was of the age of 21 years, and it is only when he asks for a voting-paper that an opportunity is afforded of testing the truth of his statement. If he appears to be a mere boy, what is the harm of asking him whether he is of the full age of 21 years? No lady could object to being asked that question. The fact of her being allowed to vote is an admission that she is of the full age of 21 years. It would be a different thing if she were required to state her age.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It does not seem to me that this question is arguable for a minute, and I am astonished at Senator Drake so strenuously supporting what has evidently got into the clause by an inadvertence. It will be seen that the definition of an elector is "any person whose name appears upon the roll as an elector." An elector is any person entitled to vote. He goes up to the polling booth, and asks for a ballot-paper. He says—"I am John Jones, and I am entitled to vote." If there is a doubt about it the returning officer may, and on the request of the scrutineers must, ask three questions. The first is—"Are you the person whose name appears upon the roll?" That implies that the person is 21 years of age. If the elector satisfactorily answers that question it is enough. No man or woman should be asked a question as to whether his or her age is over 21. The second question which the Bill formerly ordered to be put was—"Are you the person whose name appears upon the voter's certificate?" The third question was—"Have you already voted?" Then, on the assumption that the person's name appears on the roll, the fourth question was put—"Are you disqualified from voting?" When the question was before the House of Representatives, having done away with voters' certificates, they struck out the question—"Are you the person to whom the voters' certificate was issued?" Then, in order not to offend the Senate, they put in something else. But if this question is allowed to stand, and the scrutineers dispute the age of a voter, what is to be done? The thing is an absurdity. The doubt that is to be solved by putting the questions is as to the identity of the person claiming to be upon the roll, and the question as to the age is not necessary.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable and learned senator's view of the question topples over as soon as the facts of the case are known. When he says that the House of Representatives inserted the question referred to out of consideration for the Senate he overlooks the fact that the reference to voters' certificates was necessarily struck out because they are not provided for, and that it was a private member of another place, who was desirous that the question in regard to age should be put. It was inserted probably for the reason I have given—so that when an elector with a particularly youthful appearance came to vote, evidence should be given that he was over the age of 21.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I think I can give a reason why this question should be allowed to stand. If honorable senators turn to clause 57, they will find that names can get upon the roll not only upon the claims of the electors, and not only by following out the method of form B, but also from information supplied by the police and by the statistical and electoral officers in any State or municipality. A municipal officer supplying this information would necessarily take the municipal roll, which does not contain the ages of voters. In Western Australia, owing to the practice of taking information from municipal officers, we have had upon the roll persons who were not of the age of 21 years, and who never said they were 21. These names have been supplied by the municipal authorities, and when they came to vote at parliamentary elections, and were asked "Are you of the age of 21?" they would reply in the negative, and would not be allowed to vote. I know of a voter who made a claim to vote simply because his name was on an electoral roll, although he was not a naturalized subject of the King. It therefore seems to me that the question is a necessary one, and should be allowed to stand.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales, Vice-President of the Executive Council).—Senator Pearce has given a correct explanation, as I find from the records of another place that it was there pointed out that the municipal rolls are frequently made up from the names of persons who hold land. According to the laws of Victoria and of New South Wales, persons may select land and become occupiers before the age of 21. In New South Wales the age is sixteen; it is eighteen in Western Australia, and eighteen in Victoria. Therefore the persons who make up the municipal rolls, and who supply information to the Commonwealth electoral officers, may supply the names of such persons, although they are not entitled to vote according to the Commonwealth law. There is no good reason for leaving out this question.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I do not think the question can do much harm, though I quite agree that it is altogether wrong to put such a question to a man or woman whose name is on the roll when he or she comes to vote. The time for the age to be ascertained is when an application is made to have the name put on the roll. The municipal officer who supplies the information referred to should know the age of the applicant before supplying the name to the Commonwealth electoral officer. It will be a simple matter for a person desiring to get his name upon the roll to obtain a note from a magistrate, or some other responsible person, saying that he or she is of the age of 21. But it will be an unpleasant thing to put such a question on the day of the election. Some women may look 19 when they are 24 or 25. We are prone to make ourselves look younger than we are. The day of the election is not the time for putting this question. Once on the roll, a person should be allowed to vote.

Motion agreed to.

Amendments in clause 145 agreed to.

Amendment in clause 146 postponed.

Amendments in clauses 148 and 149, agreed to.

Clause 151—

In elections for the Senate, the voter shall mark his ballot paper by making a cross in the square opposite the name of each candidate for whom he votes. The voter shall vote for the full number of candidates to be elected.

Senator DRAKE.—I move—

That the amendment of the House of Representatives omitting all the words after the word "votes," line 4, be agreed to.

This is a provision that has already been the subject of a great deal of discussion. It involves the question of plumping for Senate elections. It will be remembered that when the Bill was before us first it provided for preferential voting, and, of course, for no plumping. Then an amendment was proposed by which, after the provision relating to preferential voting had been defeated, it was proposed to allow plumping. After considerable discussion that was defeated by a very large majority. The Bill originally prohibited plumping. In the House of Representatives the matter was discussed again, and the last sentence of the clause was struck out. By striking out those words plumping was again restored, and in that form it comes down to the Senate. I am quite prepared to admit that there are arguments which may be used on both sides. One very strong argument used in favour of plumping is that it is not right to force a man to vote for candidates for whom he does not desire to vote. At present a man can refuse absolutely to vote for any one for whom he does not wish to vote. But the provision prohibiting plumping says that though he may, if he likes, refuse to vote for any candidate, yet if he votes for one, or two, or three, he must vote for six if six be the full number to be elected. That I know is strongly objected to by a great number of voters who claim that they should be allowed to vote for two, three or four candidates if they think those candidates should be elected, and to refuse to vote for any to whom they object. I have moved that the amendment of the House of Representatives be agreed to, but, no doubt, the Senate will have a great deal to say with regard to the method of election for this House.

Senator PULSFORD.—Did not the members of the Government in the House of Representatives vote against the amendment?

Senator DRAKE.—The Ministers in this Chamber are occupying the same position as they have occupied all along in proposing that the amendment of the House of Representatives be agreed to.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think we should do better to accept the dictates of Senator Drake's heart rather than the sound of his voice on this question. Those of us who object to plumping have behind us a majority of twenty to eight. In this case I think that the House of Representatives ought to allow the Senate to have its way as to the mode by which its own elections should be conducted. We were particularly careful not to interfere in any way with any machinery dealing with the elections for the House of Representatives. But the House of Representatives have dealt with our method of election. My honorable and learned friend said that there was something to be said in favour of plumping. There is infinitely more to be said against it when we consider the Constitution on the basis of equal representation in the Senate. In the House of Representatives, with equal electorates, it is practicable to insist on every voter voting, if he votes at all, for his one man. Where there were three to be chosen for the Senate, as it will be, unless there is a penal dissolution, which is not likely in the immediate future, the position, I think, would not be consistent with that which the Senate occupies under the Constitution, if a voter did not exercise his franchise as to the whole number to be elected. That is a matter which mainly concerns the Senate. After full discussion, the Senate decided by a large majority that an elector should be compelled to vote for the full number to be returned; and members of the Government in another place, acting on the principle which actuated the Senate in abstaining from interfering with the machinery of the House of Representatives, supported the view of the Senate. I shall be very glad—if this is to be a precedent—if the Government will always stick to what the Senate does, and I think that in this particular instance they might very fairly accept the situation and disagree with the amendment.

Senator DRAKE.—I should like to correct my honorable and learned friend on one point. He is probably not aware that the amendments in clauses 22, 23, and 24, which were sent to us, were disagreed with, the committee claiming to retain a voice with regard to the election of members of the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Of course we had a right to do that. We were seeking to prevent jerrymandering.

Senator DRAKE.—In the same way the House of Representatives has clearly a right to express an opinion in regard to this Chamber. We are seeking to bring the two Chambers into accord upon this matter.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—The leader of the Opposition, I suppose, in the absence of any argument which he could possibly bring forward in support of his contention, has endeavoured to play upon the little jealousy which no doubt exists between the two Houses. He asked, in a burst of virtuous indignation, why we should tolerate any interference on the part of the House of Representatives with the way in which elections for the Senate are to be conducted. In the next breath, the honorable senator invoked the Constitution. He said it would be most unconstitutional if the electors were not compelled to vote for the full number of candidates required.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Those are not the words I used, but they are near enough.

Senator STEWART.—At one moment the honorable and learned senator is prepared to throw the Constitution into the fire, metaphorically to have it burnt by the common hangman. What else could be adduced from the honorable and learned senator's statement that the House of Representatives has no right to interfere with the way in which the elections for the Senate are to be conducted? Although I do not pretend to be a constitutional authority, it appears to me that every Commonwealth Act must be passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. The Senate is a portion of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the House of Representatives is a portion of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and every Act must be passed by both Houses. To advance as a reason against this amendment that the House of Representatives has no right to interfere with the way in which we conduct our elections for the Senate seems to me to be one of the weakest arguments that could be adduced. The honorable and learned senator said that no reasons had been given why electors should not be compelled to vote for the full number of candidates required. I think that if the honorable and learned senator had kept his ears open he would have heard reasons sufficient to convince any ordinary man of the justice of the amendment now before us. Senator Symon, and those connected with him, desire to compel electors either to disfranchise themselves or to vote for a man whom they do not wish to see in Parliament. There might be four free-traders and three protectionists presenting themselves for election. I might desire to see three protectionists returned, but if the Bill were passed as the honorable and learned senator wishes it to be passed, I should be compelled to either abandon my vote for the three protectionists or to vote for them and neutralize that vote by also voting for three free-traders.

Senator PLAYFORD.—As a rule there will be only three elected.

Senator STEWART.—It does not matter whether the number is three or more. Of course, in ordinary circumstances, unless the Opposition forces a dissolution, there will be only three members elected at an election, but we are not discussing that matter just now. We are discussing a great principle—the principle that no man should be compelled to vote for a candidate to whom he objects. If any honorable senator laid down the proposition that he should, would the leader of the Opposition consent to it? Not for one moment. He would agree with me that it would be tyranny of the grossest description to drag a man to the polling booth, and compel him to vote for a candidate to whom he objected.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He need not vote at all.

Senator STEWART.—He must either vote for a man to whom he objects, for a man whose policy is utterly opposed to his own, for a man whom he does not desire to see in Parliament, or lose his vote for the man whom he desires to see elected: The honorable and learned senator claims to be an advocate of liberty and freedom, and yet this is the position in which he would place the electors. It would be worse than the old system in England, where landlords used to drive their tenants like slaves in gangs to the polling booths, and make them vote as they desired. This is the most serious blemish upon the electoral laws of the Commonwealth. We know why a number of honorable senators are so strongly in favour of the block vote. They are not governed by principle; there is no principle in the matter. Honorable senators from New South Wales are opposed to plumping, because plumping would seriously endanger the vote of a particular section of the population. They are opposed to it because they could not return five free-traders if plumping were permitted—because it would break the solid free-trade phalanx in New South Wales.

Senator Major GOULD.—We should still return the five.

Senator STEWART.—The Victorians are opposed to the system for the same reason—because it would burst up the protectionist party.

Senator STYLES.—Nothing could do that.

Senator STEWART.—Either party is prepared to sacrifice principle on the altar of political expediency.

Senator MILLEN.—Then the honorable senator admits that under plumping a State would be misrepresented.

Senator STEWART.—No. With plumping minorities would have an opportunity to be represented. Does the honorable senator wish that a minority should have no representation in the councils of the country? Does he know anything of the history of Parliament? Does he not know that in the beginning every adult in the community was represented in Parliament? Parliament was then a meeting of the people, and our Parliament to-day ought to be as representative of the people as if all the people were gathered together in one meeting.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — That is the Hare-Spence system.

Senator STEWART. — I have no particular objection to the Hare-Spence system.

Senator FRASER. — The majority would rule in a mass meeting.

Senator STEWART. — But all would be heard. I have no objection to the majority ruling.

Senator STYLES. — All sections are represented now.

Senator STEWART. — They would not all be represented under the block system of voting. If there were 100,000 free-traders and 99,000 protectionists in New South Wales, the 100,000 free-traders would have all the representation in the Senate. Does the honorable senator desire a condition of affairs such as that? If it appeals to him it certainly does not appeal to me. Every interest ought to be represented here; every cause should have an opportunity of being heard here. It is only by having the fullest representation of every interest, every class, and every movement, so to speak, that we can have legislation in the best interests of the country. I would ask my honorable friends to forget political expediency for once, and to set their feet upon the rock of principle. If they do they will be found voting against an iniquitous provision, which would compel a man to either disfranchise himself or probably to vote for some person to whom he was utterly opposed, and who would not represent him in the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales). — The honorable senator who has just resumed his seat, has been at very great pains to explain the original principles under which persons were represented and able to vote to determine any question. He has also pointed out in reply to an interjection that 100,000 voters could outweigh 99,000 voters in any election. We know that. He claims, however, that the 99,000 would have no representation. To carry that argument further he must know that if 35 honorable senators divide on any question, the votes of eighteen neutralize the votes of the remaining seventeen, so that to bring the matter down to bed-rock, the majority must rule in some form or other, and the minority has simply to put up with the result. The minority represented in this Chamber, can explain their views here but they can be voted down. There is nothing in that particular argument. The honorable senator also claims that it is a hardship to compel a man to vote for three individuals when he thinks that there is only one of them fit to enter Parliament.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — An elector is not compelled—he is only asked to exercise his franchise.

Senator Major GOULD. — Exactly. The honorable senator says that a man who wants to vote for only one, will have to vote for two others whom he does not think should be in Parliament. If there are three to be elected, and if the elector can see only one man whom he considers to be really fit for the position, and for whom he feels impelled to vote, he must take the two least objectionable out of the other candidates, and so assist in preventing the worst from being returned.

Senator DE LARGIE. — Do all the electors vote for the three successful candidates?

Senator Major GOULD. — No. But all vote for the three they desire to be returned. That is the position which we occupy now. There must be some candidate that an elector dislikes more than others, just as there are candidates whom he likes more than others. Senator Drake has claimed that the committee has already exercised the right to dictate to the other House as to the way in which elections for the House of Representatives shall be conducted.

Senator DRAKE. — Not to dictate, but to retain a voice.

Senator Major GOULD. — The honorable and learned senator has referred to clauses 22 and 23. Those clauses relate to the manner in which a State has to be parcelled out for the election of members of the House of Representatives, and that is a matter which is distinctly placed in the hands of Parliament. They do not affect the machinery for carrying out the elections.

Senator PLAYFORD. — It is the way in which the Government originally introduced it.

Senator Major GOULD.—That is so. What the Government say is that Parliament is to approve of the cutting up of a State into divisions ; that there shall be no jerrymandering, and no cutting out of electorates for special individuals by the House of Representatives. In this House the smaller States are represented, because we want to protect the interests of the smaller States against anything of that kind, just as we desire to protect their interests in other respects. We have equal representation here in order to deal with a matter of of that kind. Therefore, the Postmaster-General is quite wrong when he assumes that we are attempting in any way to interfere with the rights of the other Chamber. We are not deciding how their elections shall be conducted ; we are dealing only with the way in which the States shall be cut up. If we insisted upon clause 152 being passed as it left this Chamber there might be some ground for saying that we were interfering with the way in which the machinery of the elections for the House of Representatives was to operate. In claiming to deal with clause 151, we are acting within our own rights, and acting within those rights, it will be our duty when we come to clause 152 to leave the amendment as made by the House of Representatives in regard to contingent voting in the position it now occupies. I hope that the committee will adhere to its original proposal. I am sorry to find that both the members of the Government in this Chamber contemplate going the other way, especially when I recollect that their four colleagues, who voted on the question in another place, voted to retain the clause as sent down by the Senate, showing they recognised that the Senate had a right to deal with it according to their desire. I am sorry that Ministers in this Chamber, because of a kind of loyalty which they think they ought to show to the majority in another place, deem it incumbent upon them to vote in a way directly contrary to that adopted by their colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And against the majority in the Senate.

Senator Major GOULD.—Yes ; it is unfortunate to find a Government divided against themselves. I submit that the whole merits are in favour of the clause as it left this Chamber, and that this is a matter for the Senate to determine, and to carry out in the way which we consider best.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I do not concur with the honorable and learned senator's view of what Ministers in the Senate ought to do in the circumstances in which we find ourselves. As honorable senators will remember, the Government introduced in this House, as an important portion of the electoral policy, the system of proportional voting, and did their best to carry it. As honorable senators are aware, it was fought to the bitter end, and we gave way only when we found that we were voted down. We say that the next best way of achieving proportional representation is by the system which was proposed in the clause originally. I advocated the adoption of the clause on the ground that it was the nearest approach we could get to proportional representation, and on that ground and others which I shall mention, it ought to be adopted as the method of electing the senators. The committee defeated the proposal by a large majority, and when the Bill was sent to the other House the Ministry, whatever their personal views were, felt themselves bound to do what was possible to carry it into law. Of course, they might have thrown over the Bill because of the existence of that provision, but they thought that it contained so many important provisions which required to be enacted that they were not justified in taking that step. They adopted the Bill as it left the Senate, because their object was to endeavour as far as possible to bring both Houses into agreement on the matter. The duty of a Government is as far as possible to try to bring about practical legislation, and so long as they can achieve that object without sacrificing any material principle in a Bill—so material that it is necessary for the actual carrying out of their legislation—they are perfectly justified in dropping one clause, or taking a view of the clause which does not accord with their personal opinions.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We do not complain of Ministers in the other House voting against it.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Senator Gould complained.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No ; he eulogized them for doing it. His complaint is that the honorable and learned member does not follow their example.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Our ideas of eulogy differ. I take leave to look behind the honorable senator's eulogy in order to ascertain his real meaning. The other House, by a considerable majority, took the opposite view to the Senate, and when the Bill comes back, what position are we to take up? Is it to be said that my honorable and learned colleague and I are to ask the committee to dissent from what the other House has done? Although the other House has carried out the view of the Government, we are supposed to ask the committee to disapprove of what has been done. That would be a most ridiculous position for us to take up. I should have liked to hear Senator Gould expatiate upon that view if it had been adopted. The fact of the matter is that some honorable senators who sit opposite find fault with whatever the Government may do. In the first place, the provision should be considered on its merits, because it is essential for the carrying out of any proper and fair system of representation. In the second place, as it is desirable that the two Houses should come to an agreement, and that the Bill should become law, the provision should be adopted as it left the other House. Senator Gould seems to forget that in the union there are other States beside New South Wales, and other electoral systems besides hers. The block-voting system exists in all the States, but in Queensland, Western Australia, and South Australia the block vote is exercised with the right of plumping. In those three States an elector is not obliged to vote for men of whom he may disapprove, but he is entitled to vote for the three or six candidates, or to give all his votes to one candidate. In Tasmania the senators were elected on a more scientific system of proportional representation. The Hare-Clark system was in force at the time of the elections; but there has been a change in the law which I believe has affected the right of voting. I rely on the example which is furnished by the States of Queensland, Western Australia, and South Australia. Surely, in framing for the first time a uniform electoral law we must pay some consideration to the circumstance that there is a system of voting in three of the States which undoubtedly gives to a man the right which is claimed here—the right to exercise his vote as he likes, and not to be forced to vote for persons whom he disapproves of, and who may hold views which are absolutely abhorrent to him. What can he do now? His only alternative now is either to refuse to vote, or to include in his vote, and be the means of returning, a man who holds principles which are absolutely discordant with his own.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They will be returned whether he votes for them or not.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is not so. It enables a man to throw the whole of his electoral power on to one candidate, or on to two or three, as he thinks fit, and if he thinks it is necessary, in order to secure the representation of his views, that he should give the whole of his electoral power to one candidate instead of distributing it over three candidates, on what principle should he not do so?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is a political betrayal of his rights — of his trust.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The honorable and learned senator carries his case no further by speaking of a man's betrayal of rights, or a betrayal of his trust. His right is to have his opinions represented in Parliament, and he is entitled to exercise the whole of his electoral power in order to secure the attainment of that end.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable and learned friend admits that he wants to get in by plumping this so-called minority representation.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It is not so-called minority representation, but proportional representation. It is the representation of opinions. It is the representation which has been enjoyed in three States out of five, and my honorable and learned friend has to answer that condition of things, and to explain, in some way, why it should be taken away. What has been the result of the working of the block vote system in New South Wales? At the Senate elections the electors were compelled to vote for six candidates. But that did not prevent the carrying out indirectly of the very plumping which has been complained of here. We know that at all these elections there are a number of candidates who have no chance of being returned. In what manner was the end attained of securing the representation of those who did not care to vote the whole party ticket? They voted for two candidates whom they wished to be elected, and for four "wasters" who, in their opinion, had no chance of being returned. Indirectly, and by a misuse of the electoral system, it was sought to bring about the result which we wish to have brought about here in an open and direct way by carrying out this principle of allowing a man to vote as he thinks proper.

Senator MILLEN.—And the result was that no minorities were represented.

Senator O'CONNOR.—How is that any answer to me?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned gentleman says that indirectly the system is in operation and does not succeed.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That is no answer to what I have been pointing out—that men will have their opinions represented, and that you cannot secure that object by any electoral devices to compel them to vote against their opinions. They will adopt every kind of indirect means to bring about the result of having their opinions represented. In New South Wales a number of persons had votes cast in their favour who were utterly unworthy of being voted for, and whom the voters did not wish to have elected. All this farce had to be gone through, because the electors would not be dragooned by any system into giving votes which they did not wish to give, and that always will be so.

Senator MILLEN.—And still the dominant majority carried the day in spite of this indirect plumping system.

Senator O'CONNOR.—How does that answer me?

Senator MILLEN.—It shows that the results were the best possible.

Senator O'CONNOR.—It does not.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable and learned gentleman was returned.

Senator O'CONNOR.—That was a good result, certainly. I should have liked two trusty comrades to be returned with me, and they would have been returned if there had been anything like a reasonable system of recording the opinions of the electors. I have cited the experience of New South Wales as an illustration of the impossibility of carrying out the system of block voting. This indirect use of the electoral system for that purpose will be avoided if you adopt the reasonable expedient, not of compelling men to brigade themselves under particular party flags whether they like it or not, but of giving them the liberty of voting in accordance with their opinions. We never will get a Parliament which properly represents the people unless the opinions which exist outside are fairly represented therein in accordance with their proportions. I feel very earnestly about this matter. I should be very sorry indeed to see the Senate fall into the mistake of depriving the electors in three States of the right which they now possess to have their opinions represented, and of forcing upon them and upon the whole of Australia a system which reserves the antiquated method of endeavouring to ascertain the opinions of the people by compelling them, whether they like it or not, to vote in accordance with certain party lines. I hope that the clause as it stands now will be agreed to.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—The proposals which are advocated by Senator O'Connor mean the destruction of a great national policy. We cannot have representation in the Senate, or even in the other House, of every odd and end of political thought, and it is not desirable that we should. There are only six senators for each State, and are there only six parties who can be got together in the State? If an election were held under a system of plumping we might have a man returned in the interests of the civil service, a man returned in the interests of the military, a man returned in the interests of temperance, a man returned in the interests of the single tax, a man returned in the interests of protection, and a man returned in the interests of free-trade. Yet the six senators, who were each returned in the interests of a special class, might represent only six out of thirty or forty different ideas floating about in the public mind. Unless I am very much mistaken, the whole basis of the public life of a country is that the public mind must be got to focus round some great principle. Are not the free-trade party and the protectionist party, being the two main parties in the State, eager to absorb into their ranks the smaller parties? Are they not always on the look-out for support? Is there any new idea that can be brought forward which the dominant parties will not be eager to absorb and to support, in order that they themselves may be sustained? That is the way in which, it appears to me, we ought to strive to maintain the political life of the country. Australia is becoming a nation, and we hope that in the future it will be a very great nation. We may be brought face to face with a very serious question, involving international complications, and are we, then, to focus the whole strength of the voting power of the country around that question, or to divide ourselves on every paltry issue that can be thought of? Do not let us do it. It is very noteworthy that on a previous occasion the representatives of the Government in the Senate supported one policy, and that their colleagues in the other House reversed that policy. What does that mean? That when we carry a motion to-night rejecting the principle of plumping, and the Bill goes back to the other House, the representatives of the Ministry there will accept it. I trust that the committee will put the representatives of the Ministry in that House in the position of supporting this amendment.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I wish to congratulate the members of the Opposition upon their splendid majority, and the very apparent joy which that fact is causing in their ranks. I do not think that since the opening of the session we have seen so much hilarity in their ranks as we have witnessed to-night. Their majority, which on this occasion may be termed a brutal majority, seems to be the cause of merriment even to such a serious gentleman as Senator Pulsford. But I trust that, in all their merriment, they will not lose sight of the justice of the claim of those whose numerical strength in the country justifies their representation in the Senate. In support of that view I propose to quote some of those whose voices only a few months ago were lifted in defence of the principle they were fighting for, but who to-night are prepared to sacrifice their views in the interests of their party. Senator Charleston, whose excitement this evening is so great that he cannot retain his seat, advocated proportional representation.

Senator STYLES.—He voted against plumping.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes. The honorable senator advocated proportional representation, and voted against the second reading of a Bill which contained that principle.

Senator CHARLESTON.—No; because it provided for single electorates, with the contingent vote.

Senator PEARCE.—The acrobatic feats of my honorable friend on this Bill cannot be paralleled in the history of this world. I am not going to advance any arguments, but merely to cite the arguments of those who will vote against us to-night. For instance, on the 6th February Senator Ewing said—

It cannot be representation of that State, and the block system, properly organized and properly worked, must always inevitably result in class domination.

Yet to-night he intends to vote for class domination. Senator Best, who, I understand, has been paired against us on this question, also condemned the block vote unsparingly. He said—

The other system that we are accustomed to is the block system, and I think honorable senators will coincide with me when I say that it is full of danger, doubt and uncertainty. The will of the majority at times is absolutely thwarted by the block vote.

The position which was taken up to-night by Senator O'Connor is borne out by the statement of Senator Best, who, it may be remarked, was returned by a block vote. But the statements of Senator Charleston far outvie those which I have quoted. He is unreservedly committed to the principle of minority representation. On the 5th March he said—

Surely my honorable friends do not think that democracy means simply the block vote of the majority, and that the thoughts of the people who are in a minority cannot be represented.

Yet to-night he is going to vote for block voting as against permissive plumping, which, at any rate, is a step in the direction of proportional representation. On that occasion he laid down these propositions:—

It is the elector's duty to cast his vote, first according to what he or she thinks to be the best proposition suggested for the good of the Commonwealth and its government; secondly, for what will best conserve the interests of the citizens in their individual capacity as distinguished from their communal relationship; and, thirdly, upon his or her preference respecting the candidates most suitable for legislative work.

He goes on to say—

It is our duty to enable the electors to record their votes according to their thoughts.

I will show directly how impossible he is going to make it for the electors to do that. He also says—

That is how the system has failed in the United States by leading up to such an organization that the individual is completely lost, and controlled by the "boss" of the political machine.

That shows how the system in the United States has led to the founding of such organizations, that the individual is absolutely controlled by the "boss" of the political machine.

Who is going to control the elections of Australia if we pass the block vote? As far as Victoria is concerned, it is the proprietor of the Age who is going to "boss" the elector. As far as New South Wales is concerned, the "boss" will be the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph. I say that the party leaders here to-night who are going to snatch a victory on this question are doing so in the interest of their party, and against the interests of their country. This thing is wrong. It is wrong to compel any person to vote for any candidate in whom he does not believe, or whose principles are in antagonism to his own.

Senator FRASER.—Let them put up persons in whom they do believe.

Senator PEARCE.—Let me put the Western Australian position at the last election. We had sixteen candidates, of whom fourteen were free-traders and two protectionists. I am not specifically mentioning the labour candidates, because there was one for each fiscal party. Imagine a protectionist voter going to the poll. What is his position when he wants to cast his vote for the principle he believes in and is compelled to cast four votes for the principle he does not believe in? You can compel that voter by the adoption of the block vote not to vote in the direction he believes in, but against the principle in which he believes.

Senator FRASER.—Let them put up four other men.

Senator PEARCE.—How can the individual elector put up four candidates?

Senator FRASER.—The party can.

Senator PEARCE.—We have to take actual facts into consideration, and the facts are that every elector is not a member of a party. The party organizations do not include the whole of the electorates.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The whole field of political thought cannot be marshalled under free-trade or protection.

Senator PEARCE.—Of course it cannot. Honorable senators are looking at this question as if only three organizations were involved—the free-trade, the protectionist, and the labour organizations. But who is to say that those are the only organizations to be considered? Should not attention also be paid to giving the voters the opportunity of casting their votes in any manner they like for the representatives of any other shade of opinion?

Senator FRASER.—The labour party say they will only consider the members of their own party.

Senator PEARCE.—If any other party had the same numbers as the labour party possess they would have the same right to representation in Parliament. Senator Pulsford spoke in a sneering manner with regard to the temperance party, although I do not believe that he intended to sneer at them. He included them amongst the number of new-fangled parties. I contend that it should be the wish of every democrat that the majority should rule, but not that the minority should never be heard. The true democrat is not a man who believes that because you have 1,001 persons in favour of a certain principle, and 1,000 who are against that principle, the views of the 1,000 should never be heard. Democrats believe that all shades of opinion should have a voice in the shaping of the laws of the country. We claim that it is the voice of the people which should be heard in Parliament, and if you have only the voice of the majority represented you do not have the voice of the whole people. We say that while the majority should rule minorities are entitled to representation here in proportion to their numbers.

Senator CHARLESTON.—Then why did not the honorable senator support effective voting?

Senator PEARCE.—I did.

Senator CHARLESTON.—But the honorable senator's party did not.

Senator PEARCE.—Let us look at the results of this system in the various States. We have the permissive system in vogue in South Australia, Western Australia, and Queensland, whilst in Tasmania we have a more scientific system.

Senator STYLES.—It has been abandoned; it was so scientific that the people could not understand it.

Senator PEARCE.—I take those States where we had the system of permissive plumping, and I place the results for those States in comparison with the representation of New South Wales and Victoria, and say that the representation of Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania, is a direct expression of the opinions and the various shades of political thought in those States to a greater degree than is the representation of Victoria and New South Wales in the Senate. Look at New South Wales.

Look at the reflex of political opinion in the State Legislative Assembly. There, up to the time of federation, there was a powerful free-trade party, and a protectionist party almost equal to it, whilst between them there was the labour party, which had such power as to be able to command twenty seats, or thereabouts, in a House of about 100 members. But look at how that public opinion was expressed by the block vote at the Senate election. What was the result? Had it not been for the powerful personal influence of Senator O'Connor the free-trade party would have secured the whole of the representation in the Senate. It was not because Senator O'Connor was a protectionist that he found his way to the Senate, but because of his personal power and popularity. Otherwise the result would have been that notwithstanding that the protectionist vote in New South Wales is a powerful one, and that you have there a third party which stands aloof from both fiscal parties, the protectionist and labour parties would have been entirely unrepresented in this Chamber. If we turn to Victoria we find the same sort of thing, except that the position of parties was reversed. Here we had a powerful protectionist majority, who were able to send practically the whole of their representatives into the Senate—because Senator Sargood only gained the support of a considerable number of protectionists on account of his personal character and his long connexion with Victorian politics.

Senator O'KEEFE.—And because he promised to support the protectionist Government.

Senator PEARCE.—There is the position—that although you have in Victoria a powerful, organized labour vote which runs into 20,000 or 30,000 electors in the metropolitan district alone, the labour party out of three candidates whom it put forward was only able to secure the election of one to the Senate, and the return of that one was largely accounted for by the fact that he was put upon the protectionist ticket. In South Australia, however, from what I know of that State the fiscal question is not so vital as in Victoria and New South Wales. Consequently there were returned to the Senate almost an equal number of free-traders and protectionists from that State. In South Australia the organization of the labour party is less effective than in New South Wales and Victoria, and it was only able to send one labour representative to the Senate.

Senator CHARLESTON.—There is not a better organized party anywhere than the labour party of South Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—I judge from the results of the State elections; and the very fact of Senator Charleston's presence here is a proof of their want of organization. In Western Australia, where there was a powerfully predominant free-trade vote, and, at the same time, a large labour vote, if we had run the election exclusively in the interest of the free-trade vote, labour would have been denied any representation whatever in the Senate. I ask any one who looks at this question from the point of view of justice, and who does not set up party considerations as being first and foremost, whether it would have been just that a party in Western Australia, which is able to send such a large representation into the House of Representatives, for which there is a single district system, and such a large representation into the State Assembly, should have been denied any representation in the Senate? If we turn to the case of Queensland we find exactly the same state of affairs. There is in Queensland a labour party which is so powerful as to form His Majesty's Opposition in the State Assembly. If that State was to be properly represented in the Senate it would send here a large labour representation. And it did so. But if there had been the block vote in Queensland the result would have been that the party represented by the Government in the State Assembly would have secured nearly the whole of the representation in the Senate. When we see these facts staring us in the face, we are forced to the conclusion that though the actual proof is that this system of permissive plumping allows parties to be represented according to their numerical strength in the country, on the other hand those who are going to vote for the block vote are going to support a system which will conserve the ends of their parties, and prove to the detriment of the party which sits in this corner, while it is opposed to the interests of justice and true representation. Then again I ask that seeing that the permissive system obtains in South Australia, Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania, what authority have those States to vote in such a way as to alter that system? There are four States in which parties to all intents and purposes were satisfied with proportional representation.

Senator STYLES. — What authority have New South Wales and Victorian senators for departing from the block vote?

Senator PEARCE. — I can well understand a Victorian saying, "I am right in voting for what the Bill proposes;" but I cannot understand the representatives of Western Australia, South Australia, Queensland, or Tasmania taking up the same stand, because they have absolutely no authority from the people of their States to make this alteration. The people of those States passed the present system into law, and there has been no outcry from the public against it. No dissatisfaction has been expressed with the results under it. No honorable senator has said that the results in those States were bad either for the States or for the Commonwealth. Have we any authority from the people to assert that they are dissatisfied with the representation of South Australia in the Senate; that they are dissatisfied with the representation of Western Australia; or that of Queensland? If the result of the system is that the States are properly represented here, how can they justify their action in supporting block voting? I contend that the facts prove that honorable senators are content to sink every idea of justice. They are content to throw aside the fact that their States have not expressed any dissatisfaction either with this system, or with its results, and, for the purpose of snatching a party victory at the cost of the labour party, they are prepared to vote for the block system. It is no secret that this is aimed at the labour party. Mr. Wilks, one of the free-trade members of another place, was honest enough to admit that the clause as it was sent down would be to the detriment of the labour party, but said he would vote for it because it would be to the advantage of his own party; and the jubilation depicted upon the faces of those who have been opposed to the labour party from the first tells me that the same principle is actuating those who oppose this amendment. Perhaps their plans will not work out as they think they will. Whereas, in the past, the labour party has been content to secure only a share in the representation of the Commonwealth, we shall be compelled to ask for the whole of that representation.

Senator EWING. — If the labour party can return three men they are entitled to do so.

Senator PEARCE. — The honorable and learned senator gives us something for which we do not thank him. If we can return the three, of course we are welcome to do so. In the past the labour party have recognised that their supporters are in the minority, but they are in such numbers as to warrant the demand for direct representation. We have always asked for minority representation, and nothing more. In connexion with the Senate elections all over Australia, we never asked for more than that which our power in the community warranted. In Western Australia, for example, we urged that two out of the six to be returned should be representatives of labour, and the same contention was put forward in the other States. The public said—"These men are asking only for a fair share of representation," and in consequence thousands voted for labour candidates, not merely upon labour principles, but because they considered we were asking only for a fair representation, which should be conceded to us.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — And so it will be with the block vote.

Senator PEARCE. — No. With the block vote we shall be compelled either to adopt the underhand motives, which Senator O'Connor pointed out were resorted to in New South Wales—to put one man forward, and ask the electors to vote for that man, and throw their other votes away on wasters—or else we shall have to send three candidates forward, and ask for the whole representation. Even from the party stand-point of those who oppose us, is it wise to place our party in that position? I frankly admit that I am optimistic enough to believe that the time is not far distant when, if we are forced into that position, and ask for the whole of the representation of Queensland and Western Australia, we shall get it.

Senator MILLEN. — The labour party would get it now, if they could.

Senator PEARCE. — As long as we have not to go to our organizations and say that we have to ask for the whole of the representation or obtain none, they may be—and I believe they will be—content with the present position. The evidence is that they are. Those who support the block vote system are compelling us to take a step which there is nothing to warrant us in believing we should otherwise have taken at any time, because we shall always be the advance guard in politics, and therefore always in the minority. It may be that the plans of those who are compelling us to take this step will not turn out as they think—namely, that none of us will get back. Three of us may be returned for each State, and they may be left behind. That is not wise, if we look at the matter from the point of view that we wish to make Parliament an expression of the people's will. If the amendment is not agreed to, we shall merely make it an expression of the will of the majority, although that majority may happen to be one of only half-a-dozen. We, who represent labour interests, are in the minority. We cannot shape the legislation of the Commonwealth, but we are able to voice the opinions of the workers on the legislation which comes before Parliament, and, to a certain extent, to influence that legislation. If the block vote system is passed we shall have this position of affairs: That if free-trade is the dominant factor in New South Wales, six free-traders from New South Wales will be returned to the Senate.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They will be balanced by six protectionists from Victoria.

Senator PEARCE. — Yes; and we shall have only two parties in the Senate. It will be simply a matter of free-trade versus protection, to the detriment of every other question, until those other questions can command an absolute majority. That is not wise. It would be far better to allow a minority, which is sufficiently large to justify its representation here, to be heard. It is not always wise to sit on the safety valve, and that is what we are asked to do.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia). —I am very much astonished at the conclusion arrived at by Senator Pearce that this proposal is aimed at the labour party. So far as I am concerned, it is not, because ever since I have been in Parliament I have voted against plumping, and it was only by the merest chance that that system was not abolished long ago in South Australia. To imagine for a moment that any party which is in a majority will not do all they possibly can to return all the representatives to be elected is simply absurd. The honorable senator seems to think that the ultimate result of passing a law to prevent plumping will be that the labour party will become dominant in the Commonwealth. Directly they are in the majority they will become the dominant power, and no one will ever blame them. Plumping does not mean what Senator O'Connor has suggested. It does not necessarily mean that the minority occasionally secure representation, but it very often means that the majority does not obtain its fair representation. It does not mean that the man who honestly thinks that there is only one out of the three or six candidates fit to be elected will be led astray. It is not the honest elector who is led astray by the plumping system. It is because the agents of certain parties and candidates go round to the electors and point out how necessary it is for them to plump for certain individuals that the system is largely practised. It destroys, to a very considerable extent, the fair representation of the people. I shall give the committee one illustration of the way it can be worked. If plumping were for the protection of the man who honestly believes that he should vote for only one out of three candidates who happen to be put forward, and that by abstaining from voting he can prevent the other two from being returned—which he can not—I could understand it. Where there are five or six candidates, surely every elector should exercise his judgment and say—"There is one which I place first; there are two others which, I think, would be better than the rest." He is always able to choose the best men that he can obtain to represent him. We must remember that what we place in the hands of the electors is a right and a privilege. An elector knows that there are a certain number of candidates to be returned, and it is his duty to the State to select the three best men, so that the State may be represented fairly and honestly instead of by a mere minority. We should not have agents for candidates and special organizations exercising an unfair influence over electors. The first time that I was defeated in a contest for a seat in the South Australian Legislature, in which plumping was allowed, was when I was one of three candidates who stood for a three-cornered constituency returning two members. I was the favorite candidate. All through the district it was said—"Playford is sure to get in." The only question was who of the other two would be returned. One of the candidates was Mr. Bunday, now Mr. Justice Bunday, and the other was a very old friend of mine, a German. The result was, that because I was the favorite candidate, I was the defeated one. Bunday's people plumped for him. The Germans plumped for their candidate. My supporters felt so satisfied that I would be returned that they did not plump for me, but honestly divided their votes, and Mr. Playford quietly fell between the two. I was beaten by only a few votes; the electors dropped me and were very sorry for it. They were led away by the false representations of electioneering agents who were working for their special candidates, with the result that the favorite—who if running against either of the others would have been easily elected—lost. That was a very sad affair. I will show the committee the falsehoods associated at times with elections when plumping is allowed. It is known only to those who have been behind the scenes. The minority say to the majority—"You give one vote to our man, and we will give one to yours." The other side do so, and to their utter astonishment it is found in the end that the people who suggested splitting the votes plumped for their own candidate. Plumping absolutely demoralizes the people just as much as does the totalizator or gambling generally. I will give the committee my experience at the first election for which I stood. That was in 1868, and I was then a young man. An old friend of mine having retired from the representation of a certain district in which I resided, and in which I was pretty well known, having been mixed up with local politics for some time, I thought I would have a flutter. It was one of those wretched three-cornered electorates returning two candidates. Three of us stood. One of the candidates was a gentleman very well known in South Australia, another was my old German friend, and the third was your humble servant. We put our heads together, and determined that we would do all that we could to prevent plumping. The election took place, and to the utter astonishment of my German friend and myself, the other candidate was at the head of the poll, with an immense majority of plumpers. I spoke to him about the matter, and he swore by all that was holy that he never instigated the plumping movement in the slightest degree. I will tell the committee what occurred. At a place called Callington, there was a big mining population, and a committee was formed to secure the return of the gentleman referred to and myself.

They did not care about the German, because they were nearly all Cornishmen. I should have mentioned, by the way, that I was returned, being second on the poll; and after the election the secretary to the committee was instructed to write a letter to that gentleman and myself, congratulating us upon our return. There were a few additional words in his letter which did not appear in mine, and, unfortunately for the secretary, he put the letter into an envelope addressed to me, and the letter intended for me into an envelope addressed to him. What did I read on opening the letter? Something to this effect:—

Dear Sir,—We beg to congratulate you upon your return at the head of the poll. We can assure you that we did everything that we possibly could to secure your return, and trust you are satisfied at the result. We only got your wire asking for plumpers at 11 o'clock in the morning, and therefore we did not get as many as we might otherwise have done.

Of course I opened the letter because it was addressed to me, and that is what I read before I saw that it was intended for the other candidate. I sent it to him with a note that he had got my letter and that I had received his, and I said to him—"You infernal scoundrel, I knew you went in for plumping." Do not honorable senators think that we ought to save the people from such temptations? I have given the committee only two instances for the absolute accuracy of which I can vouch, but I have heard from others of the scandalous conduct of agents and associations who know their supporters are in a minority, and who seek to obtain the split votes of the larger section of the community by false representations. Anything we can do to put a stop to such a system should willingly be done. Having opposed from the first the system of plumping because of its evil effects, it cannot be said that I am opposing it now in order to aim a blow at the labour party. In South Australia, where the labour party put up two candidates for the Senate, it was fully recognised that they deserved to have one, at all events, out of the two, returned, and they obtained their fair proportion of split votes. That they plumped pretty freely for their own candidates there can be no doubt; but I never heard any complaint that they deceived the people, and they obtained a large number of votes from non-members of the labour party. We have always considered in South Australia that the labour party deserve a certain degree of representation, as they are a very important section of the community, and they will find that, without having resort to the practice of voting for wasters, they will be dealt with fairly by the people throughout the Commonwealth. If we can do anything to stop the lying which goes on in connexion with elections, and to prevent the people from being led into false statements because of the plumping system, we shall do a good work on the score of morality.

Progress reported.

Senate adjourned at 10.2 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 3 September, 1902.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

COMMONWEALTH PRINTING.

Sir JOHN QUICK presented the report of the Printing Committee upon certain allegations regarding the cost of Commonwealth printing.

Report read by the CLERK (vide page 15654).

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Royal Australian Artillery: Alteration of Regulations respecting Appointments.

Customs Act: Drawback Regulations (Manufacture of Sugar).

Excise Act Excise Tariff: New Sugar Regulations.

Post and Telegraph Act: New and Amended Regulations, dated 21st August, 1902.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Polling at First Federal Elections: Return.

COMMONWEALTH ACTS.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I desire to know whether in view of the difficulty of obtaining copies of the Commonwealth Acts, the Acting Prime Minister will appoint some place in each of the States where they can be purchased by the people?

Mr. DEAKIN.—For some time past copies of the Commonwealth Acts have been on sale at every Government printing-office in the States.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is not known.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It may not be generally known, although it has been advertised. I may mention that a second set of Commonwealth Acts has already been sent to the various States.

PETITION BY KANAKAS.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I asked the Acting Prime Minister a few days ago a question with reference to a petition to the Throne from certain kanakas in Queensland. The Minister had no information at that time, and I now desire to know whether he has made any inquiries.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I found on inquiry that I had received no copy of the petition referred to. I have, however, asked the officers of the department to endeavour to obtain one.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL.

Bill returned from the Senate, with a Message again requesting certain amendments, and modifying other requests (vide page 15539).

Mr. MAUGER.—I would ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, whether this message complies with the provisions of the Constitution and our own standing orders? It seems to me that former requests are being repeated, instead of new requests being made.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have realized the importance of the matter which is now before the House, and have conceived it possible that an appeal might be made to me for a ruling upon the point mentioned by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. Having considered the matter carefully, I have devoted special attention to the questions—(a) Whether the Message just read is one we should receive; and (b) Under what authority we may deal with the message. Our practice in matters relating to money Bills is controlled by sections 53, 54, 55, and 56 of the Constitution, and by our standing orders which may not conflict with the Constitution. Under section 50 of the Constitution—"Each House of the Parliament may make rules and orders with respect to"—(1) The mode in which its powers, privileges and immunities may be exercised and upheld; (2) The order and conduct of its business and proceedings, either separately or jointly with the other House." No rules or orders have been made by this House either alone or jointly with the other branch of the Legislature with respect to the order and conduct of its business and proceedings in relation to Money Bills under discussion between the two Houses. Under certain provisions of the Constitution, e.g., the first three sub-sections of section 53, the practice laid down is so clear that I should have, even in the absence of standing orders, no doubt as to how I should rule in any matter arising thereunder. Under sub-section (4) of the same section, however, I find that the words, "the Senate may at any stage, &c." are open to at least two interpretations, and that, therefore, it is necessary that the two Houses should jointly, by majorities, make rules or orders laying down the practice to be followed in all cases arising under the provisions of the Constitution herein. As a majority of the House would have the power to make rules or orders, it appears to me to be my duty to give no ruling which would fetter a majority of the House on this occasion in determining for itself whether it will consider the Message, or what it will do in the matters with which it deals. I, therefore, rule that the question of the receiving and consideration of the Message is one to be determined by the vote of the House. As to the further point, I remind honorable members of Standing Order No. 378, under which it is competent for the House, if it so pleases, to take a Message into consideration either at once or at a future time, and I rule that the order gives all the necessary power to consider the Message and to determine all the issues raised in it as a majority may desire.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—Mr. Speaker, the ruling which you have given obviously casts upon this House the duty of determining whether the Message of the Senate should be received. As you have pointed out, the position at present is that we are not only without permanent standing orders of our own, but that we are entirely without joint standing orders which could govern the procedure by which measures or messages were interchanged between the two Houses. Under these circumstances, if I may say so, it appears to me that your ruling should be upheld so far as you have declined to prevent this House from itself deciding as to the action it should take in this or any other analogous case. The burden of the responsibility cast upon the Government under these circumstances appears to me to call for a motion on their part expressive of their sense of the duty of the House in relation to this particular Message. I therefore desire to ask honorable members to take into consideration the circumstances under which their decision is invited, and ask them also, in view of this unprecedented and never-to-be-repeated set of circumstances, to take another view than that which they might ordinarily feel called upon to accept with regard to this particular proposal. We have before us a Message relating to a measure that, according to the direction of the Constitution, should be passed within two years, and already more than 20 months out of the 24 have elapsed. This, of course, although a mandate from the people by whom the Constitution was virtually enacted, is one that it might, under certain circumstances, be impossible to comply with, but, at all events, it is one which it is our clear duty to see fulfilled if the conditions permit. Moreover, I am certain that no honorable members of this House would view without apprehension an unnecessary prolongation of the business uncertainty which prevails in all parts of the Commonwealth, and in all ranks of life. It is not simply the merchant and trader, but the producer and consumer who are affected. The country and town, the man in the field, and the man in the factory are alike interested in the earliest possible settlement of the long-debated schedule of duties included in the Bill to which this Message relates. Until that uncertainty is removed, the development of many enterprises must continue to be hampered, employment must be restricted, and financial operations checked, and this at a time when, if possible, we should desire the purse-strings of investors to be generally unloosed. The best present encouragement that honorable members on both sides of this House can give to the commerce and production of the country will be by promoting the speedy passing of the Customs Tariff Bill. This has practically ceased to be a fiscal issue. The Tariff was never one upon which an appeal could be made to protectionists or free-traders, considered apart. It was, even as introduced to this House, no scientific measure of Australian protection—it could not be so—it fell far short of the opinions and convictions of protectionists like myself who have never been reckoned among the extreme advocates of that doctrine. It could not be made a federal Tariff in the strict sense of the term, because of the restrictions imposed upon us at every turn by the bookkeeping and other financial sections of the Constitution. It could be at best what it was, not even a federal Tariff, but a confederate Tariff—a Tariff which sought to reconcile and conserve the interests of six separate States, and did so by the sacrifice in a considerable measure of interests in each State, and, at the same time, by forfeiting the character it might otherwise have acquired of a consistent protectionist measure. It was a Tariff about which party enthusiasm was always impossible, but it was a thorough and honest attempt to so shape the imposition of customs duties upon imports and the excise duties in this country as to maintain existing industries, and to conserve the financial interests of the States. However far it may have fallen short, these were its original aims, and these it endeavoured to attain. It has been conspicuously shorn of some of those features during its passage through this Chamber, and is not now a Tariff in which the separate interests of the States are distinctly considered. In fact, framed as it was to meet extraordinary circumstances—a condition of affairs that was passing away—the treasuries of the States had to be studied rather than the whole people whose interests can not be absolutely blended until a future date. Shaped under all these difficulties, and again remoulded in its passage through this House, it has become a Tariff, which, I venture to say, although pressed upon the attention of honorable members of this House and of the country, cannot be so pressed by any particular party in it, but is so pressed because of the overwhelming necessity of putting an end to a long period of uncertainty. We must now give the country the system of customs and excise duties under which our industries are in future to be carried on. I, therefore, appeal to honorable members, without distinction of party and in the interests of the people of the whole of the Commonwealth, to exhibit, in the critical position we have now reached, that patience which is absolutely called for, if we are to secure the passage of this measure within any reasonable period. I have made these remarks, which are a mere repetition of the opinion entertained by every honorable member, simply because I now wish to qualify them by saying that a question may arise which is even more important. It is quite possible that the contingencies of the present situation may be allowed to arouse issues of profound and far-reaching significance—issues which, although in the first instance they affect only the relations between one body of representatives of the people and another body of representatives, may, in their direct and indirect influences together prove of paramount importance in some far distant future. On some nearer occasion other issues may arise, to be determined in part, perhaps, by the precedent which we now lay down. No matter how we may seek to avoid strife, no matter how anxious we may be to pass by the “sleeping lions” of the Constitution, it is not possible to ignore the fact that even in connexion with this message they may be very easily awakened. You, sir, in your ruling in a general manner have called attention to the danger. You have pointed to the special conditions which now obtain, and so far as I followed your ruling have found as much reason—if not more—for the attitude you have taken under the particular circumstances in which this message reaches you, as in the nature of the message itself. You were careful to point out that we are at present without those joint standing orders which should be arrived at by common agreement, and should determine the manner in which another place and ourselves should exchange proposals, or impart our views to each other. Evidently it is because we find ourselves without the guidance which those standing orders would afford, that the question is thrown upon the deliberation of this Chamber. Members are now faced with the danger of the possible intrusion into a commercial and industrial issue of constitutional questions, affecting the rights of the two Chambers, and through them the whole body of the electors—questions whose solution will assist to give form and colour to our institutions. They are the natural growth of our Constitution, in which their germs are found, often in extremely general language. That generality was necessary in any Constitution. An instrument of government could not be drawn with that technical particularity which would enable it in advance to provide for every possible emergency. It necessarily sketches outlines rather than fills in details, and presents to us a frame into which the people require to breathe the breath of life. It is for the two Houses of Parliament representing them to give gradually to their conception the contour and character which will enable each to attain the full measure of its individuality. That is a task in which we are called upon to take part to-day. Very serious and very grave are the issues attendant upon it. Yet I think that honorable members, without distinction, would deplore any occasion which compelled us to introduce into the arena of controversy in which we have been engaged, and the fruits of which we see in the Customs Tariff Bill, so far as it has been mutually agreed to, a new set of motives entirely different in origin and in aim, which would, if permitted their free play in this connexion, divert, perhaps, the whole course of what would otherwise be the natural evolution of the measure we have had so long under consideration. It is under these circumstances that the Government submit to the House that, if by any action of ours it is possible to separate these two sets of interests one from the other, to prevent constitutional principles from being considered in the light of fiscal attachments, and decisions upon the practical proposals of the Tariff—from being diverted by constitutional considerations out of the natural path of their orderly sequence, we should not hesitate to take it. Obviously, it is to the advantage both of those who desire to see a settlement arrived at upon this measure of infinite detail, which we have debated for nearly twelve months, and of those who realize the importance of the seed now to be sown in the shape of constitutional precedent, to keep the two matters as far as possible separate from each other, and to deal with each without allowing it to receive its colour and direction from the other.

Mr. McCAY.—That is impossible.

Mr. DEAKIN. — One honorable and learned member tells me, by interjection, that it is impossible. The Government believe it to be possible, and the proposal which I have to submit is one which, it appears to me, will amply safeguard the constitutional rights of this Chamber by removing them altogether from the area of controversy, concentrating our attention upon the question upon which we have been so long engaged, and isolating it from every other disturbing influence. The motion which I have the honour to submit, is as follows :—

That, having regard to the fact that the public welfare demands the early enactment of a Federal Tariff, and, pending the adoption of joint standing orders, this House refrains from the determination of its constitutional rights or obligations in respect to this message, and resolves to receive and consider it forthwith.

At this time the House has a warrant for declining to determine its constitutional rights and privileges which no subsequent House can ever possess. You, sir, have already called attention to an ambiguity which occurs in the fourth paragraph of section 53 of the Constitution, and have pointed out that the precise interpretation of that section should, if possible, be arrived at by both Chambers, and embodied in their joint standing orders. If that course were followed a possible danger to all future measures of this character might be removed, the land marks would be fixed, the territory of each House would be determined, and we should at once know of any encroachment or invasion of our rights. In this Parliament we have an excellent warrant for declining at the present moment even to enter upon the determination of our constitutional rights and obligations so long as we are satisfied with making it clear that we are dealing to-day under circumstances of peculiar urgency with a special measure—the Customs Tariff Bill—that we propose to deal with it upon its merits, in such a fashion as not to prejudice our own rights, and not to assail the rights of the other branch of the Legislature. We ask that the two issues, instead of being confused, shall be kept separate—the Tariff for immediate treatment, whilst the consideration of the question of constitutional procedure, viewed in the light of section 53 and the four following sub-sections, should be relegated to a time when that question alone need occupy our attention, so that it may be determined absolutely upon its merits. The Tariff can now be dealt with upon its merits.

Mr. WATSON.—We shall never get an opportunity which is free from Tariff disputes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—So soon as we have adopted permanent standing orders we shall have an opportunity of approaching the other Chamber as to joint standing orders.

Mr. McCAY.—But when the trouble arises we shall have to interpret them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—When we have obtained joint standing orders, of course we shall have to interpret them. At the same time, I believe they can be so drafted as to remove the ambiguities which at present attach to section 53 of the Constitution and to make it perfectly clear to both Chambers exactly what their rights are. Of course those orders will be subject to the Constitution. All that the standing orders can do will be to fill in the details which the Constitution has omitted, to follow its general lines, and, without any breach of its provisions, to supply the winding line which will mark the delimitation of our respective boundaries.

Mr. CROUCH.—Will this form part of the Message to the Senate?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not necessarily. It is, however, necessary to debate it before we enter upon a consideration of that Message.

Mr. CROUCH.—I think that it will be requisite to include this motion in the Message.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I beg to differ from the honorable and learned member. But what form the Message should take, if any, apart from its ordinary formal contents, is a question for after consideration. The issue now before us is whether this Message should be taken into consideration at all. The Government submit that it ought to be. If it be taken into consideration, the course proposed can be followed without any trespass upon the rights and privileges of the other branch of the Legislature, and without any loss or peril to our own.

Mr. WILKS.—The other Chamber has us in the toils.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It has us in the toils no more than one Chamber will always have the other under its control so far as the other presses upon it a measure which in its eyes is of paramount importance.

Mr. GLYNN.—It was merely an assertion of our power to receive it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is merely an assertion of our power to receive it, and of our power to put aside for a time the complex issues which are necessarily involved if we commence to consider the constitutional question before we have joint standing orders or permanent standing orders of our own, and at a moment when it will be more difficult than perhaps under almost any other circumstances for this House to give its undivided attention to the particular propositions which are suddenly submitted to it. How is it possible when our minds are full of the almost infinite details of this Tariff, or still occupied with the conclusions to which they in their present shape have led, for us to consider any Tariff issues apart from our constitutional leanings, or our constitutional leanings apart from the Tariff issues? This is not like an ordinary session of the Federal Parliament. This being the first session, it is under the circumstances no reproach to us that we find ourselves in a condition of unpreparedness to deal with this new difficulty.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The first step is the most important.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The first step may be the most important, but the first step is not proposed to be taken along the constitutional road; that is to be left clear for future action.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Does the honorable gentleman think that we can retrace our steps if we take an unconstitutional step now?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not think that the House, by acting as we now propose, will place or should place any fetters on its future action. The course open to us to-day is to reject this message if we entirely disapprove of it. That course will be open to us at every future occasion, no matter under what circumstances messages may be sent down.

Mr. ISAACS.—That could be said of any amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That could be said of any amendment. Nothing can take that power from us. That is, so to speak, the power behind the Throne which enables us, in this instance, to deal with the Tariff without forfeiting any jot or tittle of our constitutional prerogative. We shall be free in any case to reverse our action at another time, but, as a matter of fact, we are taking precautions in order that it may not be necessary to retrace our steps, but that at any future time, under any circumstances, this exact situation cannot be repeated. There are many other grounds than those which I have urged, on which this proposal might reasonably be submitted. What we have to recollect, and what I think we shall not forget, is that in dealing with the Senate under the Commonwealth we are by no means dealing with an ordinary Upper House of the Australian States. We must remember that we are dealing with men, who, like ourselves, are directly chosen by the people.

Mr. WATSON.—By a section of the people.

Mr. DEAKIN.—By the whole people, although they vote for the Senate in different groupings, which render it possible that at times a majority may represent a minority of electors. I do not know, however, that this argument will be urged in the present instance. One other exceptional condition has been pointed out to me to-day by the honorable member for Darling Downs, namely, that this Senate was contemporaneous with ourselves—that it sprang from the people as a whole at the same time as this Chamber, when the minds of the electors were presumably agitated by the same issues and governed by the same principles.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a dangerous admission from the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not in the least. An admission of fact cannot add to or detract from the argument. The Senate to-day is in the same position, and no better, than the Senate will always be in after a double dissolution, at which particular questions have been submitted and the whole community has simultaneously returned members to the two Chambers. An ordinary Senate may not occupy so strong a position when only half its members have been recently elected and the other half have not seen their constituencies for five or six years. There is a difference, and a notable difference, between a Senate created at the same time with ourselves and a Senate, as it may be in the future, not so created, when dealing with a particular issue before it. So it seems to me that although this condition may be repeated after a double dissolution, the present position can never be repeated so far as Australia is concerned, for the very simple reason that there can never be again a first session, and there never can be again, I hope, a time when we shall find ourselves without either standing orders or joint standing orders.

Mr. MAHON.—And the honorable gentleman hopes there will never again be a session of eighteen months.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is to be hoped there will never again be a session of eighteen months, or a Tariff which requires consideration for twelve months. We have now laid, it is hoped, a foundation of some kind upon which in future Parliaments may be able to build without that utter exhaustion on the part of those concerned which has necessarily attended the giants' work required to be undertaken during the last eighteen months.

Mr. McCAY. — And now the proposal is to put a keg of dynamite in the basement.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are proposing to put it at such a great distance that if it ever explodes it will affect neither party to the transaction. Of course the process in which we are now engaged is not to be continued ad infinitum. We must admit that each interchange of messages in relation to this measure has marked a considerable step in advance. I had hoped, and am disappointed at the frustration of the hope, that after another Chamber had received the concessions already made to its requests by this House, they have not been satisfied that under the circumstances its dignity and authority had been sufficiently manifested and acknowledged, and that no further steps were necessary. It is not my task or desire to review the proceedings of another place, more especially as by a curious anticipation I criticised very much this situation in the discussion in the Adelaide Convention on the very clause which is now section 53. Before the event other members and myself indicated what ought to be the influential and important part which the Senate, under the Constitution, ought to play in moulding the destinies of Australia. It is clear, however, that if we reduce the number of matters to which public attention is called, and now proceed to give the proposals in this message a full consideration on their merits, quite apart from any constitutional issues, we shall be able to make at once a final settlement of this vexed question. That will prove to the country the earnestness of the members of this Chamber to avoid any unnecessary cause of dispute, and show the profoundest anxiety on their part to pay due respect to the wishes of the important body which represents the people of the whole of the States of Australia. By a further sacrifice of our opinions, we can present so reasonable a Tariff that the public opinion of Australia will support us, and indicate to the Senate the wisdom of accepting it with an acknowledgment of the public spirit that has prompted us. My honorable colleague, if this motion be assented to, will indicate the particular details of the Government proposal. I shall only say in advance that they represent an honest attempt to reach the end of the long road we have been travelling—a substantial step towards final agreement. They are based on a careful consideration of the circumstances of each industry, and of the manner in which each has been dealt with in this Chamber. We shall then be afforded a foothold without which any position we might attempt to occupy would indeed be feeble—we shall have a hold upon the judgment of the body of thoughtful electors outside, who from one end of the continent to the other are watching the issue of this measure with the utmost anxiety. When those electors see that their representatives in this Chamber are prepared, in order to put an end to the distraction which has so long existed in industrial circles, to make one more series of further concessions, they will realize that we here have done all they could desire, and that it rests with the representatives in another Chamber to meet us in the same spirit, and put an end to the long debates which have left us jaded at the end of fourteen months of sitting. In point of fact what we offer, if the House sees its way to accept it, is, we believe, the final solution of this Tariff problem.

Mr. GLYNN.—Does the Acting Prime Minister anticipate any opposition to the motion before the House?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do. From the interjections, and from my knowledge of the past, and, I believe, present opinions of honorable members of this House, I have reason to believe that members will be found —

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Afraid to listen to the request.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, not afraid to listen to the request; but honorable members are alarmed lest we commit ourselves to a similar course of procedure under all circumstances in the future, and thus tie our hands, which at present are free. I myself have entertained opinions very largely of the same nature as long as I have been in political life, and am not aware that I am in any respect departing from them. It appears to me that when we undertook the combination of the federal form of government, with responsible government we set before Australia, a great problem, involving many minor problems, which have never yet been solved in any other country as we shall require to solve them. We have in this case, as in many others, to undertake the pioneering work of cutting roads for ourselves through untravelled country; we have to make our own precedents, and develop our own principles. That is the burden cast on us by the Constitution, and I for one realize the immense importance which would attach to mistaken steps in any direction. Therefore I neither fear nor deprecate criticism from any quarter, which may be designed to show that we are following an erroneous course. But for my own part, after consideration, more anxious, perhaps, than that I have given to any other problem—at all events since I have been clothed with official responsibility—and after an anxiety for the last few weeks which I would most willingly have escaped—after recalling principles to which I have been pledged, the career I have followed, and the party I have been associated with, I have come to the clear and unmistakable conclusion that our duty in this instance is to act as now proposed upon a broad view of the situation. Possibilities of danger may be adduced, but there are greater dangers before us in the ship-wreck of this all-important measure. After all, there appears to be much alarm. The course which I have asked the House to follow is in harmony with the basic principles of representative and responsible government, as we have known them hitherto, adapted to the conditions of the Federation which we ourselves have brought about, and for which we must take full responsibility. Having accepted the federal form of Government, it is not for us to endeavour, without a mandate from the electors, to secure unification by negotiations between the two Chambers. If it is ever sought to reduce the Senate to the position occupied by the Upper Houses of the Parliaments of the States, it will be necessary for the people to signify that they are in favour of such a change in the Constitution. In the meantime, we have to deal with a second Chamber, such as has hitherto been unknown in Australia. We have before us a crisis as great as has ever confronted the Parliament of any State, seeing that our decision on the Tariff affects the whole Commonwealth. Under these circumstances, I commend the motion to the consideration of honorable members, believing that by adopting it we can gain peace with honour, and that if we refuse it the future alone can show what is in store for us.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—Honorable members will readily understand that it is with great diffidence that I address them upon a question of constitutional importance which is probably greater than any other question with which we could be called upon to deal. The members of the Opposition, for whom I am now speaking, have not brought about the present crisis, because if the fair proposals of the Senate had been agreed to it would not have arisen at all. But, as the question has been raised, there must be, I fear, some discussion in regard to the relative positions of the two Chambers. No doubt all honorable members of this House are anxious to maintain its rights and dignity. The question with which we are now dealing will be a very difficult question for many years to come. Section 53 of the Constitution, to which reference has been made, was the result of a compromise. An attempt was made to refine into language a position which no one could really understand, and, like all compromises, it has created a crop of difficulties which might have been avoided by manfully facing the situation. To my mind there is no doubt that the Constitution gives this Chamber powers in relation to financial measures superior to those possessed by the Senate. It provides, in the first place, that the Senate may not amend proposed laws imposing taxation. That is a very clear statement; but a little further on it is provided that the Senate may make suggestions — an altogether weaker position. Then come the words—

Except, as provided in this section, the Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws.

If in regard to every other matter the Senate is to have equal power with the House of Representatives, the inference is that it does not possess equal power in regard to Money Bills. The Senate is, in the first place, the States House, representing in its corporate unity the public opinion of the States qua States. But, besides being the States House, it is a second Chamber under a bicameral system of government, and it is more as a second Chamber that it has taken up the position which we are now engaged in discussing. But if it is clearly embedded in the Constitution that in financial matters this House shall exercise larger powers than those possessed by the Senate, we need not be afraid to listen to their representations, no matter how often made, when by doing so we can prevent conflict between the two Chambers. Let us get away from legal quibbles if we can, and deal with the matter on business lines, and from the point of view of common sense. In regard to most of the financial measures which the Senate might criticise there would probably be only one or two specific points of difference. But in the consideration of a Tariff like that which has been passed by this House, there are hundreds of points of possible disagreement, affecting not merely matters of detail, but the whole policy of the Government. Therefore, in this matter we cannot take up the “stand and deliver” attitude which some honorable members would advocate. If we refuse to receive the Senate’s Message, we shall precipitate the crisis which we desire to avoid. The Senate would tell us that they represent the same people that we represent, being elected upon the same franchise, and that if we will not agree to some business-like arrangement for dealing with this matter, we must take the responsibility of forcing the difference to the bitter end.

Mr. ISAACS.—Suppose the Constitution justifies us?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I do not think that it does. In the first place, no Constitution would deny to two Chambers like ours the right to make sensible arrangements for discussing and arriving at a conclusion in regard to the various matters which have to come before them. There are at present in existence no standing orders which meet the case, but Mr. Speaker in his ruling practically admitted that we could create standing orders which would provide for the course of procedure which it is now proposed that we should adopt. Is not the attitude that some honorable members would like to see assumed in regard to this matter an attitude suggestive rather of captious weakness than of completely-felt power? The position of this House under the Constitution is so strong that we need not cavil at any arrangement which will prevent a dead-lock between the two Chambers.

Mr. RONALD.—The Constitution makes provision for dead-locks.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Exactly; but reference to the debates of the Convention will show that such a thing as an absolute dead-lock was looked upon as impossible. Many of the members of the Convention argued that there should be no mechanical arrangement for the prevention of dead-locks. They said, "Will not the members of the Commonwealth Parliament be people like ourselves? Will they not be persons possessing common sense, patriotism, and practical business ability, such as has characterized the members of the Parliaments of all British communities?" And although, in deference to the wishes of the majority, a mechanical arrangement for dealing with dead-locks was agreed to, it was felt that to carry any difference between the Chambers to the bitter end would be alien to the characteristics of our people. I rather deprecate the introduction of the Tariff into this discussion. It must be remembered that this is the first Parliament of the Commonwealth, and that there has been a great difference of opinion as to whether the actions of the Government in regard to the Tariff have been consistent with their hustings pledges. The Senate, as a second Chamber, is the guardian of the people against any renegade action on the part of the Government.

Mr. WATSON.—Not so much as we are.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member for Wentworth find that provision in the Constitution?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It is not in the Constitution, but it must be remembered that a Chamber elected upon a popular suffrage cannot be dealt with in the same way as an ordinary Legislative Council. I think that the Government have, upon the whole, taken the right course, though there is an element of weakness in what they propose—an evidence of desire to avoid the main issue. I do not fear that issue, and I think it would have been better if the Government had taken a common-sense view of the situation, and had said—"We are dealing now with financial legislation of a special kind, legislation which it took this Chamber seven or eight months to consider, and upon which the Senate has spent a very long time, and, therefore, we propose to recognise the right of the Senate to make requests, and will again consider every item which they have re-submitted to us. The Government to a certain extent compromised the House by agreeing to consider the requests made by the other Chamber."

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are compelled to do so by section 53 of the Constitution.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—No doubt, but the Government did not take up the position urged upon them by some honorable members of absolutely refusing to consider the requests of the Senate.

Mr. CROUCH.—Who argued that that course should be taken?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—One section of honorable members urged, not that the requests should not be considered formally, but that the Government should not agree to any alterations whatever beyond mere necessary details. These honorable members thought that the constitutional stand should be made then, and the press has time after time denied the right of the Senate to deal with the Tariff in detail. We, however, have recognised their right to do so. Considering that we are within such a short view of a final result, it would be suicidal on our part, on a mere technical quibble, to refuse to deal with the requests of the Senate in a business-like manner. I have made these remarks with a certain amount of diffidence, and I have purposely avoided any refined arguments with regard to the constitutional question. That may be a matter for decision in the future, if the House is called upon to assert its position.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member says that we have no position to assert—that the Government have compromised us.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I do not quite follow the honorable and learned member. I do not decline at this moment to face the whole issue of any future trouble between the two Houses. I think that the spirit which has dominated this House and the Senate up to the present has been everything that the best-wishers of the Commonwealth could desire. We have had one or two slight hitches, which have disappeared under mutual courtesy and consideration, and during our sittings, extending over fourteen or fifteen months, the relations between the two Houses have been of the most cordial and amicable character. Do not let us disturb this happy condition of affairs; do not let us raise an unnecessary bogey. We are dealing with a question of a practical character, affecting the whole of the industrial interests of Australia. Honorable members on this side of the House have not brought about the present crisis. It has arisen because honorable members opposite—very properly, no doubt, from their point of view—refused to consent to what we considered to be very reasonable requests on the part of the Senate. Let us again take this message into consideration, and, further, let us exhaust every possible effort that we can——

Mr. WATSON.—During the next few years.

Mr. McCAY.—To what other efforts does the honorable member refer? Supposing that we agree to consider the requests, and the Senate still differs from us, are we to be called upon to accede to the requests when they are again preferred?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I am not going to imagine such a contingency. Let us exhaust every reasonable effort—if honorable members prefer it, I would limit the period to within the next few days—to arrive at a reasonable conclusion. If we were dealing with this matter in a mere party spirit, we might desire to bring about a political crisis, but we have no wish of that kind. We do not approve of the Tariff—it is not our Tariff—and we shall probably not take any part in the discussion that may follow if the motion is carried. The matter lies now between honorable members opposite and the Senate. If the Government has any further compromise to make, we shall assist them in the event of the vote being challenged, and we desire to do everything we possibly can to avoid the continuance of the present period of unrest throughout Australia. We can say no more. That is a fair and reasonable attitude to assume, and I trust that honorable members generally will take that view of the position.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—It is a matter for regret that at this early period of our Commonwealth history we should be called upon to face a position that presents many difficulties from whichever stand-point we view it. We did not need the eloquent and powerful speech of the honorable the Acting Prime Minister to convince us of that fact. I fully recognise the difficulties with which the Acting Prime Minister has had to contend in dealing with this unprecedented question—unprecedented as far as the Federal Constitution is concerned—and I am sure that honorable members will be unanimous in thoroughly appreciating the way in which he has grappled with them. We all feel confident that he has endeavoured to do what he thinks is the honest best for Australia. I am quite in harmony with the Minister in many of the observations he has made. I thoroughly indorse all that he has said with regard to the importance of having the Tariff issue settled at as early a date as possible. We all recognise the existence of the feeling of unrest and uncertainty to which he has referred, and know that that feeling is detrimental to trade, that it affects all branches of commerce, and that its influence is not confined to those merchants, whether manufacturers or importers, who are engaged in extensive businesses, but that it reaches down to the humblest worker who moulds the commodities they have to sell. Whilst acknowledging the importance of this question, however, I cannot, in the first place, persuade myself that the Minister is right in regarding this as an unprecedented circumstance, or one that is not likely to occur again. It is certain to occur whenever we have a Tariff question before us. The difficulty arising from unrest in connexion with the Tariff settlement is one that we have been called upon to face, as have other countries, and one with which we shall be required to cope again. There are, in some respects, peculiar circumstances attendant upon this epoch, such as the State Tariffs, which are still in operation. We have gone on with these Tariffs for a considerable time, and possess means for temporarily settling the Tariff question in this Parliament, without embarking upon a precedent which is possibly fraught with serious consequences to the future of Australia. The motion as framed seeks to guard, as much as such a motion could guard, against its being treated as a precedent. But there is something which speaks stronger than words, and that is action. We cannot, as it seems to me, take a step which has the undoubted and unqualified effect of recognising what I believe to be a serious breach of the Constitution, without establishing a precedent. I am not taking any mere technical point, and I am not raising what may be fairly called a quibble, unless the questions upon which the struggles of popular Chambers throughout Australia have been based can be so called, and unless the struggles with which we have been made familiar by history, embarked in by the House of Commons on behalf of the people from time to time, can also be called quibbles. Unless the bases of all these historic struggles were quibbles, it is not justifiable to attach that appellation to our proceedings. However anxious the Government may be to avoid a collision with the other Chamber, and at the same time to do what they think is expedient under our commercial circumstances at the moment, it must be thoroughly felt that the motion is of great importance and significance, and that its possible consequences will reach far down into our history. We are asked to take a step which I feel may be regarded as the great renunciation by this House of the rights, powers, and privileges, which have been confided to it on behalf of the nation. I recognise that it is easy to receive this message, and to deal with it. I recognise that it is easy to look at the matter from the mere stand-point of settling the Tariff, and terminating what may be regarded as a momentary unpleasantness. I believe that, although it is not so intended by the Government, the motion presents an ignobly easy way of responding to what we must recognise as a direct challenge. It is always easy to go down hill, especially when you are pushed, but in that sense, and in that only, do I regard the course proposed by the Government as an easy one to follow. It would not be easy for any House of Representatives in the future, more courageous than ourselves, to retrace the steps now proposed to be taken, to recover lost ground, and work its way up the hill to the position in which we stand at this moment. For these reasons, and for others which I shall give, and which I regard as overwhelming, I think this motion ought to be rejected. There were two ways of challenging the Message of the Senate. One was adopted by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, and I feel that you, Mr. Speaker, have taken the only attitude that is commensurate with the importance of this occasion. Even if you had felt yourself in a position to give a technical ruling adverse to the reception of the Senate's Message, by reason of the standing orders, or by reason of the non-existence of standing orders, we all feel that it would be too much to put upon the shoulders of any one member of this House, however exalted, the responsibility of deciding this question. It is a responsibility that we, ourselves, must bear—a responsibility which the people expect us to shoulder—and one which—whatever our views on the subject may be—we are all willing and anxious to sustain. Therefore, I think that the burden of deciding this all-important question rests upon the proper shoulders. To ask the House to refrain from acknowledging the constitutionality of the Message from the Senate is a serious step to take. Let me bring to the pointed attention of honorable members some of the terms of the requests by the other Chamber, because, to my mind, the word "request," in this Message, is only the word "amendment" spelt differently. I cannot persuade myself from any stand-point that a moment's doubt can be entertained that this Message is a direct assertion on the part of the Senate of the right to amend. When I draw honorable members' attention to the wording of the section they will, perhaps, perceive, if they do not already do so, what I wish to convey. There are words in this Message which raise, as distinctly and directly as the English language is capable of raising it, the one plain issue—"Has the Senate the right practically to amend such a measure as this?" An affirmative reply to that question carries with it the right to amend every Appropriation Bill and every taxation Bill in the future. The other Chamber has forwarded to us certain requests. Some of them we agreed to. We agreed to others in a modified form, and we rejected others. But I wish specially to invite the attention of honorable members to the text of the Message. It reads thus—

The Senate has agreed to the modifications made by the House of Representatives in certain requests of the Senate.

Where in the Constitution do we find anything which warrants that statement? The Senate has the power—as I will show presently—to regard any modifications of its requests which have been assented to by this House, as part of the Bill, and to say whether it will accept the Bill with those modifications or not. But where in the Constitution is power granted to the other Chamber to announce to us that it has agreed to our modifications? Then the Message proceeds—

The Senate again requests the House of Representatives to make the amendments as originally requested.

That brings me to the wording of section 53, and to a particular portion of it which, so far as I have been able to observe, has not obtained that recognition and attention which it deserves. The Message continues—

The Senate has agreed not to again request the House of Representatives to make the amendments originally requested by Requests Nos. 1, 2, 5, 10, 11, 12, 40, 51, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 72, 74, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 88, 89 (as to part), and 92.

What is the meaning of that statement? Where in the Constitution is any provision which confers upon the Senate the right to say that it does not press its requests upon the House of Representatives to make certain amendments? In other words, this Message is one which is appropriate only to a Bill which the Senate has amended and returned to this Chamber, and to the amendments in which this House has not assented. If we alter the word "request" to the word "amend," this is the form of Message that is appropriate. Honorable members must see that, if they accept it, they are accepting, for this occasion, at all events—and though they may disavow it in what language they please—a Message asserting the right of amendment by the Senate. More than that, I wish to point out that, not only is the claim which I am now discussing as great as is that to amend certain Bills which the other Chamber has a right to amend, but it will, if acceded to by us, be construed into an admission that the Senate has power to do, by way of request, more than it can do by way of amendment. We shall thus be giving to the other Chamber in respect of Bills which are placed upon a higher plane by the Constitution a greater power than it possesses in respect of other measures which are treated as being of less importance, or as coming more properly within its purview. When we look at the Message we are compelled to ask ourselves—"What is the interpretation—the fair, honest, broad, and reasonable interpretation—of the Constitution in regard to this matter." I entirely agree with the Attorney-General that we should not regard the Constitution as embodying all the rules, regulations, and modes of procedure which are intended to guide this Legislative Assembly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then why did the honorable and learned member appeal to its verbiage only a few moments ago?

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member, perhaps, did not hear what I said.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then he evidently does not understand it. I said that we should not regard the Constitution as containing all the rules which should guide us—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why then appeal to it?

Mr. ISAACS.—Is it necessary to answer that question? The smallest reflection on the part of the honorable member will convince him that it answers itself. I say that so far as the Constitution makes any express provision, it must be followed. But there is behind that Constitution—behind that fabric which has been constructed at the cost of great labour, great expenditure of energy, time, and assiduity—the whole bulk of British and Australian tradition relating to parliamentary government. What I mean is that we have first to look at the Constitution, but if we find anything in it which is inconsistent with what I may term the common law of parliamentary usage, precedent, and tradition we should be guided by that as well. For example, we find nothing in the Constitution regarding the prerogative of the Crown, the practice of Cabinet Government, the responsibility of the Ministry to one House; but it is there all the same. It is embodied in our practice, and the Constitution must be read in conjunction with that practice. That is what I mean when I say that we should not look solely at the bare words of the Constitution. Therefore, I agree with the Attorney-General that we should regard the Constitution to a large extent as the frame-work of what is to govern us. Behind it, and along with it, we must remember the "breath of the people," as he termed it, the practice that has guided us in the past, and which, I trust, will continue to guide us in the future. The section which is all-important in this connexion is section 53. Those who were honoured by being members of the Federal Convention will never forget the peril in which we stood upon one memorable occasion when that section was under consideration, and when the delegates from the smaller States fought for giving the Senate power to amend all Bills, whilst those representing the larger States opposed it, but were perfectly willing to concede the other Chamber the power to amend certain Bills as a fair compromise between the power of rejection only and the power of amendment. As a result, the compromise of 1891 was carried.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member is scarcely correct. He must recollect that five representatives of the smaller States enabled that provision to be carried.

Mr. ISAACS.—It was as the honorable and learned member reminds me, but the matter depended especially upon the patriotism of two members who subordinated their own opinions at the last moment, and thus saved the whole federal cause. At the time those two members were subjected to considerable obloquy in certain quarters, but to-day their action is regarded as patriotic in the highest degree. Remembering that, and remembering that the fight was upon the question of the wisdom of conferring upon the Senate the power of amendment as against the power of request only, I cannot refrain from asking myself what would have been the consequence if, at that juncture, the proposal to give the Senate the power of amendment had been carried.

Mr. MACDONALD-PATERSON.—Was that in 1891?

Mr. ISAACS.—The compromise of 1891 was then adopted, and now finds its place in the Constitution. That compromise gave to the Senate the power to request amendments when, under the Constitution, the Senate was not a body to be elected by the people, but by the Parliaments. We must also recollect that it was never intended to place the Senate upon the same platform as that occupied by the House of Representatives, which was elected by the people. In the Convention we had contemporary explanations of what the compromise of 1891 meant. I do not think that in all cases we are justified in quoting individual expressions of opinion by members of the Convention regarding the interpretation of this Constitution. I do not think that we ought to regard all the individual views of the then representatives of the States as to the meaning of the words which at present find their place in the Constitution as binding upon those States or upon the nation for all time. There were occasions when the leader of the Convention was plainly expressing his own views, whilst there were others when he was clearly representing the united sense of the body which was engaged in fashioning the Constitution. But I think it will be well to remind honorable members of what the leader of the Convention said upon this particular point in Adelaide, because it is necessary for those who object to the course which the Government propose to assign reasons for their action, so that they may be placed upon record for all time.

Mr. GLYNN.—Is the honorable and learned member not on very dangerous ground in seeking to explain the Constitution by diverse opinions?

Mr. ISAACS.—I have explained my meaning. I am not on dangerous, but on the firmest ground, because I am going to show that the words of the Constitution, interpreted as they stand, are entirely consonant with and corroborated by the expression of opinion by the leader of the Convention at the time the provision was agreed upon. The date was 14th April, 1897, and the remarks are contained in the official report of the Adelaide Convention, at page 557. Sir Edmund Barton said—

Let us come to another argument that has been used with a good deal of effect by some members. We are told that this is a question of mere choice of words—that is to say, that the power of amending taxation is practically the same as the power to make suggestions. The question of responsibility rises again. If the second Chamber makes suggestions such as are enabled to be made in this colony (South Australia) under the Compact of 1857, which is not a matter of law, but a matter of agreement; if the second Chamber makes suggestions under an agreement of that sort, and if the suggestions are not adopted, that House must face the responsibility of deciding whether it will veto the Bill or not.

Mr. GLYNN.—In South Australia they do exactly what we are doing now. The requests are repeated and go backward and forward.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is to say, the House which makes the requests will not take the responsibility of rejecting the Bill. Sir Edmund Barton continued—

If the procedure is to be by way of amendment, and the amendments are disagreed with by the House of Representatives, and are still insisted upon by the Second Chamber, then it is upon the House of Representatives that the responsibility must rest of destroying its own measure.

That was repeated by Sir Edmund Barton at the Sydney Convention when he quoted a long passage, including the words I have read, and that shows he retained his opinion regarding the section. But almost at the end of the Melbourne Convention the present honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne submitted an amendment of sub-clause (4), and the remarks made at the time are contained in the official report of the Melbourne Convention proceedings of 7th March, 1898, page 1,996. I draw attention to the words I am about to quote, because they seem to me highly important as showing no justification for the course now proposed.

Sir Edmund Barton, after having been asked a question by Mr. Higgins, said—

As I understand it, the proposal is that the Senate may, at any stage of the passage of a proposed law—

Honorable members will observe that it is a stage the Bill has reached. Sir Edmund Barton went on—through the Senate, return the Bill to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the amendment, or omission, of any items or provisions therefrom.

Mr. KINGSTON.—As long as the Senate has possession of the Bill?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes, as long as the Bill is in the hands of the Senate. That means, I take it, a power not solely to send a Bill down at a stage at which the measure has, at the moment, arrived at; but that, if it arrives at a further stage in the Senate, there being in the meantime some settlement or no settlement in regard to the suggestion made, that the Senate would have power to make other suggestions.

It will be observed that there are two conditions—the Bill must arrive at a further stage in the Senate, and the requests must be other requests. Then Sir Edmund Barton went on to guard himself—

Whether it would have power to repeat the same suggestion, is a matter I have not considered, but it seems to me that there is nothing in this clause to restrict the Senate, after making a suggestion at one stage of the Bill, from making another suggestion at another stage of the measure, as long as the Bill is in the course of its passage through the Senate.

There are three points to be observed. The stage that is referred to is the stage of the Bill. After a request has been made by the other Chamber, and dealt with by the House of Representatives, the Senate, according to that opinion, has power at any further stage of the Bill to make any further request. The honorable gentleman offered no opinion as to whether the same request could be made at any stage, but he was clear in what I have read to honorable members. There is all the difference in the world between the present attempted procedure and that laid down by Sir Edmund Barton. In the procedure laid down by that gentleman, finality is assured, and the procedure is entirely in consonance with the words of the section, whereas the procedure now proposed, will, it is admitted, leave the matter without finality.

Mr. POYNTER.—Sir Edmund Barton expressed no opinion upon that phase.

Mr. ISAACS.—He did not express an opinion on that point, but the opinion he did express seems to be very significant as to the meaning of the section. I quote the passage principally to dissipate any idea that may have arisen in the minds of some honorable members that it affords any warrant for accepting the motion. At best, honorable members who are favorable to the motion must admit that the quotation gives no warrant—that it is negative. But on the other hand, it seems to me that while Sir Edmund Barton used the language at Adelaide, and repeated it at Sydney, he at the last moment would not take it upon himself to say that the Senate has power to repeat the same request at any period, nor would he take it upon himself to say that the Senate could make fresh requests at the same stage. That is very important for honorable members to recollect. When I direct the attention of honorable members to the words of the section, they will see that no such interpretation as that now sought ought to be applied.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Does the honorable and learned member contend that the opinion of Sir Edmund Barton at the Convention is binding in the interpretation of the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS.—No, I should not contend that; but this passage has been used by those who entertain a contrary opinion to myself as warranting the reception of this message; and, I want to show, as best I can, that it offers no such authority.

Mr. MCCAY.—What is the practice in South Australia?

Mr. GLYNN.—Exactly what is now proposed.

Mr. ISAACS.—I may as well come to the section at once, and show how important its words are. The section, after making the important provision to which the honorable member for Wentworth has alluded, sets forth that, except as provided in the section, the powers of the Senate shall be equal with the powers of the House of Representatives in regard to Bills. The section proceeds to make very important exceptions, first as to the power of origination, which, in regard to appropriation or taxation Bills, is exclusively confined to the House of Representatives. Then comes the power of amendment, and the Senate is prohibited from amending Bills imposing taxation, or ordinary appropriation Bills. Then there is a power which is less, and intended to be less, than that of amendment—namely, the power of request.

If that power were not in the Constitution, the Senate would have no power regarding such Bills but that of agreement or rejection. I should have referred to an intervening paragraph of the section, which ought to have the greatest weight with honorable members in coming to a conclusion. That section provides that the Senate may not amend any proposed law so as to "increase any proposed charge or burden" on the people. That means that even in regard to Bills which the Senate may amend—even in regard to what I may call Special Appropriation Bills, or any other Bills, they may amend—they have power to diminish, but no power to increase, a charge on the people, either by way of amendment or request. The power of request is not an exercise of any power to alter a Bill in any respect. The Senate may request an amendment, and, in the particular Bill under discussion, they have requested that burdens or charges on the people may be increased. If now we are going to permit the Senate to insist on these requests being acceded to, they will, in regard to certain Money Bills, which are supposed to be further removed from their consideration than are other Bills, have a power greater than they have in regard to Money Bills which they may amend. I press this point on the attention of honorable members because it seems to me to be entirely decisive that if the Senate are to be permitted to send down requests to this House to amend the Tariff Bill or an ordinary appropriation Bill by adding to the expenditure of the people, and if this House sends the Bill back, and a game of battle-door and shuttlecock goes on, the Senate not only shirk the responsibility, which it is admitted on all hands they ought to take, of vetoing or accepting a Bill, but they virtually and practically exercise the power of amendment in a higher degree than they can in regard to a Special Appropriation Bill, which the Constitution has placed more thoroughly within their functions.

Mr. GLYNN.—A repeated request may be regarded as rejecting or shelving a Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—Repeating a request as often as they choose, and refusing to deal with the measure, is equivalent to shirking responsibility. It is a refusal to pass it, and a request becomes a demand when it is repeated.

Mr. GLYNN.—The repetition of a request does not limit the powers of this House.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course not. The honorable and learned member is accurate. But who has spoken of the powers of this House being limited? We have power to refuse a request, as we have power to reject an amendment. We are not now talking of the right of this House to say "no" to anything proposed by the Senate; we are talking of the right of the Senate to demand what the Constitution declares it shall only request.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—Then why did not the framers of the Constitution provide that a request should be made only once?

Mr. ISAACS.—The Constitution provides that the Senate may make a request at any stage of its consideration of a measure. We have discussed the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the Senate, but have honorable members had their attention directed to the all important and terribly significant words which relate to the House of Representatives? Does the Constitution stop short at providing that the Senate, in dealing with Money Bills, may make requests instead of amendments? No. The words used in regard to the powers of the House of Representatives are stronger, wider, and more significant than appear in regard to the powers of the Senate, or than can be found in the Constitution of any other Legislature. When a request comes to us from the Senate—

The House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make any of such omissions or amendments, with or without modifications. From a legal point of view there is no more force in that provision, by reason of the use of the words—"if it thinks fit" than there would be if they were absent. But as a beacon, indicating with illuminating light the meaning of the section, they are all important. Those words were in the Bill framed by the Convention of 1891. They were part of a compromise. They were also in the Bill originally framed by the Convention of 1897-8. The drafting committee of the Convention struck them out, and, later on, I moved to restore them. At page 2450 of the official report of the debates of the Convention during its Melbourne session, honorable members will find that, after pointing out that from a mere legal standpoint, the discretion of the House of Representatives would be unaffected by the words, I added—

I do not think that there would be any legal difference, so far as I can see at the moment, if they were omitted, but they were put in with a very distinct object, and I am sure the presence of the words had weight with some honorable members, as showing that to grant the power of suggestion was not as great as to grant the power of amendment. I think it will be better to leave in the words.

The leader of the Convention, the Prime Minister, in reply to my remarks and the observations of other honorable members, said—

As to my honorable friend's suggestion, there is no real difference in the meaning of the Bill, whether the words "if it thinks fit" are or are not inserted. Both the old form and the new form make it clear that the House of Representatives may do what it likes with suggested omissions or suggested amendments—that it can take them or reject them, or modify them and take them. I have no objection to the insertion of the words "if it thinks fit," if my honorable friend thinks it really is an advisable thing to do.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think it is.

Mr. BARTON.—If my honorable friend thinks it is a politic thing to do, and he moves an amendment, I will accept it.

The representatives of the smaller States were jealous of any mark in the Constitution of the superiority of the House of Representatives, and I, therefore, to prevent any possible misapprehension, thought that it was politic to move the reinsertion of the words, and they were reinserted. Those words are all-important in this connexion, and I will show honorable members why. Let me indicate as best I may what the whole meaning of the provision is. It means that in certain Bills which are intimately connected with the constitutional principle, and essential to the true conduct of responsible government, you cannot have a divided care; you cannot have divided opinions on the details of a measure, although you properly allow the second Chamber to say "Yes" or "No" to the measure as a whole. The Senate must take the responsibility of accepting or rejecting such measures as a whole. As was pointed out in a State Parliament by a distinguished member of the Convention, the object of the provision is this: Whereas, under the States Constitutions, second chambers have had to take the responsibility of the rejection or acceptance of financial measures without being able to avail themselves of any recognised formal method of acquainting the public with the reasons of their action, a means is here given to communicate with the other House, and to ask for an expression of its real, deliberate will in regard to any provision which does not commend itself to the Senate. When the Senate, at any stage in its consideration of a measure, communicates its difficulties to the House of Representatives, and asks us whether we really intend to adhere to our proposals, we may either say, "Yes," absolutely, or agree to amend or modify those proposals. The measure must then go back to the Senate, and their power of suggestion in regard to it is exhausted, so far as that stage is concerned. Repetition of the request converts it into a demand. If, at a future stage, other difficulties present themselves, it is quite possible, though I pronounce no definite opinion upon the subject, that it may be intended by the Constitution that the Senate shall have another opportunity to formulate new requests for further light as to the will of this House; but it has no right to again challenge the decision of this House in respect to matters in regard to which it has made requests, and has received a definite answer

Mr. GLYNN.—The only precedent we have is the South Australian precedent.

Mr. ISAACS.—That precedent was created under a Constitution which places both Houses on the same footing, except with regard to the power of originating appropriation and taxing Bills.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—What does the honorable and learned member understand by the words "stage of a Bill," as applied to the consideration of a measure by the Senate?

Mr. ISAACS.—The meaning of the words is thoroughly understood in the parliamentary procedure of both England and America.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I know what is understood in the procedure of the State Parliaments. I ask what, in the absence of joint standing orders, is the meaning of the words as they occur in the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS.—We are discussing not standing orders but the Constitution. As the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne rightly said, no standing orders can alter the Constitution. The word "stage" is ordinarily employed in connexion with the consideration of a parliamentary measure. It will be found in May's Parliamentary Practice on pages 444 and 445. For instance, it is there stated that the second reading is "the most important stage" through which a Bill is required to pass. The word will be found also in Story's Constitution of the United States. Speaking of the procedure of passing a Bill through three readings and the committee stages, he comes to the question of its engrossing and reading a third time. That is the time usually chosen by opponents of a measure, he says, to attack it, though Attempts are indeed sometimes made at previous stages to defeat it.

Lower down, he states—

The two last stages of the Bill, namely, on the questions, whether it shall have a third reading, and whether it shall pass, are the strong points of resistance and defence.

Then Cushing, in his work on The Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, has a chapter headed—"Of the several stages through which a Bill passes."

Mr. CONROY.—The word "stage" is not confined in its application to the first, second, and third readings?

Mr. ISAACS.—That is doubtful. I am not prepared to say that it is so confined. But there has been no subsequent stage in regard to the consideration of the measure with which we are now dealing.

Mr. CONROY.—The Senate went into committee upon it again.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Bill had reached a certain stage when the Senate first made requests in regard to it, and it has not advanced beyond that stage. Certain matters have been reconsidered, but the Bill is in the same stage as it was in before. Cushing, on page 829, says—

Bills thus received, whether presented by members, reported by committees, or sent from the other House, are, in all substantial respects, to be proceeded with in the same manner, through the several stages which have been established by usage for the passing of Bills. At each of these different stages every Bill, in a parliamentary sense, presents a new question, although it may, in fact, be the same which has been formerly considered. These several stages have never been departed from, although they depend upon usage merely, and are as much in force and as fundamental in our Legislative Assemblies as in Parliament. The nature of the different stages through which each Bill must pass in its progress, before it becomes a law, will be stated more fully as we proceed.

In earlier times, when reading and writing were not universal accomplishments, the members of the House of Commons required to have the provisions of measures read out to them, so that they might understand them. In this way arose the term—"The reading of a Bill." It requires very little research to discover that the first-reading stage was preceded by several preliminary stages, intended to acquaint honorable members with the purport of the measure. Then came the first and second readings, the consideration in committee, and the third reading stages. Altogether there are several stages in connexion with the consideration of a Bill, though it is a matter for each House to determine what the stages shall be.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Does the honorable and learned member admit that the consideration of a Bill in committee is a stage?

Mr. ISAACS.—I think that it is, but I do not make any admission on the subject.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Then, if a Bill is referred several times to a committee, it passes through several stages?

Mr. ISAACS.—Certainly not, if it is referred to the same committee. Until a Bill has passed beyond the committee stage, it has not entered another stage.

Mr. KINGSTON.—What about a recommittal?

Mr. ISAACS.—That is a going-back to the same stage. It is not a going-forward to a further stage. It is not making another stage on the journey from Melbourne to Adelaide to go to Serviceton, and then to return to Melbourne. There can be no doubt that the Bill is still at the same stage as it was at when the matter was last before us, and that the requests now before us are the same. Consequently, it seems to me beyond argument that their consideration is forbidden by the Constitution. I have endeavoured to place distinctly, and, I hope, convincingly, before honorable members the reasons why I think we ought not to agree to the motion. I think that a fundamental breach of the Constitution, in no unimportant, but in a very central point, is about to be committed. I hope that I have said nothing to offend the susceptibilities of any honorable member. I cannot recognise as a fair and legitimate reason for laying down a new line of policy utterly foreign to all sense of responsible Government as understood and practised in Australia, the ground of expediency advanced by the Government, or the party reasons which may perhaps operate with honorable members opposite. I do not think that it will be any party triumph for the free-trade members if they secure the consideration of these requests. They will not change the character of the Tariff, if they carry every resolution in favour of acceding to the requests of the Senate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does the honorable and learned member suggest that we are guided by party considerations?

Mr. ISAACS.—I am only pointing out that my honorable friends may think that they are gaining something, but that their hopes will not be realized.

Mr. CONROY.—If we sought a party triumph we should like to see a dissolution, because it would "wipe out" a number of honorable members opposite.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am sure that my honorable and learned friend means all that he says. I am confident that honorable members will not regard me as impeaching their motives. I am merely presenting reasons why they should not take the course to which they seem favorably inclined. I believe that we shall make a great—I hope not an irretrievable—error if we allow matters of momentary consequence to outweigh those greater considerations which must present themselves to our view. I hope that those considerations, which are merely transient, incidental, and alterable, will be subordinated to those which are permanent, essential, and unalterable. The Attorney-General has told us that the Tariff is a non-party document. I admit the force of what he says, but I submit that the Constitution is still less of a party character, and that we should take refuge behind it. If we are right we are more than justified in resisting any encroachment upon the privileges of this House, which are not given to us for our own sake, but on behalf of those whom we represent. It may be difficult in the highest degree for us to retrieve our position if we once make the mistake which, I am afraid, we are about to commit. I fear that we are about to take, as Wentworth, in Browning's Stratford, says—

One false step no way to be repaired.

But however that may be, I am sure that honorable members will act according to the best that lies within them, and I hope, even now, that we shall leave no legacy of doubt or weakness to our successors. I trust that they, when they review our actions and our proceedings to-day, will admit that we have been moved by no impulses less lofty, less noble, or less glorious than the maintenance in its integrity of our splendid Constitution, and consideration for the welfare of the people it is designed to serve.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—If honorable members on this side of the House desired to make this a party question, they would throw in their lot with those who dissent from the Government, because it must be clear that a dissolution would offer some hope to any party in a minority. We think that a dissolution would offer us every prospect of being able to reverse the present situation. On the other hand, if we went to the country now, we should immensely strengthen the power of the Senate, because there would be returned to this House a body of men determined to reduce the duties imposed by the Tariff, and act strongly in accord with the requests which have been made.

Mr. SALMON.—All the "wobblers" would go out of Victoria.

Mr. CONROY.—Perhaps so; but there is no doubt that the representation of the greater part of Australia would undergo a marked change if we had a dissolution. A great deal has been said regarding the injury that would be inflicted upon this House if we consented to consider the Message received from the Senate; but the whole question has been reduced to the consideration of the meaning of the words "at any stage." Unless we attach a particular meaning to these words, the Senate has not gone beyond its power. I listened very carefully to what the honorable and learned member for Indi said regarding the statement made by Sir Edmund Barton at the Convention in Melbourne. That right honorable gentleman said that requests differing from those first submitted might be made at a subsequent stage; but, if that had been intended, it would have been specifically provided that requests made on subsequent occasions should differ from those preferred at the outset. We are reduced now to a quibble over one or two words, and I ask whether it is worth our while to take the extreme course suggested by the honorable and learned member for Indi. Ought we not to rely upon common sense, and to sweep away the cobwebs of the law? These may be strong enough to enmesh the minds of members of the legal profession, but I trust that they will not be sufficiently strong to influence a body of practical men, who are met together for the purpose of governing—of reconciling the conflicting interests of the people. The interests of a certain party in this House conflict with those of another party in the Senate, and the honorable and learned member for Indi proposes that we should take steps that would prevent us from having any discussion whatever between the two Houses. If there is a difficulty, this House should be the first to come forward, and make suggestions by which it could be surmounted. It has been said that we might injure the standing of this House in connexion with Money Bills; but section 53 of the Constitution, provides that—

Proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys or imposing taxation shall not originate in the Senate.

That is a most important limitation, which cannot be overcome by anything we may do. Surely honorable members will not contend that the power of rejecting a Bill does not lie with the Senate? It may be that it is a disadvantage to have a second Chamber, but I do not wish to enter into a discussion of that question. Whilst there is a second House, however, it must have the power of rejecting Bills, and, if this is admitted, how can we contend that it is not to have the infinitely less important power of suggesting amendments, or requesting us to make them? Are we not raising a trivial difficulty? I decline to adopt the narrow view of the matter which the honorable and learned member for Indi has been trying to force upon us. We should do our best to overcome the difficulties which have arisen, but if we do not receive a message from the Senate we are not in a position to know in what respects they disagree from us. The practical result of adopting the attitude suggested by the honorable and learned member for Indi would be to deny the Senate any right to share in the government of the country, and we know what consequences must ensue from our taking up any such attitude. If honorable members opposite had been as ready on a former occasion to foresee difficulties, we might not have found ourselves in our present position. In July last I warned the Minister for Trade and Customs, who, apparently, did not intend to consider the Senate in any way whatever, that a constitutional difficulty would surely arise as the result of his attitude, and surely enough, he has fallen into the blunder against which I warned him. I do not suppose any one doubts that he is directly responsible for the trouble that has arisen, and the fact that the Senate has insisted upon some of its original requests. It was easy for some of the honorable members of the Senate to ascertain that some honorable members did not take the trouble to consider some of the Tariff proposals, but blindly followed the Minister for Trade and Customs, and I hope that those honorable members now see the folly of relying upon his guidance. Upon the occasion to which I refer, I did not receive any assistance from the honorable and learned member for Indi, or from the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. McCAY.—Why does the honorable and learned member challenge me with not having done something, and assume that I intend to take a certain course to-day?

Mr. CONROY.—I assumed from the interjections of the honorable and learned member that he was of the same way of thinking as the honorable and learned member for Indi, and I do not think I was wrong. Whilst I should be very glad to take advantage of any circumstances which would tend to force this House to the country—because I believe that the Tariff has been imposed against the wish and behind the backs of the people—I cannot regard the Senate as having placed itself in a position that would debar us from accepting its Message, and therefore I shall support the motion. I feel myself bound to support the Government upon this occasion.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I do not intend to detain the House more than a few minutes in discussing this question. At the same time I recognise that it is one of such importance that those who, like myself, are apparently in a minority should embrace the opportunity of briefly placing upon record their reasons for dissenting from the course proposed by the Government. After the long and able address of the honorable and learned member for Indi, I do not intend to weary the House by repeating the salient points of the Senate's Message to which strong exception can be taken. I think it will be agreed that there are portions of that Message which are in no way warranted by the Constitution. If the Senate makes requests to this branch of the Legislature, and we refuse to accede to them, it then becomes the business of the other Chamber either to pass or reject the Bill, without informing us that it approves of our agreement to, or modifications of, its requests. Such an intimation is entirely superfluous, and it is more than a matter of mere words, because it approximates to the practice in connexion with amendments, and is in reality an implication that the Senate can deal with our treatment of its requests in the same way that it can deal with our treatment of its amendments. If we make the amendments requested by the other Chamber, or make them with modifications, and then return the Bill, it is the business of the Senate either to accept or reject it as it stands without sending us any Message whatever in regard to particular items. In itself this is not a matter of very great importance, but regarded as an indication of the attitude which may be assumed hereafter by the other Chamber when questions arise as to the relations between the two Houses, it is of the gravest concern. It is utterly useless for the Government to assert that they are going to do something which is not warranted by the Constitution, and at the same time to declare that they reserve all our rights under that instrument of government. If we yield to the Senate something which the Constitution does not grant, it is useless saying that we reserve our rights. A hen-pecked husband who continually dwells upon the word "obey" does not improve his position by verbally reiterating his rights. Similarly if we grant to the Senate a power with which it is not clothed by the Constitution we shall alter the relations intended to be established between the two Houses, and no reservation of rights will prevent the precedent set up on this occasion from having considerable weight should the same question be involved in the future. That is all I desire to say concerning the form of the Senate's Message. But in regard to its substance I wish to observe that the words employed in section 53 of the Constitution—which deals with the power of the Senate in the matter of making requests—show upon any reasonable interpretation one limit of meaning only. I do not rely upon the expression of opinion in regard to this matter by Sir Edmund Barton, when acting as leader of the Federal Convention, though I think that his opinion is entitled to the utmost respect. Certainly, if any one's judgment ought to weigh with us his should do so. But the reasonable interpretation of section 53 is that a limit is imposed upon the power of the Senate in regard to Money Bills. In the first place I hold that the power of request is not intended to exceed the power which would be conferred by the right of amendment. The Senate, by its requests, is not to have more power than it would enjoy if it possessed the right of amendment only. In this connexion I differ from the view of the honorable and learned member for Indi as to requests by the Senate for increased charges or burdens upon the people. I think that section 53 carries with it an implication that the requests of the Senate shall suffer the same limitation that applies to amendments, namely, that a burden or charge upon the people shall not be increased. It is inconceivable that the power of request which was intended to be less than the power of amendment should be allowed to exceed it. It is impossible to suppose that the Constitution meant to declare—"The Senate cannot amend a Bill so as to increase a charge upon the people, but it can request that such a charge shall be increased." That limitation on the power of request must be read into the Constitution, though it does not appear there in so many words. If the power of request is not to exceed that of amendment, it seems to me that we arrive at something like that position. With respect to the resolution submitted by the Attorney-General, without any desire to fully discuss the meaning of the word "stage" to which reference has been made, I may say that, to my mind, it means a complete operation in regard to a Bill, bringing it nearer to its final passage through the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member for Indi said there were seven or eight stages in the passing of a Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes; but each stage is complete in itself, and brings its final passing nearer. It appears to me that the Senate cannot make requests twice at the same stage in the history of this measure. As a matter of fact, I do not think that it can make requests twice during all the stages of the Bill. The words "the Senate at any stage may return a Bill, &c.," mean at any stage in the history of a Bill. At the most the Senate may suspend the operation of that stage, and return the Bill to this House with a request that it shall be amended. When it resumes its consideration of the measure it must either complete that stage in its consideration or go on to the next stage. I see no legal quibble or refinement in this matter such as the leader of the Opposition suggests is to be found in any constitutional argument.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Does the honorable and learned member say there is no question about the interpretation which he has placed upon the Constitution?

Mr. McCAY. — I am very loth to answer in the affirmative, because, with all its flexibility, the English language is a very imperfect vehicle for conveying our thoughts. But I do hold that what I have stated is a reasonable interpretation of that section.

Mr. HARTNOLL. — It is a most inconvenient one.

Mr. McCAY. — We are not concerned with whether or not it is inconvenient. We are concerned with whether that was the intention of the Constitution under which the people declared that we should work.

Mr. HUME COOK. — The question is whether that interpretation is a correct one.

Mr. McCAY. — Exactly. I have not heard anybody suggest that it is not correct. I venture to say that not a single honorable member will declare that the Senate can return the same request to this House twice.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER. — What would be the next stage?

Mr. McCAY. — Going into committee would be the next stage, the report would constitute another stage, and the third reading still another. There are plenty of stages in the history of a Bill.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON. — But in this case it is the various items of a schedule with which we have to deal.

Mr. McCAY. — I have yet to learn that the schedule is not part of the Bill. I am very much obliged to the honorable member for his interjection, because I should like to draw attention to the fact that the only power which the Senate possesses is to deal with the whole Bill as we sent it to that Chamber. When the Senate returns the schedule to us it has to return the whole Bill. That fact strengthens my contention that the other Chamber must not send back the whole Bill to this House twice at any stage. To my mind, it has exhausted its powers when it has returned the measure once.

Mr. SAWERS. — The Convention settled that.

Mr. McCAY. — The Convention did nothing of the sort. The Constitution alone settles it. Even the leader of the Convention did not express a definite opinion upon this matter.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Was not this provision based upon the South Australian practice?

Mr. McCAY. — It was suggested by that practice, but I cannot agree that it was determined by it. The next point which arises is — "Can the Senate make the same suggestion under any circumstances a second time?" If it can, then it can make it a third and a thirtieth time, subject to any limitations which it chooses to place upon itself by its own standing orders.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — It can make a request as many times as we allow it to do so.

Mr. McCAY. — No; it can make it as many times as we choose to receive its Message. If we receive its Message a second time there is no reason why we should not receive it a third time. If the Senate can make the same suggestions a second time, whether at the same stage or another I care not, so far as regards this particular part of the argument — if the Senate can do that, it is in exactly the same position in regard to requests as it is in regard to amendments. When I use the word "exactly," I am leaving out of account the somewhat theoretical question as to the House on which the final responsibility of rejecting the Bill will fall. But that is rather an academic question, at any rate, at the present stage of affairs.

Mr. GLYNN. — There is the great difference that the requests do not go to a joint sitting.

Mr. McCAY. — That is perfectly true, but that only goes to show that the power of request is to be regarded as something distinctly inferior to the power of amendment — something not equal to an amendment in its incidence, except on the particular point to which another honorable member has referred.

Mr. ISAACS. — Suggestions can be referred to a joint sitting.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Not suggestions.

Mr. McCAY. — Section 57 provides —

If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law, and the Senate rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, and if after an interval of three months the House of Representatives, in the same or the next session, again passes the proposed law with or without any amendments which have been made, suggested, or agreed to by the Senate, and the Senate rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree—certain things are to happen. That is the only section in which the word "suggested" instead of "requested" appears in the Constitution, and it is, so to speak, a misprint. Requests appear to be placed on a fairly strong basis, but that aspect is foreign to the present issue. If the same request can be repeated it is an amendment in all but name; the difference in the words amounts to nothing. Neither the members of the Convention nor the people of Australia, when they accepted the Constitution, for one moment believed that "requests" were to be identical with "amendments." Had I believed that requests were to be regarded as amendments I should, as far as lay in my power, have asked the people of Victoria to reject the Constitution. It was because, on a reasonable rendering of the section, a distinction was intended, and, as I supposed, was made between requests and amendments, that I was prepared to accept the Constitution. If the proper construction be that contended for by some honorable members, we have a cumbrous machinery for attaining exactly the same results as an ordinary system of amendments would attain.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable and learned member indicate the course he thinks ought to be followed? The honorable and learned member for Indi did not do so.

Mr. McCAY.—I am prepared to indicate the course which ought to be followed, and I believe the honorable and learned member for Indi also did so when he expressed the opinion that the motion should not be passed. I do not want to do the Senate the discourtesy of not formally letting them know that their Message actually reached us.

Mr. GLYNN.—How does the Constitution provide for that?

Mr. McCAY.—If the Senate does what we consider unconstitutional, we are not to be blamed if we are courteous enough to tell them that we think they are wrong.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member asks the Senate to listen to us, but does not want us to listen to the Senate.

Mr. McCAY.—I think the Senate ought to be informed that their Message has been brought before this House, and that it is considered by us that they exceed their constitutional powers by sending the Message.

Mr. ISAACS.—And that the Bill has been sent to them to deal with.

Mr. McCAY.—And that the Bill has been sent to the Senate to pass or reject it. We may also express a hope that the Senate will pass the measure, or use words to that effect. The framers of the Constitution assumed that the Senate would not exceed their constitutional power, and, therefore, there is no provision for such an occurrence. The Acting Prime Minister seems to doubt the propriety of sending to the Senate the motion in which he seeks to preserve our rights.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I doubt the necessity.

Mr. McCAY.—"Necessity" and "propriety" come to the same thing in considering grave matters of this kind. The Acting Prime Minister seems to think that by a motion of our own—a sort of private home declaration concerning ourselves—we shall save our rights. If that be the Acting Prime Minister's idea he is more sanguine than ever I thought him to be. It is no use making abstract declarations on our own behalf. In future years, when the Houses do have to settle questions even bigger, perhaps, than that now in dispute—when the inevitable conflict occurs, though not necessarily carried to the extreme contemplated as possible by the Constitution—what will be appealed to will not be the mellifluous terms of a resolution declaratory of our own rights, but the actual course taken by the House.

Mr. HARTNOLL.—Say, "without prejudice," to satisfy legal members.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member is pleased to be jocular, and he evidently misunderstands legal members on the subject. The honorable member would, I suppose, sacrifice all his rights "without prejudice"—would give away all his money, or support the Government Tariff proposals on the same terms. To my mind the Commonwealth will never be able to get away from the fact that on the first occasion on which the question could be raised as to the respective constitutional powers of the two Houses, the Government, which is supposed to be, even more than private members, the guardian of the interests of the House, with the approval of the leader of the Opposition, advised honorable members to sacrifice the conceivable rights of the Chamber, and the conceivable rights of the people represented by this Chamber.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo). — If I thought that the motion, as proposed by the Acting Prime Minister, would involve any sacrifice of the rights of this House I should vote against it, and advise every honorable member to do the same. I decline to admit, however, that the passing of the motion means either a sacrifice, as suggested by the honorable member for Corinella, or a renunciation of our rights as suggested by the honorable member for Indi. I am as strong as those honorable and learned members in the view they have put forward as to the construction of the Constitution. I agree with them entirely in the view that the section empowering the Senate at any stage to return a Bill with a Message requesting alterations gives a power which can be exercised only once at the same stage, and that it does not give the right to repeat the same request at the same stage. That, I think, is a sound constitutional view—a view consistent with the unwritten law of Parliament in regard to communications between the two Houses, and a view thoroughly in harmony with the Constitution. Amendments no doubt are sometimes pressed, but we must consider the question apart from the principle of amendments. I do not think the Senate has a right to press a request. I thoroughly agree with the view put forward by the honorable and learned members, to whom I have already referred, that there is a great difference between the constitutional power to request or suggest alterations, and the constitutional power to make amendments. The section itself draws a marked distinction in the words “the Senate may request an omission or an amendment.” That shows a marked contrast between requesting a thing to be done by another House which has the exclusive power to do that thing, and the right to do it by the party requesting it to be done.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is all right in theory.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—And also in practice. When we arrive at the stage at which the question will be properly fought out to the bitter end—and this is not the proper stage—then effect will undoubtedly have to be given to the contrast shown in the section, and also to the words referred to by the honorable and learned member for Indi, namely, that the House of Representatives may, “if it thinks fit,” make the alteration requested. These words show that the intention of the Constitution is that finality shall rest with this Chamber, and that the Constitution at the same time intends that this Chamber shall be in a position to recognise hints and suggestions from the Senate, as it might indirectly through any public organ in the Commonwealth, as to the direction in which alterations or improvements may be made as to the direction in which alterations or improvements may be made. Such being my view, I desire to explain, in a few words, why I intend to support the proposition of the Acting Prime Minister. By passing his motion we point out to the Senate, and to the whole world, that we do not in any way surrender our right to place our own interpretation upon the section of the Constitution when the time arrives. If we receive the message of the Senate without entering something like a protest, or placing a notice such as is now proposed upon our records, it may be said hereafter that we have waived our right of interpretation. Even if we did waive that right, our action in doing so would in no way affect our powers and privileges as determined by the Constitution. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has said that we cannot in any way contract or enlarge our powers by passing standing orders. Neither can we contract our powers by any action we may take in waiving them.

Mr. MCCAY.—Yes, we can, if we waive our rights under a section which the House of Representatives and the Senate interpret between themselves, and whose interpretation will never be a matter for the courts to determine.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—We receive this message under the special and extraordinary circumstances referred to in the motion. The statement of that fact recited in the motion submitted prevents anything like a waiver of our rights. The time may arrive when a triumphant majority in this House will desire to raise the question in a practical form, and to fight it out, even to the length of carrying on the contest before the constituencies.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It will have to be raised when the standing orders come to be framed.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That would be a very weak way of raising it; indeed I do not see how it can be raised then. It will have to be raised in connexion with some great legislative proposal ; but this would be a most inopportune and unwise time to raise it. This is the first occasion in our history that any difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the section has come before us in a concrete form. The point has been discussed by constitutional writers and in the press, but we have never been called upon to exercise the responsibility of declaring our view in regard to it.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—We are not giving up the right to at any stage refuse to receive the Messages of the Senate.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That is hardly the point. The point is whether by receiving this Message of the Senate we waive the right to hereafter raise the contention that the Senate cannot send two Messages in regard to a measure while it is still at the same stage of consideration. By agreeing to the motion which has been moved by the Acting Prime Minister, we save that contention. We say that under the special circumstances of the case—Parliament having been engaged for a long period in the discussion of a momentous and complicated measure, which it would be a disaster resulting in a national crisis to jeopardize—we agree not to determine our constitutional rights. Strong as my views as to our constitutional position are, I regard with positive alarm the possibility of anything like a contest resulting in a dead-lock between the two Chambers at the present time. We ought not to launch into a great fight, such as we should be inviting if we refuse to accept the Message of the Senate, without considering all the consequences. If we declined to accept this Message, the Senate would say, "You never gave us warning of the view you take in regard to your constitutional position. You have never, by any action or declaration, denied our right to send a second Message, and in the absence of such notice or declaration we had a right to send a second Message." The rejection of a second Message under those circumstances would undoubtedly give the Senate the right to complain of discourteous treatment. Before entering into a big controversy, we should respectfully acquaint the Senate of our views as to its constitutional disability, and the constitutional rights of this House. The motion before us will do that, and will give them fair notice and warning as to what we may do on a future occasion if a second Message is sent under like circumstances. I think the people of Australia will expect us, before entering into a contest with the Senate which may involve the loss of the Tariff and the prolongation of the commercial uncertainty and unrest which now exists, to acquaint the members of that Chamber with our views on the matter. I think that, as a piece of political wisdom and precaution, we should agree to the motion, because it will preserve our rights and privileges, as we or those who may come after us may interpret them, and afford a judicious means of dealing with the difficulty at the present stage. If the Senate, after this intimation, show a persistent determination to invade our rights and privileges, it will be the duty of the Government to take such action as will show them that we do not intend to tamely submit to any such invasion. Those are the views which I entertain, but I decline to admit that I am, in any degree, less earnest or less determined than honorable members who have preceded me, to vindicate to the utmost the privileges of this House, as established by the letter, as well as the spirit, of the Constitution. Under the special circumstances of the case, I urge honorable members to acquiesce in the view presented by the Acting Prime Minister, and to pass the motion, which, I believe, will meet all the requirements of the situation, and will, at the same time, judiciously preserve our rights and privileges.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I regret that I cannot vote for the motion of the Acting Prime Minister. Although I have from the inception of the consideration of the Tariff endeavoured to keep in view the desirability of avoiding a contest with the Senate, and bringing the matter to a conclusion as early as possible, so as to allow business people to know under what conditions they will have to carry on their enterprises, and have therefore on many occasions sacrificed my view as to the rates of duty which should be imposed, I think a period has come when we must cease to attempt to obtain harmony by continuing to sacrifice our opinions. I admit that the position has been ably stated by those who object to the motion on constitutional grounds, but I do not base my opposition to it wholly upon those grounds. As a layman I am not competent to express an opinion as to the exact interpretation which should be placed upon that section of the Constitution which governs the relations of the two Houses in regard to Money Bills, but the contention of the honorable and learned member for Indi, which is supported, strange to say, by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo who intends to take an exactly opposite course, appears to me to be the correct one. That the Senate may return a Bill with requests for amendment only once at any particular stage of its consideration, seems to me to be the correct interpretation of the Constitution, and I cannot understand the attitude of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, who, while he not only admits, but asserts that the view taken by the honorable and learned member for Indi is correct, tells us that he is prepared to make use of the ladder which the Government have provided to enable members of this House to climb down from an awkward position.

Mr. RONALD.—It is a matter of expediency.

Mr. WATSON.—It may be, but those who, like the honorable member for Bendigo, think that we shall get another opportunity to maintain the position which it is open to us to maintain now are very much mistaken. The Acting Prime Minister has told us that we shall be able to get the constitutional issue decided when dealing with the standing orders. Does he think that there will be enough vim behind any proposal in regard to the standing orders to cause honorable members to go to the country upon it? Will a difference of opinion in regard to the standing orders appeal to the great masses of the electors as a sufficient excuse for a contest between the two Houses? They will laugh at us for our pains, and probably elect other men in our places.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the honorable member anxious to go to the country?

Mr. WATSON.—No, but I am prepared to do so if necessary in support of my principles, as I and other members of the labour party did in New South Wales in 1895, in support of a measure introduced by a Government in which the honorable member held a portfolio, and after we had been only twelve months in Parliament. I am prepared to go to the country now rather than to concede to the representatives of minorities of the people equal power with us in regard to measures dealing with taxation. That is the whole point involved. The fact that the Senate is a House representing minorities may be cloaked by a reference to it as the States'

House, and to the State rights which are supposed to be entrusted to its keeping, but it still exists. Those who represent minorities of the taxpayers are asking for equal powers with this Chamber with regard to the imposition of taxation. I intend to oppose at every opportunity which presents itself the contention that they have a right to do so. I fought the issue in New South Wales at some risk of my own seat, but I am prepared to take the risk again in defence of the position now. The Acting Prime Minister said that the special circumstances in which we now find ourselves are not likely to be repeated. He has referred to the two-year period within which the Tariff has to be passed, and has stated that if we push matters to extremes we may exceed the limit. I do not know that, as a matter of practice, there is any great argument underlying this statement, because, whilst it is desirable from all points of view that the Tariff should be settled within two years, or even before the expiration of that time, what penalty can follow the non-observance of that particular condition?

Mr. DEAKIN.—None.

Mr. WATSON.—None at all. It seems to me, therefore, that whilst that provision should have weight with us—and I dare say it was considered by many of us during the past few months, when we endeavoured to secure reasonable compromises upon matters in respect of which we otherwise should not have yielded—it should not operate in our minds in comparison with the broad question whether this House or the other is to mould the taxation of the country. The honorable member for Wentworth said that the mere fact of our reception of the first Message from the Senate, and our consideration of it, item by item, deprived us of the opportunity of declining to receive the second Message. The honorable member argued that we had given away the whole case by accepting the first Message, but I differ from that view, because, as I understand it, we were constrained to receive that Message by the exact terms of the Constitution. There can be no possible doubt as to the interpretation of the section of the Constitution which provides that the Senate shall be entitled to make requests and forward them for consideration to this Chamber. Surely no one would argue that we should be justified in refusing to accept the first set of requests, and I do not see that the action we took in any way prejudiced the position that some of us now desire to take up. I believe that in regard to finances especially, and generally speaking in regard to the conduct of the affairs of this Commonwealth, it is not possible to carry on responsible Government with two Houses of anything like equal power. One House must be predominant; otherwise responsible Government is impossible, and as I have to choose, as the country will eventually have to do, between the two Houses, I prefer to throw in my own lot with the Chamber which represents the people in their numerical strength and taxable capacity rather than with the other House, which is said to represent the people in other aspects of national affairs. A great deal has been made of the State House aspect of this question, but I would ask honorable members what evidence there is that the members of the Senate have not been actuated by exactly the same considerations as have the members of this Chamber in the discussion of the Tariff? There is no indication that each delegation has acted conjointly on behalf of its own particular State. There has been no question, so far as I have been able to ascertain, of any State action. Each member has been guided purely by his own convictions with regard to the incidence of taxation, or by the objections which he has entertained towards certain proposals.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I stated that the Senate had acted in its capacity as a second Chamber, and not as a House representing the States.

Mr. WATSON.—I am sorry I misunderstood the honorable member. If we dismiss the question of the representation of the States in the Senate, we have to confine our attention to the point whether the Senate, as a second Chamber, is entitled to prevent the passing of a measure which the whole community has asked for, or to insist that if it is passed, it shall be in the shape desired by them, and not as framed by this House representing the people as a whole. I do not wish to labour this question, because I think it has been very ably argued by other honorable members, particularly from the legal aspect. I have for years taken the stand that there can be only one Chamber to exercise effective control over the affairs of the Commonwealth, and that, whilst for advisory purposes and in order to insure that every consideration shall be given to legislative proposals before they become law—even from that point of view there may be more justification for the view taken by those on the other side—I cannot consent on an occasion of this kind to any steps being taken which would admit the equal right of the other Chamber, particularly in matters of taxation, to control the affairs of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—Like the honorable member for Bland, I feel that this question has been well debated from the legal aspect by those who have preceded me. As a lay member of the House, however, I feel very greatly obliged to the honorable member for having brought the matter down from the somewhat lofty position it occupied to the level of practical politics. The Constitution provides for certain methods by which the expressed will of the people shall be crystallized into statute law. It was provided that there should be two Houses, and that in matters relating to taxation one House should have the sole right of origination, and that the other House should be limited with regard to the manner in which it should deal with such measures, compared with laws affecting other matters. The members of the other Chamber have privileges that we do not enjoy. For instance, they have a longer tenure of office; a tenure twice as long as that conferred on members of this House. That at once disposes of any claim that might be put forward for equal power on the part of the other Chamber with regard to Money Bills. It shows that those who drafted the Constitution, and recommended it to the people, and those who accepted it were fully aware of the vital difference between the powers of the two Houses. The other Chamber has the right to make requests with regard to Money Bills, but the power to insist upon such requests is one that cannot be held to exist. The Senate may have the right to insist upon its requests, but I do not know that any honorable member will assert that that Chamber has made amendments in this Bill. It has been stated in that Chamber that the Senate has “made amendments,” and that it has “fixed the rate of duty,” but we do not admit that. The Constitution provides for the making of requests by the Senate, and for their reception by this Chamber, but it does not provide for a second message similar in character to that first sent to us. At page 671 of the Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, compiled by Messrs. Quick and Garran, the following passage occurs:—

If that House (the House of Representatives) declines to make the suggested amendment, the Senate is face to face with the responsibility of either passing the Bill as it stands or rejecting it as it stands. It cannot shelve that responsibility by insisting upon its suggestion, because there is nothing on which to insist. A House which can make an amendment can insist on the amendment which it has made, but a House which can only "request" the other House to make amendments cannot insist upon anything. If its request is not complied with, it can reject the Bill or shelve it; but it must take the full responsibility of its action.

I understand that the honorable and learned member for Bendigo does not agree with this authority.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Yes, I do. The honorable member could not have followed my remarks.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable and learned member told us, as I understand, that the Senate could repeat its requests.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No.

Mr. SALMON.—I understood him to say that the Senate had a right at a further stage to make requests similar to those preferred in the first instance.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No, I said that they had a right to make a request a second time at the same stage.

Mr. SALMON.—The Senate has taken up the strong position which one of the ablest critics of the Constitution Bill, Sir Samuel Griffith, foretold. He said—and the remark is noted at page 671 of the work which I have just quoted—

A strong Senate will compel attention to its suggestions; a weak one would not insist upon its amendments.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member must add to that, "if you have a weak House of Representatives."

Mr. SALMON.—That statement of Sir Samuel Griffith afforded the first indication of what might happen. During the last few weeks attempts have been made to induce the Senate to insist upon its requests.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Sir Samuel Griffith went on to say that he did not see much constitutional difference between the power of request and the power of amendment.

Mr. SALMON.—Yes, and by his remarks upon that portion of the Constitution, Sir Samuel Griffith showed his utter unfitness for the position of Chief Justice of the Commonwealth, which some people would like to push him into. I would ask honorable members not to throw away the rights and privileges which this House possesses under the Constitution. I was deeply pained when I heard the Attorney-General read his motion. I have given more thought to this question than to any other that has occurred during the nine years I have been in public life, and it was with a feeling of grave disappointment that I found the Acting Prime Minister departing, for the first time to my knowledge, from the principles which he has so valorously upheld in the past, and his stout advocacy of which has endeared him to the democracy of his native State. I feel that we are now about to take a step which we shall never be able to retrace. I do not believe that we can save the situation by consenting to this renunciation of the highest rights and privileges we enjoy. There is no comparison between the strength behind this House and that behind the Senate. Undoubtedly the balance of power rests with the House of Representatives, and a step which would deprive us of our strength would not only be deplorable, but should, even at this late moment, be prevented. I only wish that I could give adequate expression to my feelings regarding this matter. I view the motion as a step in the wrong direction, and I fear that if it be carried we shall, in the near future, deeply regret our action.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—The honorable and learned member for Bendigo has already pointed out, in his really patriotic speech—a speech imbued with a truly federal sentiment—that the action proposed by the Government upon the present occasion, can scarcely be regarded as a precedent. I go beyond that, and say that nothing we can do in this matter can amount to a precedent, because there can be no such thing as precedents between the two Houses. Our behaviour in relation to one another, if it is not prescribed by the Constitution, must be determined by the exigencies of each particular occasion. I cannot see how any action taken by us on one occasion can be said to constitute a precedent which is applicable to an altogether different set of circumstances. We cannot establish a precedent which will cut down any rights vested in this House by the Constitution. But any danger in that respect has been removed by the terms of the resolution, which is couched in statesmanlike phraseology, and which declares that our action on this occasion must not be interpreted as a precedent. What is the issue really involved? The Senate has a second time sent down a number of requests. Now is not the very object of giving the other Chamber the right to make requests in cases in which it has not the power to amend, and might be compelled to exercise the extreme power of rejection, that suggestions, with a view to compromise and the avoidance of a crisis, may be made to the House of Representatives? If the other Chamber says—"Instead of exercising our power to reject the Bill, we wish again to appeal to the House of Representatives," surely it cannot be accused of attempting to curtail our rights. When the Senate admits our exclusive power to amend Money Bills, by requesting us to make certain amendments in the Tariff, I hold that by repeating its requests it does not curtail our privileges.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not the point.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Senate has merely asked this House a second time to exercise its exclusive prerogative to amend a Money Bill.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Can it do so constitutionally?

Mr. GLYNN.—Undoubtedly it can. The fact that it is not expressly stated in the Constitution that the Senate cannot repeat its requests does not necessarily imply that it can send down those requests once only. In law, the power to do a thing, in the absence of an express limitation, includes the power to do it from time to time, as occasion requires.

Mr. HUME COOK.—But under the Constitution that power is governed by the words "at any stage."

Mr. GLYNN.—I cannot see that the Senate, by repeating its requests, in any way negatives or cuts down a power which is acknowledged by the Constitution to be exclusively vested in this House. I do not believe that the other Chamber has, or ought to have, equal powers with the House of Representatives in regard to Money Bills. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo clearly explained that in referring to paragraph 3 of section 54 of the Constitution, which states—

The House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make any of such omissions or amendments, with or without modifications.

Mr. ISAACS.—According to the procedure which is being adopted, we must make the amendments.

Mr. GLYNN.—Does the honorable and learned member mean to say that the repetition of a request allays the machinery of the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS.—It becomes a demand.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Senate has not rejected the Customs Tariff Bill. The period of three months which has to run in the event of a disagreement between the two Houses dates only from the time when the Senate rejects or fails to pass the Bill. Does the repetition of a request postpone the running of that three months' period?

Mr. ISAACS.—No.

Mr. GLYNN.—It does not cut down our acknowledged powers, neither does it allay the machinery of the Constitution, and, therefore, I fail to see how a repetition of certain requests curtails the undoubted rights of the House of Representatives in regard to Money Bills. But the true key to this matter—as was mentioned by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo—is to be found in the provision which declares that the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make the amendments requested. That is an acknowledgment in express terms of the exclusive right of this House to make amendments in Money Bills. I would further point out that a request cannot be referred to a joint sitting of the Houses. That is clear from section 57, sub-section (3), which states—

The members present at the joint sitting may deliberate and shall vote together upon the proposed law as last proposed by the House of Representatives, and upon amendments, if any, which have been made therein by one House and not agreed to by the other . . . &c.

No provision is made for a joint sitting of the Houses in regard to requested amendments. The very fact that in the final issue those requests cannot be referred to a joint sitting indicates that they are less potent than are amendments.

Mr. ISAACS.—What is the meaning of the word "suggested" in the provision relating to the joint sitting?

Mr. GLYNN.—That word is used only in the first part of the section, and it refers to requests which have been adopted by the House of Representatives and embodied in a Bill. Those requests then become part of that Bill, which can be a second time passed by the House of Representatives. But if there be a balance of requests which had not been adopted as amendments by the House of Representatives, those requests disappear and cannot be referred to the joint sitting. Really, therefore, the position is that any Bill referred to a joint sitting must be in the form in which it was last amended by the House of Representatives. In that form, with reference to any requests, it must either be accepted or rejected. That, however, is not the case with amendments within the power of either House to make, and which lead to a dead-lock. They can be discussed one by one, and either accepted or rejected. Clearly, therefore, it was never intended by the framers of the Constitution that requests should have equal potency with amendments in Money Bills. By agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Attorney General, we are not curtailing our privileges in any way whatever. In this connexion, perhaps, I may be permitted to refer to the only case in the nature of a precedent which can possibly guide us. The provisions in the Constitution for the cure of deadlocks were taken from an agreement between the two Houses in 1857, and the South Australian Constitution Act of 1881, and it is strange that the procedure adopted by the Houses of that State, which is regulated by joint standing orders, expressly provides which the Commonwealth Constitution does not, that after the requests of the Legislative Council have been considered by the House of Assembly and returned to the Legislative Council, the power of requesting amendments is at an end. But the legislature does not act upon that provision. It takes a more statesmanlike view of the situation. In the debates which took place upon the Tariff Bill in 1887, the point was raised whether the House of Assembly should regard the requests of the Legislative Council as amendments, whether they could be modified and returned to the Legislative Council, and whether the latter could again return them either with or without modifications to the Assembly. The standing orders of that State provide that after the requests of the Legislative Council have been considered and the Bill has been returned to that Chamber, it shall either be assented to or rejected in the form in which it was passed by the House of Assembly. Parliament, however, does not act upon that provision. It takes a wider view of the situation, and one which is marked by a spirit of compromise. The very object of the provision is to bring about a compromise by appealing a second, and, if necessary, a third time to the House in which the dominant power is vested.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Does the South Australian Parliament violate its own standing orders?

Mr. GLYNN.—No; because it is the master of its own procedure. When objection was taken to the adoption of the course I have indicated in connexion with the Tariff, the House of Assembly allowed the Legislative Council to make further requests, stating, however, that such action must not be regarded as a precedent. That is exactly the position in which honorable members find themselves to-day under the proposal of the Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—But the South Australian Constitution gave the Legislative Council the unfettered power of amendment.

Mr. GLYNN.—It enabled standing orders to be passed to regulate the procedure between the two Houses, and as long as those standing orders are in existence they have equal potency with the Constitution itself.

Mr. ISAACS.—No, the House may disregard a standing order.

Mr. GLYNN.—The difference is simply in the power of rescission. On the analogy of South Australia, the course proposed by the Attorney-General should be adopted. But I would further point out that requests made by the Legislative Council have been considered and amended a second and even a third time at the instance of that Chamber.

Mr. ISAACS.—There is a different Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN.—The only difference is that the prescription in one case is by the resolution of the two Houses, and in the other by the Constitution itself. The honorable member would, I suppose, on the same principle hold that a by-law is not of equal obligation with the Act under which the by-law is made; but so long as a by-law is passed under the power given by the Act, it is of equal obligation with the Act. The instances in which requests have been made by the Legislative Council of South Australia in connexion with Money Bills begin with a Loan Bill in 1874. I shall not mention every occasion, but come to that of the Payment of Members Bill in 1887. In that case the requests, when they were first considered by the Legislative Assembly, were sent back with reasons for disagreeing to them. The Legislative Council considered the message, and the requests came back to the Legislative Assembly in some cases with modification.

Mr. ISAACS.—What have we to do with this?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not wish to take up time, because, really, we are raising an issue which does not properly belong to the occasion. But these requests were sent back a second time; and I could follow the matter out, and show that they went back again, and were finally adopted, with some modifications suggested by the Legislative Council. The honorable and learned member for Indi practically suggests that the whole of our liberties, which we inherit under the British Constitution, so far as they are applicable to Australia, will be imperilled by our allowing the Senate to repeat requests in a modified form. But at whose suggestion are the requests repeated? At the suggestion of the very House whose liberties the honorable and learned member wishes to protect. The House of Representatives sent back the requests in a modified form, and declared they had agreed to the modifications made. At our instance, and at our invitation, the requests were sent to us, as we amended them—for what purpose? To reject them? Why was the honorable and learned member silent when we modified the requests, and sent them back for the acceptance of the Senate, and repetition, as altered? I cannot see that the Senate, in making a request the second time in a modified form at our invitation, is imperilling the great wealth of liberty we enjoy under the British Constitution. I am exceedingly glad Ministers have taken a statesmanlike stand on the matter, and that the acting leader of the Opposition thoroughly agrees with the temper in which the motion is proposed.

Mr. HUGHES (West Sydney).—I desire to say a few words on this matter; otherwise my action may be misconstrued. We have heard at considerable length very admirable dissertations upon the constitutional phase of the question. It is quite unnecessary for me, if I were able, to traverse the arguments; I need do no more than simply agree or disagree with them. We are asked by virtue of this motion to affirm that this is not the time to enter into a constitutional struggle, but that we shall write across the motion the words "without prejudice" and settle the items of the Tariff on their merits. First of all, I say that we cannot write "without prejudice" across such a motion. I quite agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who said that it would be impossible to refer this question to the committee on the joint standing orders, and expect the members of the committee to keep out of their minds the fact that on the first occasion when this House had an opportunity to defend its liberties or its privileges, it put that opportunity aside and deliberately accepted peace. If I thought for a moment that any of our privileges were in question, I should vote against the motion, but I firmly believe that the Senate is acting quite within its rights. I do not believe that any of the men in New South Wales who voted against the Bill, or half of those who voted for it, had any doubt in their mind that the Senate was to have, except as to mere quibbling of terms, exactly the same power as the House of Representatives in all matters. The honorable member for Wentworth described, during the referendum campaign, in colloquial terms the difference between a request and an amendment as the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee." We have heard some eloquent and learned dissertations upon the construction of clause 53. But how is it construed by the people of the country? Undeniably it was said by the leader of the Government, by the leader of the Opposition, and by the leaders of the federal party throughout Australia, that one of the essentials of federation was equal representation in the Senate, in order to safeguard the interests of the States as such, as opposed to the interests of the majority of the people as such. Is there any State interest more important than the financial interest? We have heard from the Treasurer and from the Minister for Trade and Customs—not once, but hundreds of times—that the solvency of the States is the crucial point in the Tariff. These Ministers say that we have entered into certain honorable and onerous obligations, and that they intend to meet those obligations. And no one denies that position. Are we to say that the Senate is to have the power only to make requests and asks us to accept them and no more? According to the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, if we "think fit" we may accept the requests, but if we do not "think fit," then the Senate is to be placed in exactly the same position as that occupied by the Legislative Council of a State Parliament. If any man had dared to stand up and tell the smaller States that the Senate had only such a power, the Constitution would never have been accepted. The smaller States were told that the Senate was to be a safeguard to them, and in the larger States—at any rate, in New South Wales—the chief objection to the Constitution was that the Senate had equal power with the House of Representatives, the only difference being in the form of words in which the power was expressed. Now, however, we hear that "at any stage" means that the same request can be made only once at any stage. I might, if I were inclined to quibble, ask what is "a stage." Is there a special meaning, or is the meaning that which all men commonly attach to the word? Is that not a stage in a Bill when one House receives a measure, deals with it, and sends it out of the House? If that be the meaning, then, according to what we have heard, the Senate has the power to request amendments at every stage. Whether that be so or not, the Senate, which is quite as well able as this House to determine its powers under the Constitution, has a perfect right to its opinions. Senators believe that the section means what two-thirds of the people in New South Wales believed it to mean—what the head of the Government and the head of the Opposition in their Sydney Town Hall speeches, and throughout Australia, told the people it meant—namely, that the Senate has actually the same powers as the House of Representatives. We have been told that there is a great difference between the power of request and the power of amendment. But the difference is merely in the manner in which the question is put from the chair; it is a verbal difference. It is contended that the strong, stable Senate, which was to safeguard the interests of the States, is to be reduced to the pitiable position of a humble suppliant, instead of occupying the position of a body of equal power. If that view be correct, then the Senate has no more power than has the Legislative Council of New South Wales. The Legislative Council can make suggestions—they cannot convey them by messages to the other House, it is true—on the floor of the House, and every honorable member of the other House who reads the newspapers knows that he has to accept those suggestions, or face the consequences of a total rejection of a measure. In 1894-5 the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales were not told by message in so many words what the Legislative Council wanted; but there was ringing in the ears of the members of the Lower House the fact that, unless they agreed to the suggestions made, they would have on their shoulders the responsibility of a rejection of the measure then under consideration. The Legislative Assembly took that responsibility, and asked the country to decide. Are we now to be told that the Senate has no more power than the Legislative Council? If that be so, then all the arguments for a second Chamber in a federation fall down helpless. There is no real reason for a bi-cameral system, or no reason why equal representation should be enshrined in the hearts of the federation, if the Senate is to have no more voice than a Legislative Council. But the Senate exists, so we are told, by virtue of a totally different principle. Whether the bi-cameral system be essential or not, if we consult Bryce, or any other constitutional authority, we see that the system is a constant attendant on federation. There are no instances which I can recall, in which the bi-cameral system has been departed from in modern times; and in nearly every system an approximation has been made to equal representation. We, in New South Wales, were told that without equal representation the smaller States would not enter federation, and the chief reason was financial. We are continually told that the smaller States must have money, and now it is sought to rob them of the right of saying what shall be the revenue of the country. It is true that the immediate question before us may be of small moment, but it might have represented millions or meant the difference between insolvency and entire bankruptcy in two or three of the States. Yet it is sought to take from the Senate all but the power of making one set of requests which we, as we "think fit," may accept or reject. If an appeal were made to the people on the point, I do not think there could be a doubt as to the result. I do not care whether or not an appeal is made. I, like many others, do not want one. The honorable member for Bland, who has taken rather an extraordinary attitude, says that he is prepared to go to the country and fight this matter out; but I am sure the honorable member could not do so consistently. He was one of those who, like myself, went up and down "like raging lions" telling the people that the Senate had this power, and begging and praying them, in consequence, to reject the Constitution. How could the honorable member go back to the country, and tell the people that the Constitution he begged them to reject is now to be modified, not in a constitutional manner by them, who made it, but because it suits his political purpose for the time being? I have explained my position, and the reason why I intend to vote for this motion. I think I have set down very clearly that in voting for it, I by no means admit that this House prejudices any of its privileges, now or hereafter. I have said, I think with sufficient emphasis, that the position of the Senate is, in my opinion, unassailable, under the Constitution as it now stands. I would only, in conclusion, remind those honorable members who take up another attitude so strongly, and who assert that the Constitution does not give the power to the Senate on this particular matter, that in the State of New South Wales, at any rate, the people were assured to the contrary by us, and by others, that they deliberately accepted this measure, and that it has to stand now until some provision is made under the Constitution for an amendment. I would remind those again who are prepared to accept the Constitution, and the power of the Senate with regard to all other matters than money matters without protest, that, under this Constitution, whether by their refusal to vote for this motion, or by any other means, an appeal could be made to the country, which would have the result of preventing the Senate insisting upon these particular amendments, by the return to this House or to the other House of a sufficiency of men pledged in a different direction, so far as the Tariff is concerned. That course or any similar one could have no effect upon the power of the Senate in respect to other measures, or indeed to this particular class of measures. What these gentlemen propose to do by their action is nothing more nor less than to make of this constitutional question a political one. It may serve for the time being party purposes, or political ends, but it can have no lasting effect, if any at all, upon the constitutional phase of the question. I say, for my part, that there is a way, which, while it is not simple and expeditious in its application, is yet the only one that may be taken, for the satisfaction of members of this House and of the country, and with certainty, and that is an appeal for an amendment of the Constitution. If this Constitution gives powers to another place which results in a power being given to a minority of the people equal to that given to the majority, that I say is an inherent defect of the Constitution, which can be remedied only by an appeal to the people under the provisions set down in the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I should like to bring the matter nearer to the concrete. The debate has taken a wide range, and the matter has been discussed with a due sense of the importance of the crisis.

Mr. WILKS.—But is there a crisis? That is the point.

Mr. HIGGINS.—After all, what has happened is that we have declined to accept certain requests of the Senate, and that the Senate has again sent a Message to us which states that it again requests this House to make the amendments originally requested. The essence of the question is that they are making the same requests a second time. It is a very different thing for a House to have the power to make the same requests a second time, or for the same House to have to forge or devise a new request which it would have to justify to the country, explaining why it did not make the request before. But the power to renew the same request a second time, a third time, and ad infinitum, is a very much graver power than the power to make a new request which did not occur to the Senate in the first instance. The Government proposal is—

That having regard to the fact that the public welfare demands the early enactment of a Federal Tariff, and pending the adoption of joint standing orders, this House refrains from the determination of its constitutional rights and obligations in respect of this Message, and resolves to receive and consider it forthwith.

That proposal will be officially known only to ourselves. That resolution is not to be communicated to the other House, as by way of protest, and all that the other House will see will be that they have again requested some alterations, perhaps I should not say amendments, and that we have dealt with their repeated requests. If the motion proposed by the Government is carried, I should suggest that, to have any weight whatever, this protest ought to be incorporated with any Message which we send. There is nothing in the standing orders to prevent that, and if one man or one body protests to another man or another body, the proper way is to express the protest. I hope Ministers from their own point of view, if they desire to keep alive the protest, will incorporate with it the Message which we shall send. Of course, there is a difficulty as to the interpretation of this section of the Constitution. There are several means of explaining it, but I desire to remind the House that this is a matter which no High Court or any other court can settle. It is a matter which will be settled by the practice of the House, and the first step is therefore the most important step. I say it is idle to assure the House that this will never recur. What we know perfectly well is that when there is any measure upon which there is a difference of opinion, the Senate will exercise the same power again, and the experience of the two Houses of the United States is that the Senate always, as in this case, though it has not the power of originating Money Bills, Appropriation Bills, or Ways and Means Bills, keeps them strung on until the end of the session, and then it says to the House of Representatives—“You must accept our amendments or you will have no means of carrying on the government of the country.”

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Hear, hear; it bullies the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It bullies the House of Representatives, that is quite true; and every constitutional authority admits that although the other House originates the measures, the Senate has superior weight in money matters.

Mr. GLYNN.—It can be dissolved.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Ministers can dissolve this House, but they cannot dissolve the other House unless there is a double dissolution, which would only occur once in a “blue moon.” There is power to dissolve this House, but not power to dissolve the other House. I say it is an unhealthy state of politics that we have to face a position in which no less than two-thirds of the Senate represent less than one-third of the population of Australia, and that half of the Senate represent less than a fourth of the population of Australia.

Mr. WILKS.—That is a weakness of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is a weakness of the Constitution.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It was pointed out at the time of the referendum, but a great many supporters of the Bill contended that there was no danger.

Mr. HIGGINS.—After all, Government is finance, and finance is Government, in some respects. We have this state of affairs—that one-third of the taxes goes with two-thirds of the power to spend taxes. What I mean is, that in that House, if honorable members will take it that taxes are pretty evenly contributed according to population, we shall find that those people who contribute only one-third of the taxation have a House in which they control two-thirds of the members. Of course the result will be very nice when we come to try to adjust finances, and when the men, who will be voting for the appropriation of public money, feel that the burden will fall chiefly upon the people represented by a minority of the members of the Senate. I must say that on this matter I have felt in a curious position. I have felt some grim amusement with regard to it. I feel that a prophecy of mine is coming true much more quickly than I expected.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We quoted the honorable and learned member very often in New South Wales upon this point.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I must say that I did not expect to see so quick a fulfilment of my prophecy, and I did not think that so quickly the Senate would be able to show its superior financial power. Of course, I urged throughout that there was no practical difference in the result between requests and amendments. I still adhere to that view, and I think it is practically proved that we were right in urging that there was no substantial difference. It is not so with regard to the representations made by those who advocated the Bill. I find, for instance, that the right honorable member for East Sydney, who advocated the Bill so strongly, and to whose advocacy I apprehend the passing of the Bill in New South Wales was due, said at Bathurst—

The House of Representatives would be the House that would shape every line of the Tariff—

It does not look like it.

that would shape every item on the annual Appropriation Bill. It would hold the Ministry in the hollow of its hand, and would control the Executive power of the Commonwealth from day to day. If the Senate passed a vote of censure, nobody would be any the worse. If the House of Representatives passed a vote of censure, the Ministry it destroyed would have to apply to the people to decide.

Mr. THOMAS.—Was that his "Yes" speech or his "No" speech.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That was the voice heard at Bathurst, when the federal capital was looming ahead. With respect to the words "at any stage" in the section of the Constitution referred to, I am told that honorable members have been reminded that I moved in the Convention that these words should be struck out, upon the ground that they would lead to this confusion. The leader of the Convention, the present Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, admitted that the Senate might make new requests from stage to stage. I felt the danger of it, and I moved the omission of those words, but I got no support from my honorable friends here and there, who now point out the enormity of what is being done. At the referendum in Victoria and in New South Wales I was frequently confronted with the statement that the Senate would be able to make only requests, and that if we did not accept them, we should put the responsibility upon them. It is admitted that the whole object of this section was to compel the Senate to take the alternative of the acceptance or rejection of a Bill, and to prevent them from stringing the matter on for an inordinate length of time. Now that object is to be defeated because they may not only make new requests, but prefer the same requests a second, third, or fourth time. Moreover, they may put upon this House the responsibility of accepting or rejecting the Bill. That was not the intention of the Constitution, but there is no doubt a good deal of ground for the contention that the words "at any stage" mean that the Senate may make new requests. That was debatable ground. By their action in this case the Senate have not only occupied that debatable ground between the two Houses, but they have advanced into the distinct territory of this Chamber, and have imported into the practice of the two Houses the right of repeating requests. It does not require a legally trained mind to see that there is nothing whatever in this section of the Constitution to give the Senate the right to repeat a request. It is stated that the Senate may, "at any stage," make a request, and that we may accept or reject it, or accept it with modifications. It has often been said that the South Australian practice affords justification for this provision. I think some honorable members from South Australia are inclined to look with favour on what is being done, not only because it would favour their fiscal views, but because of the fact that they have an arrangement of long standing between the two branches of the State Legislature. The arrangement there, however, is very different from that which is here provided for. There, only one request can be made, and then a Bill must be either accepted or rejected. The compact reads as follows:—

That it shall be competent to the Council to suggest any alterations in any such Bill (except that portion of the Appropriation Bill that provides for the ordinary annual expenses of the Government), and in case of such suggestions not being agreed to by the House of Assembly such Bills may be returned by the House of Assembly to this Council for reconsideration; in which case the Bill shall either be assented to or rejected by this Council as originally passed by the House of Assembly.

There is a perfectly clear provision that if the one request is not assented to the Council shall face the necessity of accepting or rejecting the measure. That is the agreement which was introduced to our notice at the Convention by Sir Richard Baker. I know that it is not in order to refer to what has taken place in another Chamber, but fortunately we have distributed amongst us copies of the journals of the Senate, and I may be permitted to say that the form in which the Message now comes to us from the Senate is due to a mistake in the way in which the Government submitted our resolutions to the Senate. In each case the question was put—"That the Senate do not press its request." The result was that each particular request was dealt with on its merits. If the Government had strictly followed the Constitution, and had simply stated that the House of Representatives had dealt with the requests of the Senate, and that it was for the Senate to accept or reject the Bill, or to make new requests, the burden of responsibility would have been on the majority in the Senate who oppose the Government, to make new requests or to reject or accept the Bill. I know to my sorrow that a matter of this kind is not one to arouse any direct enthusiasm or excitement. There is a tendency to look at the immediate results and not at the final consequences. I know also that a number of members who regard it as of the utmost importance to reduce duties from 15 per cent. to 10 or 12½ per cent., consider that it would be better to help the Senate on this occasion, without regard to the fact that the tables may some day be turned upon themselves, and that their majority in this House may be thwarted by a hostile majority in the Senate. There is a tendency to take a narrow view of the immediate exigencies of the Tariff discussion; and I am sorry to say this, because the issue before us is one which transcends the Tariff in all its phases. No doubt, the Tariff is exceedingly important; but it does not compare in that regard with the issue with which we are now called upon to deal. The matter is one affecting the rights of the people of Australia to direct, by their majorities, the policy of the country on all national subjects. The effect of the section of the Constitution to which we have been referring, as it stands, would be accentuated by the course now proposed by the Government, and we should shift the centre of gravity under the Constitution from its proper place—the majority—to the minority of the people. We might have two progressive Houses, but this device would effectually prevent the progressive forces from having their way if the reactionary forces could only manage to get the majorities grouped in such fashion that one would fight the other. All that the reactionaries would have to do would be to divide the opposing forces, and conquer them. I can see plainly that we shall remove the political power from the physical force of numbers, and that is always a danger, because the political power should rest with the preponderating physical power—the majority in every case.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member pointed that out when he was opposing federation three years ago.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am afraid that I may be repeating myself, but I may be pardoned, because I feel just as strongly now as I did then. The provision in section 53 is one of the devices by which the reactionary forces could circumvent the progressive forces. All that they would have to do would be to work up a quarrel between the people grouped behind different members. We created a so-called States House for the protection of the minor States against the larger members of the union, but this is not an issue as between one set of States and another. The divergences of opinion have been very much the same all through, and the greatest State—New South Wales—has returned the largest majority of revenue tariffists to the Senate. This shows clearly that there was no need for any States House for the purpose of protecting the smaller States against the others. As matters have worked out, an honorable member from Western Australia really possesses eight times the influence that a member from New South Wales can exercise.

Mr. MAHON.—Is not that one of the reasons why Western Australia joined the federation?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No. So far as I am able to judge the question at the federal elections in Western Australia was one between the farmers on the one side, and the miners on the other, and I do not think that federation was discussed in that State on the same lines as in the eastern States. I regret that the Government could not see its way at this stage to respectfully send word to the Senate that there was nothing in the Constitution which would justify their repeating the requests made in the first instance. Then if there were any difference of opinion with regard to the powers of the Senate, that would be the proper time at which to discuss the constitutional question. The time has not yet arrived for compromise, but it is for us now to assert our rights. The first time our rights come into question was when this message was received by us, and it is at this stage that we should say that the Senate has no power to repeat its original requests. It is not for me to presume to say how the Senate would deal with the Bill under such conditions, but there might eventually be some proposal for a compromise.

Mr. GLYNN.—How could there be any compromise after we had adopted the course suggested by the honorable and learned member?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Surely the honorable and learned member can see that a compromise might be arranged.

Mr. GLYNN.—Not unless we begin de novo.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have in my mind several means by which a compromise could be effected, but I will not presume to dictate to the Senate on that point. The honorable member, with his experience of Parliament, must see how it could be done. Our present duty is to assert our rights, and, having asserted them, to let events take their course; but I am very much afraid that the weak and flabby resolution proposed by the Government will be passed. It is my intention to vote against it as it stands, because I do not regard this as the time at which we should make any such statement. We ought not to give up the fort before we have intimated to the Senate that we hold it. At the same time, I ask the Attorney-General, upon whose shoulders a very grave responsibility rests, if he will allow the following words to be added to the motion:—"And that this resolution be included in any Message sent to the Senate"?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Would that remove the honorable and learned member's objection to it?

Mr. HIGGINS.—To a large extent it would. My opinion, is that in order to effectually enter a protest we must express it.

Mr. SAWERS (New England).—Such a strong and almost unanimous feeling has been expressed against the right of the Senate to transmit to this House a second Message requesting amendments in the Tariff, that it appears to me that, if the Attorney-General had not submitted a motion of this character, we should now be involved in a very serious crisis. Even the honorable gentleman indicated—and I suppose he speaks for his colleagues as well—that he does not indorse the claim put forward by the Senate.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not admit anything at present.

Mr. SAWERS.—The honorable gentleman has evaded the position by tabling what is a very justifiable and prudent motion, in view of the tremendous issues at stake. The honorable member for Bland, the honorable member for Indi, the honorable member for Bendigo, and several other influential members, have taken up a very strong attitude against the claim of the Senate. The leader of the labour party and the honorable member for Laanecoorie declared that for years they had fought for the rights of the popular House in the State Legislature, but I venture to submit that the old disputes between Legislative Assemblies and Legislative Councils in the different States have no bearing whatever upon this question. We are confined to the four corners of the Constitution itself. I quite admit that that Constitution may be differently interpreted by conscientious and able men. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo was very forcible in denouncing the claim of the Senate to make a second series of requests, and the honorable and learned member for Indi took up a similar position. After listening to their speeches, it appears to me that the whole question is dependent upon the interpretation of the final paragraph of section 53 of the Constitution, which states that—

The Senate may, at any stage, return to the House of Representatives any proposed law which the Senate may not amend, requesting, by Message, the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein.

The whole position, apparently, turns on the definition of the words, "at any stage." I hold that this is not the same stage that the Bill had reached when it last claimed our attention. What are the stages of a Bill? To my mind, there are the first reading, the second reading, committee, and the third reading stages. What will constitute another stage?

Mr. ISAACS.—A different step in regard to the Bill.

Mr. SAWERS.—I ask the honorable and learned member whether he considers that before the Senate can return the Bill a second time, it should agree to its third reading. Let us assume that the Senate requests this House to make 50 amendments, and that we agree to accept half of them, either with or without modifications. The measure is then returned to the Senate, which considers our amendments, and sends it back with further requests. In such circumstances, I maintain that it is strictly constitutional for this House to consider those requests. I admit that finality must be reached sooner or later. If this House were to refuse all the requests contained in the Message from the other Chamber, finality would be reached. But if we agree to half the requested amendments, the Senate is still in a position to send down further modified requests. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has referred to the fact that in the Convention he moved to omit the words "at any stage." He asked what was their meaning, whereupon Sir Edmund Barton said—

As I understand it, the proposal is that the Senate may, at any stage of the passage of a proposed law through the Senate, return the Bill to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the amendment or omission of any items or provisions therefrom.

Mr. KINGSTON.—As long as the Senate has possession of the Bill?

Mr. BARTON.—Yes, as long as the Bill is in the hands of the Senate. That means, I take it, a power not solely to send a Bill down at a stage at which the measure has, at the moment, arrived at, but that if it arrives at a further stage in the Senate, there being in the meantime some settlement or no settlement with regard to the suggestion made, that the Senate would have power to make other suggestions.

The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne spoke of the requests which are now before us as "the same old requests." I submit that "they are not the "same old requests." This House accepted a certain number of the original requests of the Senate, and sent a Message to it to that effect. The other Chamber has withdrawn some of those requests and has modified others. They cannot, therefore, be the same requests. Without quoting further from the Convention debates, I may mention that the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was rejected without division. Evidently, therefore, the Convention had no wish to deny to the Senate the power of sending down a second Message. I venture to say that the majority of the people of Australia would interpret section 53 of the Constitution in the common-sense way that I have interpreted it. I decline to allow my judgment to be warped by the fine distinctions which have been drawn by some members of the legal profession. It is an unfortunate circumstance that the opinions of legal gentlemen very rarely agree. I will undertake to say that in the other Chamber just as eminent members of the legal profession as have addressed the House to-day will be found arguing this question from quite an opposite stand-point. When lawyers differ, the layman must adopt what appears to him to be a common-sense view. My opinion in regard to this matter is strengthened by the knowledge that this question constituted one of the great snags in the way of federation when the referendum was taken in New South Wales. The question of equal States rights was bitterly fought, and it was carried in the affirmative on the clear understanding that the power of suggestion should be given to the Senate. All we can do now is to stick to the bargain. If we are dissatisfied, we ought to obtain an amendment of the Constitution, but so long as the Constitution, for good or evil, remains as it is, I shall be faithful to it. I regret that the Government have found it necessary to come down with this motion. I am disappointed they could not see their way to simply move the House into committee to consider the message, thus acknowledging at once that the power of making further requests had been given to the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have received the following amendment from the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, which he claims to have moved at the conclusion of his speech just now—

That the motion be amended by the addition of the following words:—"And that this resolution be incorporated with the Message to be sent to the Senate."

I did not understand the honorable and learned member to move that amendment. If I had so understood him, I should have pointed out that it anticipates a stage which will arise later on, when it will be necessary to move that a certain Message be sent to the Senate. When that Message is moved it will be competent to move the amendment, but that stage cannot be anticipated, and, therefore, I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS (Barrier). — I listened with a good deal of interest but a certain amount of amazement to the speech of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. With much of what the honorable and learned member said I am heartily in accord, though those portions with which I agree are out of place to-day. The honorable and learned member told us that he does not see the necessity for the Senate, and that it was not wise to provide in the Constitution for a second Chamber. In that I absolutely agree; but it is not the question we are now discussing. What we have now to consider is whether the Senate has the right to send down requests once, twice, or thrice—whether the Government are right in submitting the motion, and whether we should discuss the requests which have come to us for a second time? In a book entitled The Australian Commonwealth Bill, and consisting of essays and addresses by Mr. H. B. Higgins, who, I suppose, is the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, we find the following:—

In this Bill (section 53) you will find words to the effect that the Senate may not amend the principal Money Bills—Bills imposing taxation and Bills appropriating revenue for the "ordinary annual services of the Government." But if you look a little further on, you will find that the Senate can "request" amendments, and can keep on "requesting" as often as it likes. The Senate can send down "requests" at any stage. I say there is no material difference between the Senate proposing amendments to the House, and requesting amendments to the House.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I say so still.

Mr. THOMAS.—The honorable and learned member said something very different just now. The extract continues—

Calling it a different name does not alter the true nature of the thing.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the honorable member understand the difference between repeating the same request, and making requests ad infinitum?

Mr. THOMAS.—That is rather a quibble, I think. These addresses were made when the honorable and learned member was, like myself, opposing the Constitution Bill. The reason I opposed the Bill was that I believed the Senate had the right to the power which is now claimed, and it was a keen disappointment to me that the democracy of Australia should accept a Constitution giving them such a power. I voted against the Constitution Bill on two occasions, and in doing so imperilled my seat in a State Parliament as the representative of a border city, the population of which consisted mainly of South Australians and Victorians. The address proceeds—

But as if we had not enough difficulties already to face, this Bill throws an apple of perpetual discord between the two Houses. This precious distinction between "requests" and "amendments" will lead to continual friction between the two Houses in Appropriation Bills.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I say so still.

Mr. THOMAS.—Then I wish the honorable and learned member had stuck to those sentiments just now. The book also contains three articles, contributed in 1898 by the honorable and learned member to the Sydney Daily Telegraph, from which I take this sentence—

The Senate can "request" amendments at any stage—not once, but as often as it likes.

It seems very peculiar that the honorable and learned member should, when opposing the Bill, make such statements, and then come here and say that the Government ought to take a different course.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have not changed my ground one inch. I say that the Senate can make new requests, but cannot repeat requests.

Mr. THOMAS.—No doubt there is a great deal of difference between speaking before an ordinary crowd, and before Judges of the bench, where hair-splitting may be indulged in.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no hair-splitting in saying that there is a difference between an old hat and a new one.

Mr. THOMAS.—If the Senate has no right to make a request more than once, then a large number of us unwittingly misled the people of New South Wales; but we did so on the authority of eminent lawyers, such as the honorable and learned member. If the case be as stated, it appears to me there ought to be no question about carrying the motion. Indeed it ought not to be necessary for the Government to submit the motion; the procedure ought to follow as a matter of course. What did the smaller States believe, or think this part of the Constitution means? We must discuss this matter not only from the stand-point of the bigger States, but also from the stand-point of the smaller States. I have here an extract from an article in the Adelaide Advertiser, which says—

That the States in this Chamber should be equally represented is a principle not likely to be seriously contested at the Convention, but there is a distinct risk of refusal by the more populous colonies to admit the principle of equality in respect of the powers of the two Houses. As to that we cannot budge. If even we had to compromise to the extent of making the Federal Executive responsible only to the population Chamber—a point which Sir John Downer is altogether unwilling to concede—at any rate we could not stretch complaisance so far, nor imperil State rights so deeply, as to submit to an inferior legislative status for the Senate. We must have the substance; we cannot except the shadow. Dr. Quick, speaking at Bendigo the other day, said there should be one exception to the law of equal power in Federal Houses—that the Council of the States should not have the right to initiate or amend money Bills. Dr. Quick is the real author of the present movement, and his recent speech was in almost all respects liberal and statesmanlike. But on this question, as the Argus shows him, he has gone fatally astray. The refusal of equality in finance upsets the principle altogether. The most important measures which will come before the Council will be Money Bills, and if State rights are not to be recognised in respect of these, the recognition in other respects will be of little or no value.

Mr. ISAACS.—What date was that?

Mr. THOMAS.—In 1897, before the Convention.

Mr. ISAACS.—How can that throw any light on what the Convention did afterwards?

Mr. THOMAS.—I am endeavouring to show what the smaller States wanted. Most of us who opposed federation did so because we strongly believed there ought to be only one Federal House, but we were told again and again that there was no chance of federation without a second Chamber—that the smaller States would not join the union unless States rights were thus guaranteed. The leading newspapers in the smaller States accepted the Bill, and they would not have done so unless they were satisfied that to all intents and purposes they had got what they wanted in this respect. It would be unfair to ask the smaller States to come in on the basis of equal representation, and then afterwards get half-a-dozen lawyers to find out that that advantage had not been conferred. I was prepared to wait for federation for a good many years rather than give up the principle of one Chamber, and had it depended on my vote there would have been no federation under the present Constitution. But the Constitution was carried by the democracy of Australia, at a referendum based on the most liberal franchise, and it is now our duty, as far as possible, to carry that Constitution into effect. I do not speak as a South Australian, but I may say that whilst the Constitution Bill was before the people, it was necessary for me, as one of the State representatives of Broken Hill, to frequently pass through Adelaide, in my journeyings between my constituency and Sydney. All those I came across then were of opinion that the Senate had, practically, equal rights with the House of Representatives in matters of finance. We have given them the shadow and taken away from them the substance if it is now found to be otherwise. So to-day it is not with me a matter of free-trade or protection. I am not particularly bothered about whether certain duties should be 15 or 10 per cent. I think there is something in fighting upon the question whether there should be no duty or a duty of 15 per cent. It might be worth while to take one's jacket off over that. But whether the duty should be 15 or 10 or 12½ per cent. or 7 or 8, instead of 9 or 10 per cent., is not a matter which I personally would be prepared to break my neck over. I say that supposing that this House had passed the Tariff on lines of free-trade, and the Senate had modified and altered it to such an extent as to make it a protectionist Tariff, I would still hold that we must receive again and again their Message; but I would probably after receiving their requests vote against them. We are bound by the Constitution, as it was interpreted by the people of Australia who accepted it, to pass the motion submitted by the Ministry, and to deal with the requests of the Senate as they come before us. As I said just now, I am against the Senate. I should be delighted at any time if a responsible Government or any one else started a movement to do away with the Senate altogether, upon the legitimate lines for its amendment laid down in the Constitution, to give a vote at any time to do away with the Senate. But as it is constituted to-day, I am not prepared to play falsely with the small States. We have got them into the federation on the understanding that the Senate is their Chamber to protect their interests, and I for one am prepared to abide loyally by the compact which we made.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—I must first of all thank the Acting Prime Minister for his very able and lucid speech. I may say at once that I intend to support the Government. I think it is necessary that I should give a few of my reasons for that support. We have had some very able speeches from what is termed the "legal corner" with regard to the position under our Constitution. But it seems to me, in spite of all the opinions expressed from that side to the contrary, the meaning of the particular sub-section of section 53 of the Constitution which has been referred to is still very largely open to discussion. The honorable and learned member for Indi argued that the words "at any stage" contained in that subsection refer solely to the stages of a Bill as understood in all ordinary Parliamentary procedure, and as laid down in May. I say at once that the stages of a Bill are matters which it is fully within the power of this House and of the other House to determine. I do not believe that it was intended in this subsection that the words, "at any stage," should refer to our ordinary parliamentary acceptance of the term, as meaning the first, second, and third reading, or committee stage, of a Bill. If we are to admit that that is the reference, then I say that the committee stage is not one stage, but a series of stages; and as often as we go out of committee, and into the House, so often we create a new stage in the process of carrying the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—A sort of treadmill process.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—As often as a Bill is recommitted or referred from the House to the committee, passing between separate bodies that have nothing to do with each others proceedings, we establish a new stage. Now, as to the right of the Senate to make more than one suggestion, the honorable and learned members for Indi and Corinella, and one or two others, have argued that the right of the Senate was exhausted when they submitted their first requests, because they had made them at the completion of the Bill, and that there was no other stage possible.

Mr. ISAACS.—Oh, no.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—If the honorable and learned member admits that there is another stage possible, he at once cuts the ground from under his own feet, and agrees that there is another stage at which the Senate may offer suggestions, as they do now.

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes; but not the same suggestions.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I understand that the honorable and learned member argued not only in regard to the same suggestions, but with respect to all suggestions.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member misunderstood me.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Does the honorable and learned member admit now that the Senate still has the right to offer new suggestions, even though one stage of the measure has been exhausted?

Mr. ISAACS.—At a new stage I think probably they have the right to make new suggestions.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I should like to point out what I consider the difference in the stages. The moment the suggestions of the Senate are placed before this House, and then referred to the committee for consideration, a new stage is established, even in this House, in regard to the Bill. We passed the whole of the stages of the Bill, according to May, and according to the ordinary parliamentary interpretation, because we passed the first, second, and third readings, and the committee stage, and sent the Bill on to the Senate. I ask honorable members whether we do not establish a new stage when the suggestions of the Senate are brought to this House, and are referred by this House to the Committee of the whole? Undoubtedly we do. If the Senate had not still the right of making suggestions and even new suggestions, I ask the close attention of legal members to the interpretation of the 4th sub-section of section 53. In order to emphasize the point, I shall read the sub-section as it stands—

The Senate may at any stage return to the House of Representatives any proposed law which the Senate may not amend, requesting by message the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein, and the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make any of such omissions or amendments with or without modifications.

That was done. We received from the Senate a message containing a series of suggestions or requests which we considered, and we returned a message to the Senate on the 20th August, pointing out that we had accepted certain requests as to part, that we had made other amendments entirely as requested, and that with respect to a number of other requests we had made the amendments requested as to part and with various modifications. Now, if the Senate's power of suggestion and a further message has been exhausted, how can any honorable member of this House say that there is any possibility of live legislation if we decline to permit the Senate to reconsider their message with the modifications we sent to them—modifications which must and did include in many instances new matter and new suggestions, and new rates of duty? It must stand to reason that if we admit that they had the right to reconsider their suggestions in the light of the modifications that we sent to them, they must have the right to send us a message to say what they have done with them. That is exactly what they have done. We admit that under our Constitution we have sent them certain messages, in reply to their suggestion, not agreeing to them in some instances, and saying that with respect to the rest we entirely disagree with them, but agreeing to a certain number, agreeing in part to others, and agreeing to others again with certain modifications. But, when their message comes back here, some members of this House say—"Let us decline to receive their message altogether." This is a message which must contain their decision upon the new matter which we ourselves introduced to them in the message recently sent. That is a view of the position which I do not think has been considered before, and which does not appear to have suggested itself to some honorable members. Now, between the right to amend and the right to suggest, I think there is a very wide difference. The right to amend some Bills given to Legislative Councils in, I think, all the State Parliaments, is an absolute right by which the Legislative Council can return a Bill with clauses struck out, clauses amended, and new clauses inserted. They can insist that their new clauses shall be inserted, and if they are not inserted, they can decline to pass the Bill, throwing the responsibility of declining to agree to the amendments upon the other branch of the Legislature, and giving them only the option of casting the Bill on one side, or coming to some terms, or some compromise by means of conferences, and so forth, which is generally done with happy and satisfactory results. But, in this case, we are dealing with a right which was fought for very strongly in the Federal Convention, and a right for which I voted, because I believe, in spite of what has been said about the democracy, that it is in the best interests of the democracy, and of the whole people of Australia, to have a strong Senate. Certainly the best interests of the smaller States, which would not have come into the federation but for the understanding that there would be a strong Senate, will be served by maintaining the power of a fairly strong Senate. The members of the Senate are not elected as members of this House are elected in many States, by small constituencies, with small ideas of their own interests and industries, but they are elected in each State by the whole of the people of the State to represent the whole State. Under our new electoral law, and even under the law which has been in existence in some of the States, the representatives elected to the Senate have been returned by the votes, not only of the manhood, but of the womanhood of the whole State. There is a vast difference between conferring large powers upon such a body, and widening the functions of the Legislative Councils to a similar degree. In many cases, the Upper Houses of the States are elected by voters who must possess high property qualifications; in some cases the members are nominated by the Government in power, and in nearly every case the circumstances under which the House is constituted are very unsatisfactory to the great bulk of the people. The Senate, however, consists of men returned by the whole of the electors of each State, and they owe allegiance not to any small parties, or factions, or groups of faddists, but to the whole of the people, whose best interests they are sent into the Senate to protect. When the members of the Senate were given the power to suggest alterations even in Money Bills, it was recognised that an attempt was being made to protect the smaller States against encroachments upon their rights by the larger States. It was intended by this means to guard against any possible chance of a combination amongst the larger States which have such a strong numerical representation in this branch of the Legislature, with the object, for instance, of floating a large loan of £10,000,000, £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on extensive defence works in Port Jackson or Hobson's Bay. In such a case the smaller States would have to pay their share, even though they might strain their resources to the verge of insolvency. The smaller States insisted that the Senate should have powers as nearly as possible co-ordinate with those exercised by the House of Representatives, and certainly that they should be in a position to prevent themselves from being over-ridden. There is a great difference between the power of suggestion and that of amendment. As I pointed out just now, the power of amendment throws upon a Government originating a Bill the responsibility of deciding the fate of the measure. But the power of suggestion places us in an entirely different position. If we consented to consider the Senate's Message, we should not exhaust our rights. So far as I am concerned, I should welcome even two or three more Messages from the Senate if the result were to give us a Tariff which would represent a compromise between the views of all sections of the two Houses. We know of the confusion which exists in commercial circles, and of the difficulties with which businessmen have to contend, owing to the uncertainty now prevailing. During this time of general depression through all Australia, when the cost of the Federal Parliament is being somewhat severely felt, and when the people in the various States are being taxed to the utmost, we should be deservedly cursed by the people of Australia if we were to disregard the labours of the last twelve months, and throw the whole of our finances into a state of chaos. If we returned the Bill to the Senate, after considering their requests, and acceding to some, whilst possibly leaving others to be dealt with as a matter of further compromise, the Senate would be quite satisfied with our courteous treatment, and we should at last reach the end of our present arduous labours, and bring to a close that period of trouble which has been found so irksome by business men. Supposing the Senate again returned the Bill to us, it would be quite within our power to say that we did not intend to give any further consideration to their requests.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member said that he would welcome several other Messages.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I said that I should welcome two or three more Messages if they would lead to a settlement of the very much vexed question of the Tariff. I say that still. I do not think that our rights and privileges are being threatened, or that we should seek a conflict with the other branch of the Legislature, or render it necessary to introduce another Tariff after months of further delay. I would agree to go to any length that would not absolutely involve the surrender of our rights and privileges, in order to avoid such a contingency. A lot of hair-splitting has been indulged in by the honorable and learned members of the House in regard to the interpretation of section 53 of the Constitution, and I am sorry that, owing to the length of this session, and the amount of work we have had to do, no opportunity has presented itself for constituting a High Court, to which we could refer questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—The High Court would have nothing to do with this section of the Constitution.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The High Court would not have the power to lay down our parliamentary procedure, but it would be entitled to interpret the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—Not of this section.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The experience gained in connexion with the United States Constitution shows that their Supreme Court has been called upon to interpret the Constitution in cases where difficulties have occurred in the settlement of guiding principles and where differences have arisen between the States.

Mr. McCAY.—The sections of the Constitution containing the words "proposed law" are beyond the jurisdiction of the High Court.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I am satisfied, at all events, that there is a good deal of room for argument as to the meaning of the words "at any stage." I am sure that it was never intended that these words should limit the Senate to the sending of a Message at any one stage of a Bill, or to the sending of one Message at any particular stage. The word "stage" is not to be construed as bearing the same meaning here as where it is employed in May in reference to Parliamentary procedure. The words "at any stage" in this case mean "at any time." It was suggested when we were considering this section at the Convention that we should follow the lines of the South Australian practice, but, for obvious reasons, that was not regarded as sufficiently liberal. We were not prepared to accept a provision that at only one stage should the Senate have the right to make a suggestion. It was, therefore, provided that at any stage—at any time whilst a Bill was under consideration—the Senate should have the right to make requests. I shall give the Government my support, because I feel that we shall not be sacrificing any of our privileges or taking any step which we should not be in a position to retrace to-morrow, or the next day, or at any future time.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I think that all Government supporters who are prepared to vote against the motion should express their convictions, as it is important that in a first step of so vital a nature, those who vote against the Government should make no uncertain sound. I do not think I can add much to the weighty words which have fallen from the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable and learned member for Indi, who in part to others, and agreeing to others again with certain modifications. But, when their message comes back here, some members of this House say—"Let us decline to receive their message altogether." This is a message which must contain their decision upon the new matter which we ourselves introduced to them in the message recently sent. That is a view of the position which I do not think has been considered before, and which does not appear to have suggested itself to some honorable members. Now, between the right to amend and the right to suggest, I think there is a very wide difference. The right to amend some Bills given to Legislative Councils in, I think, all the State Parliaments, is an absolute right by which the Legislative Council can return a Bill with clauses struck out, clauses amended, and new clauses inserted. They can insist that their new clauses shall be inserted, and if they are not inserted, they can decline to pass the Bill, throwing the responsibility of declining to agree to the amendments upon the other branch of the Legislature, and giving them only the option of casting the Bill on one side, or coming to some terms, or some compromise by means of conferences, and so forth, which is generally done with happy and satisfactory results. But, in this case, we are dealing with a right which was fought for very strongly in the Federal Convention, and a right for which I voted, because I believe, in spite of what has been said about the democracy, that it is in the best interests of the democracy, and of the whole people of Australia, to have a strong Senate. Certainly the best interests of the smaller States, which would not have come into the federation but for the understanding that there would be a strong Senate, will be served by maintaining the power of a fairly strong Senate. The members of the Senate are not elected as members of this House are elected in many States, by small constituencies, with small ideas of their own interests and industries, but they are elected in each State by the whole of the people of the State to represent the whole State. Under our new electoral law, and even under the law which has been in existence in some of the States, the representatives elected to the Senate have been returned by the votes, not only of the manhood, but of the womanhood of the whole State. There is a vast difference between conferring large powers upon such a body, and widening the functions of the Legislative Councils to a similar degree. In many cases, the Upper Houses of the States are elected by voters who must possess high property qualifications; in some cases the members are nominated by the Government in power, and in nearly every case the circumstances under which the House is constituted are very unsatisfactory to the great bulk of the people. The Senate, however, consists of men returned by the whole of the electors of each State, and they owe allegiance not to any small parties, or factions, or groups of faddists, but to the whole of the people, whose best interests they are sent into the Senate to protect. When the members of the Senate were given the power to suggest alterations even in Money Bills, it was recognised that an attempt was being made to protect the smaller States against encroachments upon their rights by the larger States. It was intended by this means to guard against any possible chance of a combination amongst the larger States which have such a strong numerical representation in this branch of the Legislature, with the object, for instance, of floating a large loan of £10,000,000, £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on extensive defence works in Port Jackson or Hobson's Bay. In such a case the smaller States would have to pay their share, even though they might strain their resources to the verge of insolvency. The smaller States insisted that the Senate should have powers as nearly as possible co-ordinate with those exercised by the House of Representatives, and certainly that they should be in a position to prevent themselves from being over-ridden. There is a great difference between the power of suggestion and that of amendment. As I pointed out just now, the power of amendment throws upon a Government originating a Bill the responsibility of deciding the fate of the measure. But the power of suggestion places us in an entirely different position. If we consented to consider the Senate's Message, we should not exhaust our rights. So far as I am concerned, I should welcome even two or three more Messages from the Senate if the result were to give us a Tariff which would represent a compromise between the views of all sections of the two Houses. We know of the confusion which exists in commercial circles, and of the difficulties with which businessmen have to contend, owing to the uncertainty now prevailing. During this time of general depression through all Australia, when the cost of the Federal Parliament is being somewhat severely felt, and when the people in the various States are being taxed to the utmost, we should be deservedly cursed by the people of Australia if we were to disregard the labours of the last twelve months, and throw the whole of our finances into a state of chaos. If we returned the Bill to the Senate, after considering their requests, and acceding to some, whilst possibly leaving others to be dealt with as a matter of further compromise, the Senate would be quite satisfied with our courteous treatment, and we should at last reach the end of our present arduous labours, and bring to a close that period of trouble which has been found so irksome by business men. Supposing the Senate again returned the Bill to us, it would be quite within our power to say that we did not intend to give any further consideration to their requests.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member said that he would welcome several other Messages.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I said that I should welcome two or three more Messages if they would lead to a settlement of the very much vexed question of the Tariff. I say that still. I do not think that our rights and privileges are being threatened, or that we should seek a conflict with the other branch of the Legislature, or render it necessary to introduce another Tariff after months of further delay. I would agree to go to any length that would not absolutely involve the surrender of our rights and privileges, in order to avoid such a contingency. A lot of hair-splitting has been indulged in by the honorable and learned members of the House in regard to the interpretation of section 53 of the Constitution, and I am sorry that, owing to the length of this session, and the amount of work we have had to do, no opportunity has presented itself for constituting a High Court, to which we could refer questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—The High Court would have nothing to do with this section of the Constitution.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The High Court would not have the power to lay down our parliamentary procedure, but it would be entitled to interpret the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—Not of this section.

I do not think I can add much to the weighty words which have fallen from the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable and learned member for Indi, who have enlightened the House very considerably, not only as to the legal, but as to the constitutional position. I sympathize with the Acting Prime Minister in the difficulties which he has had to face, and which have impelled him to adopt a course which although supported by considerations of expediency, may imperil the rights of this House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does the honorable and learned gentleman suggest that our rights may be imperilled?

Mr. CROUCH.—The resolution itself, and the statement accompanying it, show that the Minister does not wish the action taken in this case to be regarded as a precedent, and it is reasonable to conclude, therefore, that he regarded it as dangerous. I am sorry that some members of the Opposition are not supporting us. I feel the greater regret because I find that all those who have spoken against the Government proposal are members of the protectionist party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is worth noting.

Mr. CROUCH. — Yes; it is worth noting, because this is now a party question, and it is regrettable that the Opposition will sink the interests of the people in order to secure a mere fiscal triumph. I may mention that my sympathies and the interests of my constituents would have led me to support three of the requests of the Senate, but I am not viewing this matter from a party point of view. The members of the Opposition should not view it from a party stand-point either, as they profess to believe that if a dissolution were to take place they would be able to sweep Australia clear of all the protectionist members of this House, but those honorable members on the protectionist side who are opposing the Government in this matter show that they are ready to face the chances of a dissolution, not that they want it, but in the interests of the democracy, which this House represents. I take it that the Government have climbed down almost before they were shot at. I think that before taking such action we should have returned this Message to the Senate to ascertain if it persists in the position which it has assumed. If it did, there would have been time enough then to consider the expediency of making a compromise. The proposal to receive its message at the present stage, even at the sacrifice of our constitutional rights, is not calculated to induce the Senate to take a proper view of its position in the future. If we have no regard for the rights of this House, we should certainly endeavour to conserve the rights of the people. In speaking just now, the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, implied that we were quibbling about the rights of this Chamber. Nothing of the sort. It is the people's rights that we are protecting, and I consider that upon a question like this we ought to support the democracy of the future rather than the areas represented by the other House. We are really sacrificing that for which our forefathers fought for many years. In connexion with almost a similar movement they faced a civil war. Rather than imperil democratic rights, I would rather have no Tariff. Such a misfortune would be temporary. Our action to-night creates a permanent precedent. However, I shall content myself with having entered my protest against the proposal of the Government. There are various ways in which a protest can be recorded. I have looked up May, and I find that whenever the Commons protest against the encroachment upon their privileges by the Lords, they enter it upon the journals of the House. The Lords have done precisely the same thing. We might go still further. Our rights are set out in a written Constitution, and I think that even the Attorney-General's opinion is that the Senate in this connexion has overstepped its powers. It is of no use doing a thing "without prejudice," unless it is so communicated to the other party, and I should, therefore, like to see a very strong protest recorded, by incorporating in the Message, when it is returned to the Senate, the amendment foreshadowed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. We should clearly set out that we have considered only the matter under the exceptional circumstances existing, and without prejudice to the rights of this House.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley). — Since three o'clock this afternoon the House has had as much constitutional argument to the square inch as it will require for many years to come. The honorable and learned member for Corio opened his remarks by declaring that the acceptance of the Government proposal would imperil the rights of this House, and of the people. But to my mind the point at issue is whether or not we ought to receive the Senate's message. The debate originated in the question which was put to Mr. Speaker by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who desired to know whether this House had the power to receive the message in question. Mr. Speaker's answer was that owing to an ambiguity in section 53 of the Constitution, and the absence of joint standing orders, he was prevented from giving a ruling upon the point.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has the honorable member formed any opinion as to why all these constitutional objections have been raised by high Tariffists?

Mr. WILKS.—The only opinion which I can form is founded upon the admission of the honorable and learned member for Corio. He marvelled because all the constitutionalists who apprehend an invasion of our rights and privileges, are Victorian representatives. I think that most of their objections are more fiscal than constitutional. I am of opinion that if the requests of the Senate had been in the direction of increased duties we should have heard little about the constitutional aspect of the question. I would further point out that all the legal members of the House who have spoken differ in their interpretation of the Constitution in regard to the power of the Senate to again request amendments.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But they are all dying for a fight.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes. The Attorney-General when addressing the House did not admit that when the proper time arrived, he was prepared to surrender any tittle of the power of this House. No surrender is suggested. The Tariff issue he said had been fought out. After twelve months of labour we had almost reached finality in regard to it, and he did not intend, by confusing the fiscal question with the constitutional, to provoke a struggle with the other House, when the question at issue could not be properly placed before the people of the Commonwealth. He said that the dislocation of trade which would result from a conflict now between the two Houses would be disastrous to the whole of Australia. If this debate has shown anything, it has evidenced that we have provided in the Constitution a power which may prove injurious to the people, and which may demand in the near future an amendment of that instrument of government. I am satisfied that when the people have to vote upon the question, whether they shall rule or whether small coteries shall be dominant, the average elector of the smaller States will vote in the same direction as will the democrat of New South Wales and Victoria. I repeat that no surrender of principle is involved in the proposal of the Government. The legal luminaries of the House assure us that if we establish a precedent in this connexion the people will never be able to free themselves from its shackles. I do not believe that statement. This motion is not irrevocable, and we may take a different action in the future. In the course of the Tariff discussions, I naturally expressed my own fiscal views as strongly as possible in opposition to the views of the honorable members on the other side. I realize, however, that we now have a Tariff comprising over 300 different items and having its ramifications in all classes of trade. The Senate, in the exercise of their powers under a written Constitution, has suggested amendments, and one Message was received from that Chamber. A return Message was sent, and modifications made in the duties, and now a second Message is before us. The wonder is that the suggested amendments were so few, when we consider the hundreds of items which had to be discussed. In my opinion, the word "request" is simply a euphemistic term used in the early days of the struggle, in order to obtain adherence which otherwise would not have been obtained to the federal movement. In this connexion we are reminded of a burglar who may calmly, and in the most polite way, "request" a person to disgorge his cash, but, if the burglar is properly armed, the "request" has all the force of a demand. We know that the word "request" carries with it the force of "amendment." At present the Senate has, through this House, the whole of Australia "in the toils," and that has been shown in the Minister's appeal to honorable members to receive this Message. We have to consider the conditions of trade, and also the fact that a similar position cannot occur again. This is the first time in our history that a uniform Tariff has been drafted, and in order to prevent chaos the Senate's Message ought to be considered. After this time, however, it rests with ourselves whether we accept other requests made by the Senate, and if it were an Appropriation Bill I could understand members of this House fighting strongly against the exercise of the power claimed by the Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What is the distinction in the Constitution?

Mr. WILKS.—If a conflict were provoked under present conditions, and reference were made to the people, the question could not be clearly decided. The suggestions of the Senate have been mostly in the direction of free-trade, and if an appeal were made to the electors of New South Wales they would have to decide on the action of their representatives in the Senate, backed up by the opinion of the majority of their members in the House of Representatives, in furthering a policy in which they believe. The constitutional issue and the fiscal issue would thus be confused. With an Appropriation Bill, however, there would be one question clearly before the people, irrespective of fiscal considerations. Some honorable members have urged that we should go to the country, but those who, it may be without just cause or reason, are strongest in their constituencies, are not always anxious for an appeal to the people. The experience in State politics is that the man who is everlastingly crying out for an appeal to the electors, very often after the appeal is made has no further opportunity of speaking in the Legislature. You, Mr. Speaker, have had experience as private member and Prime Minister in a State Parliament, and now, in your honorable position as the first Speaker of the Federal Parliament, you have refused to rule on the issue before us, and have thrown the responsibility on the House. My opinion is that, as the first Message was received, so should this Message be received. Sweeping away legal subtleties, I say that if there is anything wrong in the reception of the second Message there was something wrong in the reception of the first Message a fortnight or three weeks ago. It is within our power, in the future, to say whether or not the Senate is correct in sending on suggested amendments. I do not know whether the Acting Prime Minister is aware that the Senate is prepared for a policy of compromise, and that, if certain modifications are made, the members in another place are prepared to remove obstacles which now exist. If the Acting Prime Minister has that information,

I can understand his present action; but if he has any fear that the Senate is not prepared to compromise, but is anxious to fight, then by all means we ought to refuse the Message and, in order to save time, bring on the conflict now. But if in regard to a Tariff for the whole of Australia, at this stage, only twenty differences remain, more or less unimportant, then the first Parliament has done well. It is not to the interest of the public of Australia to cause a conflict on the present occasion, and throw the public finances and the industrial and commercial world into confusion. The honorable and learned member for Corio said he believed in the representation of population and not of States, and to a great extent I agree in that opinion; but the Constitution has been carried, and I do not believe in mock battles. I feel pleased, as a free-trader, that the suggestions of the Senate are in the direction of lowering the Tariff, and if I were to refuse to accept a Message, and say that the Senate had no right to send it, I should be false to my reading of the Constitution.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I can hardly follow the concluding portion of the speech of the honorable member for Dalley, but I understand him to say that he is induced to support the motion, because the suggestions of the Senate are in the direction of reducing taxation. It appears to me, however, that the question we are, or should be considering, is not that of raising or lowering taxation, but the question of the proper mode of procedure between the two branches of the Commonwealth Parliament. I very much regret that, having been busy during the whole of the afternoon, I was unable to hear the speeches of the constitutional authorities of the House, and I am now in almost absolute ignorance of what has gone before. I did hear a portion of the speech of the Acting Prime Minister, and it is to that I intend to direct the few remarks I have to make. I may say, however, in the first place, that I was one who originally opposed the Commonwealth Constitution Bill, partly on the ground that it enabled one-third of the people to impose taxation on two-thirds, against the will of the latter. At that time I, as a layman, interpreted the Constitution to mean what it says, and no more. I understood the Constitution to mean that the Senate could send down a Bill at any stage with a request for a particular amendment, but I did not understand that if the request was not complied with, it could be repeated over and over again. I have so much confidence in the Acting Prime Minister that if he had taken the responsibility of telling the House that after full consideration he believed the Constitution did confer this right on the Senate, I might have been disposed to give up my own views in deference to his. But so far as I followed the honorable gentleman he did not take up that position. He did not say that the Senate in sending down the same requests a second time were acting within their constitutional rights. The honorable gentleman pointed out, and I quite agree with him, the desirability of settling this question, and the vital importance which its early settlement is to the people of the Commonwealth. But I do not think that we should make any false step when laying the foundations of a nation. It is a most important matter, and serious as the consequences of delay or of a possible constitutional crisis may be, I think it will be still more serious if we make a vital mistake at this stage. I believe that it would be a mistake for us to lay down a precedent which is not contained in the Constitution. Should we find out afterwards that we had made a mistake, I believe that we could not retrace our steps. Whatever we may say now, and whatever we may assert, it is our act that will be looked to, and if a similar case arises again there is not the slightest doubt that this will be pointed to as a precedent from which we cannot very well depart.

Mr. WILKS.—One Parliament cannot control another.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I know that one Parliament cannot control another, but the honorable member knows that if a serious precedent of this kind is once established it is extremely difficult to get away from it, and we shall have to face this question again handicapped by the load of the precedent we are now asked to make.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Does it not depend upon our majority.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I did not hear the views of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo. I do not pretend to say that my view of the Constitution is correct. As I have already stated, I would much rather take the view of the Acting Prime Minister if he would give it to us upon this point. But as the honorable gentleman did not say that he believed that the Senate were acting within their rights, I regret to say that, much as I should like to support his proposal, I cannot do it in deference to what I believe to be the rights of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. POYNTER.—In arriving at finality what is the difference between the power of suggestion and the power of amendment?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I do not think there is much difference, even if the Senate had the right, as I believe they have, only to make their requests once. I have always contended that there is no very great difference, but I find that all the constitutional authorities are opposed to me upon that point. If they say there is a substantial difference between the right to make a request and the right to make an amendment, and if they then go further and say that the Senate can repeat their requests time after time, I must say that their distinction is a hollow sham, and there is nothing whatever in it. Whatever the real difference between the power to request and the power to amend, as I interpret it, may be, there will be no difference at all if the Senate has the right to repeat a request time after time. I do not wish to detain the House further in explaining the reasons why I cannot follow my honorable friend upon this occasion. It is because I believe that if the Constitution does not confer the right upon the Senate to repeat a request time after time, it will be a fatal blunder on our part to lay down a precedent in the contrary direction, and I believe a blunder from which we cannot subsequently recede, that I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I do not intend to labour this question at any great length, because I do not think at this time of night very much more need be said. We have had some very learned arguments upon the constitutional aspect of this question, but some of them appear to me to be neither more nor less than consummate pieces of word-spinning. For instance, such a speech as that delivered by the honorable member for Indi I so characterize. I listened to that honorable and learned member very patiently, and with a great deal of admiration for the cleverness with which he stated his case. But it occurred to me that his argument consisted wholly of word-spinning. I could not call it anything else. I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the honorable and learned gentleman's utterances were not nearly so weighty as many which we have been accustomed to hear from him in this House. I should like also to make a remark somewhat upon the lines suggested by the honorable member for Dalley. I desire to ask the House to take notice of the fact, and it is a striking one, that every honorable member who has argued against the Senate on this occasion, and has seen innumerable dangers wrapt up in the proposal of the Government, is without exception a Victorian high-tariffist. Is that a coincidence? If it is, it is a very remarkable one. Every honorable member who sees all these dangers in the Constitution to-night is a man who is dissatisfied with this Tariff, and who sees in the proposal of the Government a proposal for a still further modification of it. I say that that fact is too patent to escape notice.

Mr. ISAACS.—How about the converse?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does not the honorable and learned member see that he points the way for us. We cannot go wrong in following the honorable and learned member's indication. If he is going all the while to see constitutional dangers in anything that makes for the amelioration of this Tariff, then we may refuse to see those dangers when we believe that the proposal of the Government is for a still further concession in the matter of the Tariff.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—What about the Minister for Trade and Customs? Is that honorable gentleman a free-trader? He is with honorable members opposite.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; the Minister for Trade and Customs is not a free-trader, but he is a member of the Government. I apprehend that there has been some very considerable discussion on this question in the Cabinet. I should say that, after all the Minister for Trade and Customs has gone through in connexion with this Tariff, whether he be a free-trader or a protectionist, he is heartily sick of the job, and wants to be done with it. I had charge of the Tariff I should be heartily ashamed of it. But the question is not the Tariff exactly. There is a constitutional aspect of this matter, and I am one of those who are glad that the Government take the attitude in dealing with this question that they do. I would rather the matter was dealt with in the way they propose than make any definite announcement on the present occasion as to what the rights of the Senate and of this House are. At the same time, I am bound to say, further, that in my opinion there is nothing in the Constitution which prevents the Senate from sending down a second or a third suggestion if they deem fit. In trying to understand the meaning of the section which has been so much debated to-night, I take the meaning given to it by the framers of the Constitution at the time of the Convention, and I go back to the speech quoted by the honorable and learned member for Indi, which is the latest utterance, I take it, in the Convention on this subject—I refer to the speech of the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, Sir Edmund Barton, who was the leader of the Convention. I do not read the utterance as the honorable and learned member for Indi read it, and I shall put one question to the honorable and learned member in regard to it. Sir Edmund Barton at that time was speaking of the power to make suggestions on the part of the Senate, and after an interjection from the present Minister for Trade and Customs as to how many times they might make these requests or suggestions, he uses these words—

Yes, as long as the Bill is in the hands of the Senate. That means, I take it, a power not solely to send the Bill down at a stage at which the measure has at the moment arrived, but that if it arrives at a further stage in the Senate, there being in the meantime some settlement or no settlement with regard to the suggestion made, the Senate would have power to make other suggestions.

Now the honorable and learned member for Indi says that "at any stage" of the Bill does not mean any further stage in committee.

Mr. WATKINS.—Does not the quotation to which the honorable member has referred speak of "other suggestions"?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The difference between 15 per cent. and 14½ per cent. would be another suggestion. What is the use of quibbling in that way about mere terms? The question is, have they the substantial power to send down suggestions after this House has dealt with the suggestions which they first sent down? Sir Edmund Barton, in the Convention, referred to a case in which no settlement had been arrived at. I desire to know from the honorable and learned member for Indi how they could send down to this House any further suggestions upon a matter as to which no settlement had been arrived at after the stage that the Senate was last at? For instance, they send down this proposal to this House when the stage of report has been passed. There can be no further stage, according to the honorable and learned member, but the third reading, which is the next stage in succession. There is no intervening stage after the committee has reported; we must go on to the third reading. That is the only stage next in succession. How could the Bill reach that stage before a settlement had been arrived at? Would it not be necessary to go into committee to consider the Message on its return from this House? Therefore, it is clear that Sir Edmund Barton could not have had in his mind the case put before us by the honorable and learned member for Indi. The Senate could not send down suggestions for the alteration of the Tariff at the third-reading stage.

Mr. ISAACS.—That would depend upon their rules of procedure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has said this evening that we must take the rules of procedure as we find them. There is no provision in the rules for making suggestions for amendments when a Bill has reached the third-reading stage. It is, therefore, clear that Sir Edmund Barton intended the term "at any stage" to have the very widest meaning. It is impossible to accept the reading of the honorable and learned member for Indi.

Mr. ISAACS.—Sir Edmund Barton could not prophesy what the rules of procedure of the Senate would be.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member is now departing from his own statement. He said that we were bound by the ordinary rules of procedure, by the procedure of the House of Commons, and by the practice of British parliamentary institutions. But in no British dominion is there any means provided by which the Senate could reach a further stage of the Bill than they have done at the present time, and still send requests to us regarding amendments in the Tariff. I am sure that if Sir Edmund Barton were here now he would say that it was intended that the Senate should be enabled to send down suggestions at any time that the Bill was under consideration. My own impression is that the section means that the Senate may make requests as frequently as they like so long as this Chamber permits them to do so. It rests with us to say whether or not we shall take their requests into consideration. We have the control in our own hands, and we can stop at any moment. We may put an end to the negotiations at the exact moment when we think they have gone far enough. I cannot read the section as conveying any other meaning. The honorable and learned member said that the words "if it thinks fit" might just as well have been omitted. That may be, but they were inserted with a view to give this House the power to shut down on the negotiations between the two Chambers at any time. I congratulate the honorable and learned member for Indi upon his speech. It was the cleverest piece of word-spinning I have ever heard in this Chamber; but I could not help thinking of Plato's saying—"Truth lies at the bottom of a well." Certainly it seemed as if the honorable and learned member were diving deep down into the bowels of the earth in order to find an argument against the procedure of the Government on this occasion. It is very curious that all the talk about the importance of this constitutional question, and the dangers which are to be apprehended from the acknowledgment of the rights of the Senate to repeat their request, comes only from those who are in favour of a high Tariff. Those honorable members who desire to arrive at a settlement upon the lines of a moderate Tariff see none of these constitutional dangers. If a crisis were to occur, and I went to the people of New South Wales and said that I objected to what the Senate had done in regard to the Tariff, they would turn round and say—"We want the Senate to do precisely as it is doing." Then I might retort—"But look at the danger that is involved to the Constitution." They would then say—"We had all those dangers pointed out to us before the referendum was taken. We knew all about them then, and now that the Senate is in favour of our view with regard to the Tariff, we ask you and others to work the Constitution as you find it until it is altered in a constitutional way." Therefore, believing that the Senate is acting within its rights, and that it is correctly interpreting the wishes of the majority of the people of Australia regarding the Tariff, I am ready to consider its requests. I hope that the course we shall adopt in this matter will result in bringing the Tariff more into harmony with the wishes of the people of Australia. Apart from that consideration, there is the further question of the uncertainty which now exists in business circles, and the upheaval of our commercial affairs, owing to the unsettled state of the Tariff and the administration of it. I submit that the administration of the Tariff is worse than the Tariff itself. There is a feeling of unrest throughout the length and breadth of Australia, and the people, whether protectionists or free-traders, are asking that we shall arrive as soon as possible at finality in regard to this long drawn-out and troublesome question. I have heard the most ardent free-traders in New South Wales say—"For goodness sake finish the Tariff. Give us anything you like—anything will be better than the present state of uncertainty." Therefore, since the Government propose to waive the constitutional point for the present, and defer its consideration till some future time, we ought to readily follow them. We have been told that the question as to the relative powers of the two Houses will have to be considered in connexion with the framing of the standing orders. No doubt it will. The standing orders will have to provide the methods of procedure to be followed in connexion with negotiations between the two Houses, whose respective positions will have to be determined. We shall have to discuss this question at an early date, and the sooner the better. I think it is almost a calamity that the standing orders were not considered in the first instance, and brought into operation before we were called upon to deal with the Tariff. It seems strange that, after having been in session for eighteen months we should have no recognised means of approaching the other House. This affords another reason why we should more readily follow the Government, because no question of procedure and therefore no question of the relations between the two Houses arises. I commend the Government for finding us a way out of the difficulty, and I shall follow them with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir). — Reference has been made by the honorable member for Parramatta to the fact that some protectionists see constitutional difficulties because of the fiscal views they hold. The retort might be made by uncharitable people that it is a peculiar coincidence that all free-traders are in accord with the Government in their determination not to assert the constitutional rights of this Chamber upon the first occasion upon which they have been questioned. The accusation of bias, conscious or unconscious, would always lie against honorable members in such cases, but it does not rest with the free-traders to cast imputations upon those who sit on this side of the House.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not think it is worth noticing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does not the honorable member explain it?

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member for Parramatta should first explain his position. My complaint is that the Government, having had thrown upon it the responsibility of determining the constitutional rights of this Chamber, has evaded the issue and placed honorable members in an unfair position. We know that the commercial and industrial welfare of the whole community is wrapped up in the Tariff issue to a great extent, but the question is not now one of high Tariff or low Tariff, but of the rights of the other Chamber to determine matters relating to the taxation of the people. I have never admitted that the Senate has equal rights with this Chamber in the imposition of taxation on the people, but the position taken up by honorable members on the other side is entirely opposed to that view, although the acting leader of the Opposition has admitted that a clear distinction is laid down between the powers of the Senate in dealing with Appropriation or Taxation Bills, and their powers in dealing with other measures. There is a clear difference between the powers of the two Houses, and yet the honorable member for Dalley says that there is practically no distinction between them. He says that the Senate has practically the power of amendment in connexion with taxation Bills. That is where we join issue, and I find fault with the Government for evading the real issue. The acting leader of the Opposition was perfectly fair when he said that the motion evades the main issue completely.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was intended to.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is what I find fault with. The time occupied in this debate, added to a few hours to-morrow, would probably have enabled us to determine the constitutional question involved in the action of the Senate. We have heard the opinions expressed by eminent legal authorities in the House, all of whom are agreed upon this question. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo, it is true, takes up the position of the proverbial small boy, who says that he is not quite big enough to fight yet. He admits that the justification for a fight exists, and that a determination of rights should ensue, but he says that he is not yet big enough to fight. The honorable and learned member regards this matter from the standpoint of expediency rather than of principle. That is what I object to. I have never admitted—and it has never been seriously urged by any federal leader—that the right of the Senate to amend taxation or appropriation Bills is co-ordinate with that of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Senate has an equal right to reject those Bills.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is true that the responsibility of rejection rests with the Senate. But the position, I think, has been clearly put by one honorable member, who quoted the dictum of Sir Samuel Griffith, that the right of suggestion by a strong Senate was equal to the right of amendment by a weak Senate. That is the position to-night. We have a weak Government who will not face the situation in the interests of the whole of the electors. I feel convinced that those honorable members opposite, who pose as true democrats, will ere long have occasion to reverse their attitude upon this question. Are they prepared to allow the representatives of the smaller States to impose burdens upon the great majority of the people of the Commonwealth in opposition to the will of the latter? That is practically the whole position. This is not a question of whether we shall have a high or a low Tariff. The difference between the duties upon the items in dispute does not represent more than 5 per cent. Is that a matter about which we are likely to quarrel at the expense of the utter dislocation of trade? Certainly I am not prepared to take up that position, but I think it is the duty of the Government to clearly define the constitutional powers of this Chamber in matters of taxation and appropriation. Upon those grounds I intend to oppose the motion, which contains an admission by the Government that some of our rights may be infringed if we discuss the Senate's Message without first adopting this resolution. The concluding portion of the resolution reads—

This House refrains from the determination of its constitutional rights or obligations in respect of this Message, and resolves to receive and consider it forthwith.

I cannot conceive any conditions under which this Chamber should refrain from determining its constitutional rights. If some grave and important crisis arose, in which it was imperative that we should act upon the spur of the moment, I presume that we should be prepared to do so. But that is not the position. Chaos will not ensue if the settlement of the Tariff is delayed for another week, and will any honorable member argue that a determination of the question of our constitutional rights could not be arrived at within a week? I regret that the Government by their action are establishing a precedent which will govern our mode of procedure for all time. It has been mentioned in some quarters that discretion is the better part of valour, but I venture to say that that doctrine cannot be upheld for one moment. No honorable member should be willing to allow the constitutional rights of this Chamber to be infringed upon the mere ground of expediency. Principle should govern us in all things, and, therefore, I must oppose the resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—First, I desire to congratulate the Attorney-General upon his masterly and eloquent defence of the Ministerial position. To my mind, it was impregnable, progressive, and democratic. When a man has been bushed for some days, either through a blizzard, or a snowstorm, the first thing which he ought to do is to ascend a high hill, and endeavour to discover the smoke of some house, or the nearest way to a clearing. That is precisely the course which we ought to adopt to-night. For fourteen months we have been debating great constitutional questions, and yet we have left undiscussed the most vital matter of all, namely, the difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives. It seems to me that we ought to clearly define the constitutional powers of the two Houses. I hold that the Commonwealth of Australia is different from any other nation that has existed, or does exist. In the first place, our Government is not like that of Germany, Turkey, or Russia. In Russia the will of the Czar, in Turkey that of the Sultan, and in Germany that of the Emperor is supreme.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member's remarks are scarcely relevant to the question.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The point at issue is, what are the constitutional powers of the House of Representatives and of the Senate? I trust we shall decide that the other Chamber has the right to transmit a second Message to us, and that we have the power to discuss it. It seems to me that this House represents the federal idea.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The national idea.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Its membership is based upon the principle of human numbers. It springs directly from the people, and acts directly upon them. The larger the population of Australia the greater will be the number of representatives in this Chamber. The Senate, however, occupies an altogether different position. It rests upon geographical boundary lines, and its membership can be increased only by the addition of new States to the Commonwealth. It matters not if the population of the Commonwealth totals 20,000,000 or 30,000,000, there can be no increase in the number of senators; but there must be an increase in the number of representatives in this House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But if the number of members in this House were increased, the number in the Senate would also have to be increased.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Why? The Constitution provides that each State shall be represented by six senators. We must recognise that the Commonwealth is a nation of nations, a Commonwealth of Commonwealths, an indissoluble union of indestructible States. This House has control of the purse, and by granting to the other Chamber the power to repeat its requests in regard to Money Bills, we do not in any way imperil the rights vested in us by the Constitution. Therefore, I shall vote for the proposal of the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General), in reply.—I by no means regret a single moment which has been allotted to this debate, and beg to express an unassumed appreciation of the manner in which this question has been approached from all sides of the House. It is a necessary part of even a hurried summing up to point out that the result of this debate has satisfied me more than ever that, whatever may be the opinion of my critics, this House is not yet ripe for dealing with the serious constitutional issues involved, and that we shall do well to put them on one side until we can arrive at a little more unity amongst ourselves. "A House divided against itself cannot stand," and until a greater agreement upon more definite propositions in this regard can be arrived at in this Chamber, it would be in the highest degree unwise for us to enter on a contention with another place. It has been under considerable pressure that the Government decided on the course which they have invited the House to follow. It was apparent to the Ministry, and it has been proved to-night, that whatever truth there may be in the insinuations that honorable members have grouped themselves on this constitutional question, not so much in regard to their opinions on that question, as in regard to their sympathies on the fiscal proposals involved, certainly a strong dividing line has been drawn. On the whole, members have not been found on this question taking sides as might have been expected if it had been an abstract issue. Some were obviously greatly swayed by concrete considerations of the result of the action which they were invited to take. Even a suspicion of the play of such external forces on a decision of this kind ought to be sufficient to satisfy my friend, the honorable member for Moira, whose severe complaint we have just listened to, that so far from the course now chosen being one of weakness, it is one in which there has been a discrimination between a premature discussion and a dangerous settlement of this question now, as contrasted with the very much better opportunities which will shortly be presented to us. I do not undervalue the importance of even the least suggestion that has been made of any interpretation of the Constitution in favour of this House. There are times when it is proper to "greatly find quarrel in a straw," but surely it is part of the practical wisdom of the world to know when to set formal issues aside, rather than lose sight of the main contents of a situation. And the main features of the situation at the present time are undoubtedly the enormous interests at stake to the industrial and commercial development of the country. We shall also have to look above and beyond ourselves, to the people, when we seek to arrive at an agreement, and when we approach our fellow representatives in another Chamber in order to arrive at an amicable settlement. If we are fortunate enough to agree, as I hope we shall, many difficulties will be removed; if we are not, we shall do well now, and for a long time to come, to be extremely cautious of entrance into quarrels of this kind, for the reason that these are questions which do not appeal with overwhelming force to the public of this great continent. Many of them are situated thousands of miles from our centre of political action, and depend upon very incomplete reports of our proceedings. Many others, owing to want of practical experience in representative institutions, are not able to realize the importance of the issues involved. We should surely be adopting mistaken tactics if we took the last course left to us in a constitutional struggle, until we were satisfied first that we have a good case, and secondly that the electors thoroughly understand it. I venture to say that if we submitted to the people a constitutional issue entangled with the fiscal prepossessions which surround the Tariff, while the whole community is labouring under a sense of its increasing effect on trade, week by week and month by month, we shall at the very outset prejudice our case immensely. It has not been from any neglect or disregard of the proper claims of this House to due consideration as one of the great partners of the Federal Parliament, that the Government proposed the course indicated in the motion. It is proposed because, in the interests of this House and in the interests of responsible government, this is not a fitting time to seek a verdict from the people on the constitutional issues involved. At this hour of the night it would be unwise to labour the point. There are many incidents in political history which go to warn us how by some apparently chance turn of the current of events, incidents such as this apparently slight in themselves, are elevated into instantaneous importance, and become matters of great moment. That being so, it ill becomes one to attempt to prophesy as to what the consequences of a particular step of this sort may be. The consequences so far have been extremely useful, for they have enabled members to commence to understand one another's minds. I freely admit my own indebtedness to the debate for a much clearer view of some of the points raised. I have no doubt that other debates will enable us to arrive at an agreement here, which, I trust, will presage the agreement we shall reach with the other Chamber. But, although apparently fortuitous circumstances may at times elevate an occurrence of this sort into an eminence that no one could have foreseen, I am still inclined to believe that the proposal we here make does not mark any such departure as will be signaled hereafter. At all events, so far as it does, we are safeguarded by the motion, which seeks to take no advantage of the Senate, and concedes no advantage to this House. It aims at maintaining the constitutional status quo, while it enables us to reach towards the earliest possible settlement of the customs Tariff. Under these circumstances, after carefully weighing, with the attention they deserve, the strong representations which have been made, especially by my fellow-representatives of the State of Victoria, I still remain of the opinion with which I commenced this discussion. I doubt if my friends of the Opposition, who are most of them not Victorians, can understand as well as I do the spirit which has prompted my own friends on the Government side. If there is one thing which is engendered in the Victorian liberal—if there is one principle that flows with the blood through his veins in all constitutional questions—it is the assertion that the local Chamber which represents all the people in this State shall not be subject to the domination of a body elected on a limited franchise with a property qualification, that has proved itself a stumbling-block to most advances which the local Legislature has sought to make. There is such an ineradicable antagonism on our part, inherited from past experiences, that we are but too liable to carry it into an entirely different sphere, where we are confronted, not only by an entirely different body, with entirely different claims to popular support and approval, but by the still novel element of a Federal Constitution. While appreciating the attitude of Victorian members, I venture to remind them how, when we were on the same platform in the federal campaign, we were opposed by men who held a stricter view, and felt the old antagonism to all Second Chambers. We had then to point out to them that in the Federal Constitution some old contentions lost much of their meaning. We have to remind ourselves of that truth still, to remind ourselves that now more than ever we must be federalists first, last, and always. The operation of the federal system must necessarily deflect our former principles to a considerable extent, and require us to pay more consideration to a Senate that represents the people of the States. If there are any who chafe at what they consider the limitations imposed on them by the Constitution, there is no other course for them but to alter the Constitution, though while it lasts they must give it their loyal adherence and support. I venture to submit that as federalists our duty is to avoid contentions with the State Chamber. I do not think we shall lose anything by forbearance. I am quite convinced that in the present contingencies we should not have had, either in the House or outside, that support which we are entitled to expect when we raise great and serious problems such as have been submitted to-day by the honorable and learned member for Indi, and those who agree with him. We shall do much better to take the sane and practical course suggested by the motion, rather than "go sounding on our dim and perilous way" into the unknown consequences of political conflict, for which, in my opinion, the people are not prepared. What the country is prepared for, and what is required, is the speediest possible settlement of the great Tariff question; this will be our final Message relating to it; and then, hereafter, by calm consideration, apart from all other questions, the delicate relations between the two Houses may be adjusted on a footing satisfactory to them and to Australia.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee (Consideration of Requests again made by the Senate):

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs).—I trust that we are now entering upon the final stage in connexion with this troublesome and important matter. I trust and believe that the spirit of conciliation which has been exhibited during the afternoon will continue to be shown. To that end the Government are prepared to make a compromise—such a compromise as I think we can honorably propose, and such also as I believe the Senate can similarly accept; a fair concession to the necessities of the case, and a full exposition of our feeling that the position in connexion with the Tariff is one of such uncertainty that it ought to be put an end to at the earliest possible moment. I simply indicate what our intentions are. I propose to state the nature of the concessions which we shall ask the committee to agree to. Dealing first with the items under the heading of metals and machinery, where the issue has been as to whether we should retain the duty of 15 per cent., which we originally proposed, or accept that of 10 per cent. which has been requested by the Senate, we think the time has come to offer to make an arrangement upon the subject; and we propose under the circumstances, with regard to all those duties, to reduce them from 15 per cent. to $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. ISAACS.—Upon all machinery?

Mr. KINGSTON.—As regards all those items in connexion with which we have been at issue hitherto, where the division of opinion has been between 15 per cent. and 10 per cent. We propose also, as regards the less important item of mangles, to allow the dispute to be similarly settled by agreeing to a duty of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the right honorable gentleman propose the reduction upon machinery because he thinks it is right, or because he feels himself forced?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Because I think it is right under the circumstances. In the matter of residual oil and solar oil, we propose to consent to a reduction from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to $\frac{1}{4}$ d. We believe that $\frac{1}{4}$ d. is a fair arrangement, and we propose to stick to it. I venture to think that there ought, and I think there will be a desire on the part of the committee to make our conclusions in this respect as unanimous as possible. Whilst the Government are giving way fairly liberally in these matters, I trust that a similar spirit will be exhibited on the other side.

Mr. McCAY.—Is this the right honorable gentleman's final concession?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I think the time has arrived when we have a right to hope and expect that this is the final stage, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. McCAY.—Suppose the right honorable gentleman's expectations are disappointed?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am not going to anticipate anything at this moment, nor shall I say one word to prevent the realization of the hopes we have, and which I think I may say amount to a certainty that the Senate, if approached in this attitude, will reciprocate accordingly. As regards socks and stockings, we cannot agree to the proposal that the duty upon cotton socks and stockings should be raised to 15 per cent., but we are willing that woollen socks and stockings should be reduced to 15 per cent. As regards yarn, we are prepared to advise the committee to consent to a reduction of the duty to 5 per cent., and as regards all the other items, I think there is a fair division as regards those with which we agree and with which we do not, and I shall therefore ask the committee to support the Government in saying that the amendments requested in connexion with them are not required.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—I do not intend to say much upon the proposal of the Minister for Trade and Customs. I do not even go so far as to say that we see in it a fair compromise. It certainly is not satisfactory to us.

Mr. SALMON.—And I can assure the honorable gentleman that it is not satisfactory to us.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But I recognise that we have practically had our last say in the discussion of this Tariff. The question is now between the Ministry and their supporters. It is a curious fact that if we take half of the divisions on these different items on the last occasion on which we discussed them, the majority has consisted entirely of the Ministerial bench. At the same time we do not intend to sulk in our tents, and if we find that in connexion with any of these items, the duties upon which the Government are determined to reduce their proposals are in any way objected to, and a vote is taken, we shall vote as free-traders for every reduction. To that extent we shall support the Government. I am sorry that the compromise has not been greater, but I feel that now, after having to a certain extent strained the position, and having received this new Message of the Senate, whatever we do to-night must be final. We do not accept this Tariff as ours.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It certainly is not ours.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—No. It is a very different document from the Tariff fathered by honorable members on the Government side of the House, and it is also very far from being framed upon the lines indicated by the Prime Minister at Maitland. We brought it to a half-way house on the road back to Maitland, but we did not reduce it sufficiently to reflect either the hustings speeches of the Prime Minister, or the opinion of the people of Australia. Without in any way giving our sanction to this Tariff, we say that anything is better than further delay, and, as a matter of patriotism, which is above all party feeling, we have come to the conclusion that a final settlement should be no longer delayed. Therefore, the work of honorable members on this side of the Chamber is practically done.

Item 15. Paraffin wax per lb., $\frac{1}{2}$ d.
Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Motion (by Mr. KINGSTON) agreed to—
 That the amendment requested be not made.

Item 77. Mangles. ad valorem, 15 per cent.

Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 10 per cent.

Motion (by Mr. KINGSTON) proposed—

That the amendment requested be not made, but that the duty be reduced to $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—Divisions have been taken over and over again upon these requests, and I think it will be sufficient if we allow the motions to pass on the voices.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—If a conflict is to be precipitated, and I should think that this is very likely, in view of the attitude now assumed by the Government, I desire to have it placed on record that I have done all in my power to effect a compromise. In this instance no question of protection or free-trade is involved, but a reasonable compromise has been suggested by the Senate, and if we refuse to consider it we might just as well have voted against the proposal of the Government that we should receive and deal with the requests of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

Item 5. Tobacco, viz., cigars, per lb., 6s. 3d. and 15 per cent.

Request again made.—That the duty be altered to 7s. per lb.

Motion (by Mr. KINGSTON) proposed—

That the amendment requested be not made.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—If we had acceded to this request of the Senate, we should have abolished the last of the composite duties provided for in the Tariff.

Mr. MCCAY.—The Senate propose to raise the duty.

Mr. CONROY.—Even if that is so, I am perfectly prepared to meet the Senate half way. We should show some disposition to compromise, and I am sorry that honorable members should be content to place themselves under the direction of the Minister for Trade and Customs, who has already shown himself utterly lacking in statesman-like qualities, and whose action is calculated to bring about a crisis between the two Houses.

Motion agreed to.

Item 10. Bacon and ham per lb., 3d.
Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 2d.

Item 14. Butter and cheese, per lb., 3d.
Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 2d.

Item 22. Grain and pulse, n.e.i., per cental, 1s. 6d.

Request again made.—That wheat be added to the list of special exemptions.

Item 23. Grain and pulse, prepared or manufactured per cental, 2s. 6d.

Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 1s. 6d.

Item 24. Hay and chaff, 1s. per cwt.

Request again made.—That hay and chaff be added to the list of special exemptions.

Item 46. Rice. n.e.i., per cental, 6s.

Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 5s.

Item 58. Apparel and attire. woollen and silk ad valorem, 25 per cent.

Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 20 per cent.

Item 63. Hats and caps: men's, women's, boys', and children's felt hats ad valorem, 30 per cent.

Request again made.—That the duty be reduced to 25 per cent.

Motion (by Mr. KINGSTON) proposed—

That the amendments requested be not made.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The request that the duty upon bacon and hams should be reduced from 3d. to 2d. per lb. is a reasonable one, and it cannot be claimed that it is intended to unduly reduce the protection now granted to those engaged in producing these articles within the Commonwealth. It is unreasonable to dismiss requests of this kind without the slightest discussion. In connexion with the item "grain and pulse" we are asked to place wheat on the free list, and I cannot understand how honorable members who represent city constituencies will be able to justify their action in supporting the imposition of a duty which can only prove effectual in times of drought and scarcity. In connexion with the item "hay and chaff," we have had ample testimony as to the pernicious effects of a duty upon this commodity, and the refusal of the Government to make any alteration in response to the requests of the Senate, shows that they are utterly destitute of the spirit of compromise which should characterize our dealings with the other Chamber. If I were a member of the Senate, and that body were treated in the contemptuous manner that marks the attitude of the Ministry at present, I should soon let the Government know the exact place the Senate occupies in our Constitution.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—How far do the Government intend going on with this matter? I object to finishing to-night. There will be ample time to-morrow. I have been in Melbourne nearly eighteen months consulting the convenience of the Victorians and others who are able to get to their homes every week-end. I am satisfied to sit till eleven o'clock, but we have been here long enough now. I do not see the wisdom of sitting late now in order that we may have a holiday next week.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is no chance of that.

Mr. MAHON.—It has been stated, on behalf of the Government, that, if a certain stage were reached by Friday, there might be an adjournment over next week. I object to that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am afraid we cannot agree to it.

Mr. MAHON.—The Government have frequently promised honorable members an opportunity of discussing private members' business. That has not been done yet. I do not like to be unpleasant, but I must insist that we shall not go on any further this evening.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I must make a protest against what I regard as a strange proceeding on the part of the Government in connexion with this matter. They pay no regard to the primary requirements of the people in regard to articles upon which there are duties ranging from 50 to 75 per cent., whilst with regard to secondary necessities they propose to compromise. There appears to be no common sense in proceedings of that kind. I protest against insisting upon high duties on flour and the clothing of the people.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—The request of the honorable member for Coolgardie is a reasonable one. We have been engaged all the afternoon in discussing constitutional points, largely from the legal standpoint, and now we are asked to go on with these items seriatim. This is not a reasonable way to deal with the requests which have come to us from the Senate. We want to have an opportunity of fairly considering the requests that have been made, and to see whether it is not possible to meet the wishes of another place. We must all recognise that the Tariff is now a matter for compromise. We are endeavouring to reach a position of agreement. I trust the Government will not push the matter to the extreme of requiring the committee to deal with the whole of the details to-night.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I do not wish to detain the committee, but I cannot resist the temptation of entering my protest against the way in which the Government have treated the requests of the Senate. I was under the impression that Ministers would propose substantial reductions with regard to mining and agricultural machinery, and would have shown a desire to meet the wishes of the Senate. So far as the Opposition are concerned they have, time after time, endeavoured to secure reductions and have been defeated. I recognise that, in view of that fact, and considering the temper of the committee, it is hardly possible for us to obtain further reductions, but, at the same time, I cannot help expressing my regret that the Government have had so little regard to the interests of the primary producers of the country, and have paid so little attention to the suggestions which have been made. I feel, with the acting leader of the Opposition, that our task is hopeless as we are in a minority, and that all we can do is to enter our protest against the action of the Government, and to hope that wiser counsels will prevail, if not at this stage, later on.

Mr. SAWERS (New England).—I wish to know whether I can move that the operation of the duty on hay and chaff be deferred until 1st January, 1903?

The CHAIRMAN.—To suit the convenience of the honorable member, I will put the items seriatim.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I can quite understand that some honorable members do not like this matter to be discussed, although they know that there is a ring of millers who have bought up all the wheat beforehand, and that not a single farmer is benefited by the duty, whilst the rate on flour of £2 15s. a ton has raised the price of bread to the people. They look upon that fact with pleasure, because the members of the ring are putting money into their own pockets. The Minister for Trade and Customs cries in effect—"In the name of all that is good and merciful give the ring a chance of making money out of the necessities of the people." I protest against the Ministerial proposal. In my judgment we might reasonably accede to the requests of the Senate in regard to reduced duties upon bacon and hams and wheat. The drought which has prevailed all over Australia has worked almost irreparable injury. As honorable members are aware, it will be impossible for us to harvest any wheat until January or February next; consequently the duty of 1s. 6d. per cental upon that commodity will affect the food supplies of the people for the next four months. Similarly with regard to grain and pulse prepared or manufactured, n.e.i., I think that we might well accept the reduced duty requested by the other Chamber.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I am prepared to allow the duties upon bacon and ham and butter and cheese to pass unchallenged, but I cannot take up the same position in respect of wheat. I think it will be admitted that under normal conditions a tax of 1s. 6d. per cental upon wheat will not operate within the Commonwealth. In an ordinary season the farmers grow more than sufficient for the requirements of our people, and are compelled to export their surplus to other parts of the world. But throughout the entire Commonwealth, and particularly in New South Wales and Queensland, we have recently been experiencing an abnormally dry season, and although the outlook has considerably improved within the last week, the crops are still in a very backward condition. The prospect for the farmers is a very gloomy one indeed, particularly in New South Wales. I feel satisfied that instead of that State being in a position to export wheat, as heretofore, it will be compelled to import it for the purpose of providing food supplies for its people. Indeed I believe that the drought has been so general throughout Australia that within the next year it will be necessary for the Commonwealth to import wheat for its own requirements. In the face of such an outlook, is it reasonable to levy the heavy duty proposed upon the general consumer? I protest against the attitude of the Government in refusing to accede to the reasonable request of the Senate. If they are not prepared to do that, they might at least agree to a compromise. Certainly a duty of 1s. 6d. per cental upon wheat is an excessive one.

Mr. THOMSON (North Sydney).—We have fought this question to the last ditch, and the fact that we have been unsuccessful does not imply any slight upon honorable members upon this side of the Chamber; indeed I regard it rather as a compliment.

Every inch of the ground has been fought, and previous divisions upon these very proposals have proved that we cannot get more concessions than we have already secured. The matter, therefore, must now rest between the Government and a majority in the Senate. That being so, I do not think that we need repeat any of the arguments used upon former occasions. If any honorable member feels particularly strong upon any item it would be wise for him to call for a division without debate.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN (Wentworth).—If the honorable member for Canobolas so desires he can test this matter by moving for a reduction in the duty proposed, and calling for a division.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I do not think that the present is an opportune time to impose heavy taxation upon the food-stuffs of the people. What is the price of bacon and hams in Melbourne to-day? If the working man wants a piece of bacon he has to pay 1s. 3d. per lb. for it.

Mr. SALMON.—The very best bacon in Melbourne can be obtained retail for 1s. 2d. per lb.

Mr. MAHON.—From 1s. 2d. to 1s. 3d. I can produce a receipt showing that 1s. 3d. per lb. has been paid in the small retail shops.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

VICTORIAN AGRICULTURAL SHOW.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—Will the Prime Minister arrange that the House adjourn until seven o'clock to-morrow night? The Royal Agricultural Show to be held at Flemington to-morrow is the principal show of the kind in Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The principal show in Australia is to be held in Sydney next April.

Mr. CROUCH.—The agricultural industry is the most important in the Commonwealth. If honorable members do attend the House not much business can be done, because the holiday feeling is in the air; and I would remind South Australian and New South Wales representatives that time after time the House has been adjourned on Thursdays, and at other times, in order to suit their convenience.

Mr. DRAKE.—I regret to say that I must ask the House to meet at half-past two, as usual.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 11.19 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 4 September, 1902.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers :—

Australian Foodstuffs and Horses for the use of the Admiralty and War Office.

Ordered to be printed.

Public Telegraph or Telephone Lines: New Regulations Customs Act 1901: Regulations.

RETIREMENT OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I desire to draw the attention of the Vice-President of the Executive Council to the fact that yesterday I had on the business-paper two sets of questions having reference to the retirement of officers of the partially-paid and volunteer forces in New South Wales, and that the answer I received to the first set evidently refers to the second set. Perhaps he will look into the matter.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Yes.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS BILL.

Bill read a third time.

PACIFIC ISLAND LABOURERS ACT

Senator WALKER asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Is the Government aware that a petition, said to be signed by 3,000 South Sea Islanders residing in Queensland, has been forwarded through the Governor of Queensland to His Majesty the King, asking, on humanitarian grounds, that some action may be taken to modify the deportation clauses of the Pacific Islands Labourers Act of 1901?

2. If the Government has cognizance of such petition having gone forward; and, if correspondence has taken place thereanent between the Government and the State Government of Queensland, or between the Government and the Home authorities, will the Government take steps to cause a précis of such correspondence to be placed on the table?

3. Have the Government a copy of the petition; and, if so, will they take the necessary steps to cause it to be laid on the table?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow :—

1. It is so stated.

2. The Government has no cognizance of such petition having gone forward. The Government has had no correspondence with respect to it.

3. The Government has no copy of the petition.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Senator HIGGS asked the Vice-President of the Executive Council, upon notice—

1. Has the Acting Premier observed the following cablegram in the Melbourne Argus of the 1st of September :—

THE COMMONWEALTH.

Governor-General's Salary.—Statement by the Times.

London, 1st September.

The Times, this morning, commenting upon the return to his home of the Earl of Hopetoun, refers to the circumstances which led up to his recall from the Commonwealth. If Australia, it says, is reluctant to provide a salary proportionate to the vice-regal magnificence expected, it may be necessary to appoint an eminent person whose qualifications do not include a large private fortune, and whose expenditure will be conditioned by his salary.

2. Is there, in the opinion of the Federal Government, any reason for the London Times to suppose that the people of the Australian Commonwealth expect "vice-regal magnificence" in a Governor-General?

3. Will the Federal Government repudiate the Times' suggestion, and the innuendo contained therein, that Australians desire the appointment of a Governor-General whose qualifications include a large private fortune?

4. Is it not true that the people of Australia, paying, as they do, a salary of £10,000 per annum, will be satisfied with a Governor-General without private means, provided he be in other respects—i.e., in intelligence, education, experience, and character—a suitable person?

Senator O'CONNOR.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow :—

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. The Government do not think it necessary to take any such action.

4. Yes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I desire to call the attention of Senator O'Connor to the order of Government business, and to ask him whether it is desirable that the consideration of the House of Representatives' amendments in the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should be interposed in the middle of the debate on an amendment to clause 151 of the Electoral Bill? I would suggest to him whether it would not be better to dispose of that amendment in the Electoral Bill than to proceed to consider the amendments in the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill with the effect of postponing the consideration of the amendments in the other Bill perhaps indefinitely.

Senator O'CONNOR (New South Wales—Vice-President of the Executive Council).—The Government think it desirable that the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should become law at the earliest possible moment, and as they have to consider some amendments of the other House they propose to take that measure first, and then to resume the consideration of the amendments in the Electoral Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I move—

That Order of the Day No. 2 be postponed until after the consideration of Order of the Day No. 3.

The reasons I mentioned just now are those which I offer for submitting this motion. We were practically at the end of a debate, which had occupied a long time, on a very important amendment to a clause of the Electoral Bill, and most honorable senators have come prepared to deal with it. Our minds are full of that question, and it would be well to have it settled at the earliest possible moment. I quite appreciate what Senator O'Connor said as to the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, and I have no objection to the amendments in that measure being considered after clause 151 of the Electoral Bill has been dealt with. We ought to get off with the old love, so to speak, before we are on with the new.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Senator Symon has adopted the unusual course of making a motion which, if carried, will have the effect of taking the control of business out of the hands of the Government. No doubt he thinks he can do that, but I certainly shall oppose any such proposition. The Government have the responsibility of arranging the business on the notice-paper, and my honorable colleague and myself, after considering the whole position, have given precedence to the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. Last night we were engaged in discussing a very important amendment to clause 151 of the Electoral Bill. We had not got to near the end of the debate, for I take it that there are several honorable senators who wish to speak. Certainly there will be a good deal more discussion before the question is decided, and that was the reason why progress was reported last night. We might very well have continued sitting last night if there had been any probability of finishing the debate within a reasonable time, but there was not. If there was any prospect that by dealing first with the Electoral Bill we could complete our consideration of the amendments and return the measure to the other House, there might be some reason in the suggestion of my honorable and learned friend, but there is no chance of that being done. It will necessarily take some hours yet to discuss the remaining amendments in the Electoral Bill. Several important questions have yet to be considered, and the probability is that it will take some hours, if not the whole of this sitting—it may be longer—to conclude the consideration of the amendments. The honorable and learned senator supposes that we are to plunge into a long discussion.

Senator FRASER.—Dispose of the clause.

Senator O'CONNOR.—We shall not dispose of the clause at present unless a majority of the Senate compels us to do so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If the honorable and learned senator will agree to dispose of the clause, I do not wish to press the motion.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Certainly not. If the honorable and learned senator thinks that he can take the control of the business out of the hands of the Government, he had better do it, but I shall not consent to it. The Postmaster-General assures me that it ought not to take very long to deal with the amendments of the other House in the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Oh, yes, it will!

Senator O'CONNOR.—My honorable and learned colleague is, I think, just as good an authority—perhaps very much better on that point—as is the honorable senator. He tells me that it will not take more than a couple of hours to deal with the amendments.

Senator PULSFORD.—It would not take more than ten minutes if we swallowed them at once.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Even if it should take the whole evening, surely a measure which involves very important questions, and affects the business of persons all over the Commonwealth, ought to be dealt with at the earliest possible moment. Exercising our judgment, we say that it ought to be considered and returned to the other House, and then we shall be in a position to go on with the Electoral Bill. I cannot understand the anxiety of Senator Symon to proceed with the Electoral Bill at once. There must be some tactical reason behind his motion. Probably he is afraid that he may lose some votes if it is not proceeded with at once. Probably he thinks that there is some party or tactical advantage to be gained by taking this course. Otherwise he has offered no reason in support of his proposal. If the Senate were to adopt his view, and, in order to give him some tactical advantage in the matter of the Electoral Bill, it were to delay the completion of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, it would be allowing itself to be made a tool of for the party purposes of honorable senators, who wish to defeat the proposals of the Government. I object to the motion.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). — I hope that Senator Symon will see the wisdom of withdrawing his motion. I do not think that he has any sinister object in taking this course. I think it has been taken without very much thought on his part. I know that a number of honorable senators are desirous of debating the question at considerable length. If the Senate had been of opinion that the matter under discussion last night would be ended quickly, the sitting would have been extended beyond ten o'clock. The Post and Telegraph Rates Bill is not of so contentious a character as the Electoral Bill, and as the business of the country really requires the passage of the measure, it is desirable that its machinery should be put into operation immediately. There is no need to pass the Electoral Bill so quickly, because some time will elapse before there will be any necessity for putting it into operation. Every one hopes that the death or resignation of a Member of Parliament will not necessitate an election in the near future. I, therefore, request Senator Symon to withdraw his motion, and let us get through with the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill as soon as possible.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania). — It seems to me that the Vice-President of the Executive Council has adopted tactics which he has used before, and has offered criticisms upon matters which were not touched upon by Senator Symon. Our position is that, as we have reached a certain stage in the discussion of one of the clauses in the Electoral Bill, it is a fit and proper thing to finish that discussion before we take up new business. When the Electoral Bill was first introduced we were told that it was a matter of extreme urgency. I did not share that belief, but I made no undue attempt to burke it. My conscience is clear on that point. What is now proposed is far more likely to delay the passage of the measure than anything which has previously occurred. There has been so much delay in connexion with the Electoral Bill that it may now be regarded as urgent that it should become law as soon as possible. We now find, however, that those honorable senators who were formerly so anxious to have the measure passed are doubtful about it, because in its present form the Bill is not so pleasant as they thought it was going to be.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland). — I hasten to relieve the troubled conscience of Senator Clemons, and to assure him that my own conscience is quite clear in connexion with the Electoral Bill. I have no qualms in determining to support the Government on this occasion. If Senator Symon's motion is carried it will be a distinct vote of censure upon the Government. If a similar motion were carried in the House of Representatives, the Government would have to tender their resignation; and, although that course would not be followed in the Senate, the carrying of the motion would be a distinct expression of opinion that the representatives of the Government were not fit to direct the conduct of business. I am aware of no reason that would justify honorable senators in taking such action. Therefore, if for no other reason, I urge honorable senators, whether they believe in the policy of the Government or not, certainly not to take extreme action of the kind proposed.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania). — I hope that the motion proposed by the leader of the Opposition will not be passed. There is one particular reason why the order of business laid down by the Government should be followed. In the first place, the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill was passed by the Senate some months back, and was sent to another place. After a delay it has been dealt with by them. Undoubtedly the people of Australia are waiting for a final settlement of the matter. At present we have a variety of postal and telegraphic rates prevailing in the different States. In the interests of the commercial community and the people generally it is desirable that uniform rates should be adopted as early as possible. No doubt it is also desirable that we should have a uniform electoral law. Senator Clemons, however, is hardly correct in his criticism of the desire of some honorable senators to have the Electoral Bill dealt with at an early stage. The question is not whether we shall get the Electoral Bill through quickly, but whether that Bill shall be passed this session or not. The people of Australia are not waiting for a uniform electoral law as they are for uniform postal and telegraph rates. I hope that that Bill will very soon be placed upon the statute-book, in order that the people may be enabled to reap the benefit of amalgamation in the postal and telegraphic system of the Commonwealth.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales).—We were assured earlier in the session that it was a matter of extreme urgency that the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should become law at the earliest possible date. Notwithstanding that, I find that the Bill was reported with amendments from the committee of the Senate on the 11th December, 1901. That is to say, more than nine months ago this Bill was dealt with, and sent to the other Chamber, where the Government have dilly-dallied with it. Since then, I believe, it has been much improved. Now that it has been returned to the Senate, the Vice-President of the Executive Council is seized with an earnest desire to have it made law immediately. Certainly, as it has been on the stocks for about a year, it is about time that it should become law, but there is no reason why it should be passed at the expense of the Electoral Bill, which, when it was previously before us, was also said to be a matter of urgent importance. The fact appears to be that, in consequence of certain amendments which have been made in the Electoral Bill, some honorable senators, who formerly were very anxious that it should become law, have grown very luke-warm, and do not want it to be passed in the shape it will assume after it has been dealt with by the Senate. Why has not Senator O'Connor given us some reasons for postponing the Electoral Bill, instead of saying merely that the Government desire to postpone it? I have not yet seen the amendments to the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. Honorable senators have not yet got the Bill in its amended form upon their files. Is it a fair thing to call upon us to deal with that measure before we have the amendments brought under our notice? Why not give a reasonable time for the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives, so as to allow honorable senators to make up their minds concerning them?

Senator DRAKE.—They were circulated days ago.

Senator Major GOULD.—The message was only sent up from another place yesterday. Has any honorable senator seen a copy of the Bill as amended?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD. — I received a copy this morning.

Senator Major GOULD.—And we are called upon to consider it this afternoon, although there is other business which might well be taken first. It is most unreasonable for the Government to try and push the Senate into this position. We should have the fullest opportunity to consider every measure brought forward. We should not have a Bill like this called on at a moment's notice, and be compelled to run the risk of passing a clause which, upon full consideration, we might consider undesirable.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I cannot understand the impetuosity of certain honorable senators, having regard to the attitude adopted by them when the Electoral Bill was first brought before the Senate. I remember that on that occasion Senator Symon inquired with great earnestness whether the Government expected to pass it, and it was said that there was no possibility of it becoming law. Some honorable senators of the Opposition wished it at the bottom of the sea; but because they have succeeded in striking out of it an important provision relating to proportional representation and in modifying it in other directions—and because they see victory within their grasp—they are now anxious that it should not be delayed. They desire to at once obtain the benefit of it. I can understand the anxiety manifested by Senator Clemons, but I cannot account for such youthful enthusiasm on the part of a mature politician like Senator Symon, who has not suffered by delay to the same extent as Senator Clemons has done. He knows the dangers of delay, and wants to see the clause relating to plumping settled at once. Men may change their minds, and the honorable and learned senator may have reason to return to Tasmania before the Bill is finally dealt with.

Senator CLEMONS.—No.

Senator HIGGS.—He has counted heads and knows there are twenty honorable senators who will not say another word in regard to clause 151 if we at once proceed with it. Therefore, he is anxious that it should be taken at once. One fine afternoon Senator Clemons, seeing that everything in the garden was lovely, went away to Tasmania, and during his absence the Senate did the right thing. I do not see that either Senator Clemons, or Senator Symon, have any reason to fear the passage of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. No doubt, if we take it now, it will occasion a delay of one or two days in dealing with the Electoral Bill, but the Opposition have the numbers with them, and surely they ought to be satisfied to wait. We are not in a hurry to see the plumping clause put under the guillotine, and we are very glad that the Government find it necessary to take the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill first. A vote of censure would not count for much in this House, but still there is a means of destroying the prestige of the Government, and that means is in the hands of the Opposition.

Senator FRASER.—The Government's prestige is already destroyed.

Senator HIGGS.—That is the honorable senator's opinion.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Hands off property.

Senator HIGGS.—There is no necessity for us to aid Senator Symon in his desire to besmirch the good name and honesty of the Government by this means. Apparently, we have plenty of time before us; and as we have been here already for nearly sixteen months, there is no occasion for any violent hurry.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I complain that the Government have taken the Senate by surprise. Honorable senators came here this afternoon, believing that the debate on clause 151 of the Electoral Bill would be continued, and I think the Senate has a right to complain. I came here at great personal inconvenience, and, possibly, loss, in order to conclude the debate upon that clause; but the Government wish to break in upon that debate, which had nearly been concluded when we adjourned last night. The Government, knowing perfectly well that there is a large majority against them, have done what very many Governments do — they have changed their tactics. They have set down another measure for consideration prior to that which was so hotly discussed last night, and which should have been dealt with immediately the Senate met this afternoon. If clause 151 of the Electoral Bill were disposed of, I do not think that the remainder of the amendments would occupy our attention for any length of time. Therefore, I contend that the Government, and not the Opposition, are to blame for the confusion which has occurred. When the Bill was first before us, clause 151 was debated for some time; then the measure was sent to the House of Representatives, where it was further discussed, and now that the Bill has been returned, and the Government know that they have a large majority against them, they wish to change their tactics. That is not honorable. It is not fair to the Senate. I object to the course proposed by the Government, and I simply interjected, while another honorable senator was speaking, that the Government should be compelled to do what they ought to have done without any request being made.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—I have not been in Parliament for as many months as the years during which Senator Symon has been a member, but I have always understood that a motion of the kind now before us was certainly a vote of censure on the Government. That is the light in which I view it, and if Senator Symon were the leader of the Government, and I were one of his supporters, I should certainly vote as I intend to vote now. The consideration that the motion is practically one of censure is the only one which will prompt me to vote as I intend to do. The question of whether the Electoral Bill or the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill is the more important is a minor matter. The Government propose to change the order of business, and although it may be very inconvenient to some honorable senators, and especially to Senator Fraser, to attend here, I would remind the honorable senator that there are others who also suffer inconvenience and personal loss by being kept here month after month. I cannot regard this motion in any light other than that in which it is viewed by Senator Dawson and several others who have spoken in a variety of postal and telegraphic rates prevailing in the different States. In the interests of the commercial community and the people generally it is desirable that uniform rates should be adopted as early as possible. No doubt it is also desirable that we should have a uniform electoral law. Senator Clemons, however, is hardly correct in his criticism of the desire of some honorable senators to have the Electoral Bill dealt with at an early stage. The question is not whether we shall get the Electoral Bill through quickly, but whether that Bill shall be passed this session or not. The people of Australia are not waiting for a uniform electoral law as they are for uniform postal and telegraph rates. I hope that that Bill will very soon be placed upon the statute-book, in order that the people may be enabled to reap the benefit of amalgamation in the postal and telegraphic system of the Commonwealth.

Senator Major GOULD (New South Wales).—We were assured earlier in the session that it was a matter of extreme urgency that the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should become law at the earliest possible date. Notwithstanding that, I find that the Bill was reported with amendments from the committee of the Senate on the 11th December, 1901. That is to say, more than nine months ago this Bill was dealt with, and sent to the other Chamber, where the Government have dilly-dallied with it. Since then, I believe, it has been much improved. Now that it has been returned to the Senate, the Vice-President of the Executive Council is seized with an earnest desire to have it made law immediately. Certainly, as it has been on the stocks for about a year, it is about time that it should become law, but there is no reason why it should be passed at the expense of the Electoral Bill, which, when it was previously before us, was also said to be a matter of urgent importance. The fact appears to be that, in consequence of certain amendments which have been made in the Electoral Bill, some honorable senators, who formerly were very anxious that it should become law, have grown very luke-warm, and do not want it to be passed in the shape it will assume after it has been dealt with by the Senate. Why has not Senator O'Connor given us some reasons for postponing the Electoral Bill, instead of saying merely that the Government desire to postpone it? I have not yet seen the amendments to the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. Honorable senators have not yet got the Bill in its amended form upon their files. Is it a fair thing to call upon us to deal with that measure before we have the amendments brought under our notice? Why not give a reasonable time for the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives, so as to allow honorable senators to make up their minds concerning them?

Senator DRAKE.—They were circulated days ago.

Senator Major GOULD.—The message was only sent up from another place yesterday. Has any honorable senator seen a copy of the Bill as amended?

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD. — I received a copy this morning.

Senator Major GOULD.—And we are called upon to consider it this afternoon, although there is other business which might well be taken first. It is most unreasonable for the Government to try and push the Senate into this position. We should have the fullest opportunity to consider every measure brought forward. We should not have a Bill like this called on at a moment's notice, and be compelled to run the risk of passing a clause which, upon full consideration, we might consider undesirable.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I cannot understand the impetuosity of certain honorable senators, having regard to the attitude adopted by them when the Electoral Bill was first brought before the Senate. I remember that on that occasion Senator Symon inquired with great earnestness whether the Government expected to pass it, and it was said that there was no possibility of it becoming law. Some honorable senators of the Opposition wished it at the bottom of the sea; but because they have succeeded in striking out of it an important provision relating to proportional representation and in modifying it in other directions—and because they see victory within their grasp—they are now anxious that it should not be delayed. They desire to at once obtain the benefit of it. I can understand the anxiety manifested by Senator Clemons, but I cannot account for such youthful enthusiasm on the part of a mature politician like Senator Symon, who has not suffered by delay to the same extent as Senator Clemons has done. He knows the dangers of delay, and wants to see the clause relating to plumping settled at once. Men may change their minds, and the honorable and learned senator may have reason to return to Tasmania before the Bill is finally dealt with.

Senator CLEMONS.—No.

Senator HIGGS.—He has counted heads and knows there are twenty honorable senators who will not say another word in regard to clause 151 if we at once proceed with it. Therefore, he is anxious that it should be taken at once. One fine afternoon Senator Clemons, seeing that everything in the garden was lovely, went away to Tasmania, and during his absence the Senate did the right thing. I do not see that either Senator Clemons, or Senator Symon, have any reason to fear the passage of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. No doubt, if we take it now, it will occasion a delay of one or two days in dealing with the Electoral Bill, but the Opposition have the numbers with them, and surely they ought to be satisfied to wait. We are not in a hurry to see the plumping clause put under the guillotine, and we are very glad that the Government find it necessary to take the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill first. A vote of censure would not count for much in this House, but still there is a means of destroying the prestige of the Government, and that means is in the hands of the Opposition.

Senator FRASER.—The Government's prestige is already destroyed.

Senator HIGGS.—That is the honorable senator's opinion.

Senator O'CONNOR.—Hands off property.

Senator HIGGS.—There is no necessity for us to aid Senator Symon in his desire to besmirch the good name and honesty of the Government by this means. Apparently, we have plenty of time before us; and as we have been here already for nearly sixteen months, there is no occasion for any violent hurry.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I complain that the Government have taken the Senate by surprise. Honorable senators came here this afternoon, believing that the debate on clause 151 of the Electoral Bill would be continued, and I think the Senate has a right to complain. I came here at great personal inconvenience, and, possibly, loss, in order to conclude the debate upon that clause; but the Government wish to break in upon that debate, which had nearly been concluded when we adjourned last night. The Government, knowing perfectly well that there is a large majority against them, have done what very many Governments do — they have changed their tactics. They have set down another measure for consideration prior to that which was so hotly discussed last night, and which should have been dealt with immediately the Senate met this afternoon. If clause 151 of the Electoral Bill were disposed of, I do not think that the remainder of the amendments would occupy our attention for any length of time. Therefore, I contend that the Government, and not the Opposition, are to blame for the confusion which has occurred. When the Bill was first before us, clause 151 was debated for some time; then the measure was sent to the House of Representatives, where it was further discussed, and now that the Bill has been returned, and the Government know that they have a large majority against them, they wish to change their tactics. That is not honorable. It is not fair to the Senate. I object to the course proposed by the Government, and I simply interjected, while another honorable senator was speaking, that the Government should be compelled to do what they ought to have done without any request being made.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—I have not been in Parliament for as many months as the years during which Senator Symon has been a member, but I have always understood that a motion of the kind now before us was certainly a vote of censure on the Government. That is the light in which I view it, and if Senator Symon were the leader of the Government, and I were one of his supporters, I should certainly vote as I intend to vote now. The consideration that the motion is practically one of censure is the only one which will prompt me to vote as I intend to do. The question of whether the Electoral Bill or the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill is the more important is a minor matter. The Government propose to change the order of business, and although it may be very inconvenient to some honorable senators, and especially to Senator Fraser, to attend here, I would remind the honorable senator that there are others who also suffer inconvenience and personal loss by being kept here month after month. I cannot regard this motion in any light other than that in which it is viewed by Senator Dawson and several others who have spoken in a similar strain, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the condition under which the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill was first introduced here. It was brought forward and pressed through the second reading and committee stages in one afternoon. The schedule showing the rates which prevail in the various States of the Commonwealth was only circulated amongst honorable senators whilst the debate was in progress. Indeed, I believe it was not distributed until after we had reached the committee stage.

Senator DRAKE.—A good many honorable senators had received it before.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is tantamount to an admission that the Senate generally did not receive those details. If Hansard is referred to, it will be found that I protested strongly against the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill being forced through under such conditions. There can be no doubt that the Bill was sent on to another place without being sufficiently considered, and that many of the amendments made by another place were very necessary. It is once more before the Senate; but, instead of having the Bill as amended, we have simply a schedule showing the amendments, and we have to compare the Bill with the schedule, in order to discover the changes which have been made. Therefore we can enter upon the consideration of the amendments of another place only with a repetition of the unsatisfactory conditions which existed when the measure was first introduced.

Senator DRAKE.—The amended Bill has been distributed.

Senator PULSFORD.—It has apparently been printed, but I have not seen a copy. Since the matter was first mentioned, I have been engaged in correcting my original copy of the Bill. In these circumstances, I think that the most reasonable course for the Vice-President of the Executive Council to pursue would be to consent to the proposal made from this side of the Senate, and to allow the business to be taken in the order which it was expected last night would be observed.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I should like to add a word or two to what has been stated by the Vice-President of the Executive Council in regard to the desirability of pressing on with this Bill. It is quite true, as has been pointed out by Senator Keating, that there is a desire throughout Australia that this Bill shall quickly become law in order that the people may enjoy the advantages of the reduced rates which it provides for. Any delay now in sending the Bill back to the other Chamber, may lead to further delay there.

Senator KEATING.—We should be collecting postage on New South Wales newspapers now.

Senator DRAKE.—I intend to say a word with regard to the New South Wales newspapers. If we miss a day or two in sending our message back to the House of Representatives, it may result in a much longer delay there, and a substantial loss to the people of Australia in being unable for the time to enjoy the lower rates provided. I have had a representation made to me from another quarter, from the representatives of the Sydney newspaper proprietors, that I should give them as long a notice as possible. But I cannot tell them when the Bill will come into force until it is passed, because it will be brought into operation by proclamation. If I now fix a date upon which to bring the Bill into operation, every day's additional delay will mean that the newspaper proprietors will have so much less notice. They are asking for as long a notice as possible upon very reasonable grounds, because they have been accustomed to the free postage of newspapers, and are consequently relying upon the Government to distribute their newspapers. As soon as this Bill becomes law, it will be necessary for them to make their own arrangements for the carriage of newspapers in parcels, and they are necessarily anxious to be given ample notice of the change. In order to meet them, I have said that I will give them as long a notice as I can, consistent with the general desire on the part of the public to obtain the advantage of the lower rates proposed. I have given instructions also that they shall be furnished with all the information available in the office to assist them in their efforts to accommodate themselves to the new state of things. I am inclined to think that the difficulty would not have been raised if it had been simply a matter of dealing with these amendments. In the first place, it has been no unusual thing for the Senate to break off the consideration of a Bill in the middle of a discussion upon a certain clause. As a matter of fact, on some occasions the discussion upon a particular clause has been adjourned again and again. If, as Senator Gould tells us, the discussion upon the particular clause of the Electoral Bill which has been referred to has already occupied two days, what guarantee can the honorable and learned senator give that it will shortly be finished? Had it not been for the fact that in conversation with one or two honorable senators I believed that there was no chance of the discussion concluding at an early hour last evening, we probably would not have adjourned the consideration of the clause as we did. If there had been any prospect of our being able to have come to a conclusion on it in half-an-hour or so, I have not the slightest doubt that we would have gone on and finished it last night.

Senator FRASER.—We were very nearly dividing last night.

Senator DRAKE.—Not at all. So far as I could observe there was no prospect of such a thing. The speeches up to ten o'clock were lengthy, and two or three honorable senators still desired to speak upon the subject.

Senator DAWSON.—I was on my feet.

Senator DRAKE.—As the honorable senator says, he was on his feet desiring to speak.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Very reluctantly, and the honorable senator had a conference with the Vice-President of the Executive Council before that.

Senator DAWSON.—No, I had not. I had no conference with any one.

Senator DRAKE.—I know that Senator Dawson was desirous of speaking, because I had seen him make the attempt to do so more than once. Senator Pulsford tells us that when this Post and Telegraph Rates Bill was previously before the Senate it went through the second reading and committee stages in one sitting. I think that is correct, and I think also that if honorable senators were in their usual business-like frame of mind they could put these amendments through in a couple of hours.

Senator PULSFORD.—I said the Bill was forced through without sufficient discussion.

Senator DRAKE.—These amendments are, to a great extent, amendments of detail, and in nearly every case the matter dealt with has been discussed over and over again.

What is proposed simply amounts to some reductions upon the rates to which we agreed when the Bill was previously before the Senate. The delay which has taken place in the other Chamber in connexion with this Bill has not been due to any slackness on the part of the Government, but to the fact that when the Bill was sent up to the House of Representatives some questions arose, and more particularly one with reference to the State of Tasmania, which required considerable negotiations before the Government were justified in deciding what course they should adopt in connexion with the Bill.

Senator KEATING.—They had to hang it up for the Premiers' Conference.

Senator DRAKE.—The Premiers' Conference had a great deal to do with it; but it was afterwards found necessary that the Government should negotiate with the Governments of the different States, and when replies had been received from them there was no delay whatever in going on with the Bill. The House of Representatives then dealt with it very expeditiously, as we did, and it went through the committee stage in that Chamber in the course of two or three hours. Now that it comes back to us, it is not, I think, unreasonable to ask the Senate to deal with it expeditiously, so that the matter may be settled and the Bill proclaimed as early as possible. I can see no difficulty in the way of doing what is proposed, and I feel that under ordinary circumstances the Senate would be prepared to consider the amendments without any delay. I hope there will be no delay upon this occasion.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD (Victoria).—We can easily understand the anxiety of the Minister in charge of this Bill to have it passed; but I ask whether it is fair to expect honorable senators to deal at once with all these amendments, not one of which I suppose has been read. I find that they were only printed yesterday, and circulated this morning. I received a copy of the amendments this morning, but so certain was I that the Bill with which we were dealing last night, would be brought on again to-day, that I did not bring my copy of the amendments upon this Bill into the Chamber.

Senator DRAKE.—It will be found that the amendments do not present any difficulty when they are explained.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Senator Drake tells us that the amendments deal with matters of detail, but I find that very important amendments have been made, and I have had no opportunity of consulting those interested in commerce to obtain their views upon them. I do not think that, under the circumstances, the honorable and learned senator will deny that it is reasonable for myself and other honorable senators to ask for time to consider these amendments. Some are of an important character, and they require considerable attention and prior inquiry. The honorable and learned senator has certainly up to the present not shown any burning anxiety to get through with this measure. Whence this new-born zeal?

Senator DRAKE.—I have never shown any slackness in pushing it on.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—I am aware that the courtesy should be extended to the Minister in charge of a Bill of allowing him to bring it on for consideration when he thinks fit. I recognise also that that courtesy is due to the Vice-President of the Executive Council in connexion with the other Bill. But in proposing so sudden a change from the consideration of one Bill to the consideration of the other, the honorable and learned senator is not consulting the convenience of the majority of the members of the Senate. I do not think that the course which has been adopted will enable us to discuss the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill as satisfactorily as we should be able to do if we were given time to look through the amendments and they were brought on for discussion on Tuesday next. I have always made it a rule in Parliament to extend the courtesy to the Minister of allowing him to deal with a Bill as he thinks best. I hope that the same courtesy will be extended in this case to the Vice-President of the Executive Council, but I do deprecate the action the honorable and learned senator has taken in suddenly interrupting the consideration of another Bill in the middle of the debate upon a very important clause in order to bring on for consideration amendments in the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, which we have never seen, and which we are now asked to consider without five minutes' notice, though they involve a considerable amount of taxation upon the public in the different States.

Senator DRAKE.—It is remission of taxation that is proposed, so far as the changes are concerned.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—The honorable and learned senator knows what amendments are proposed, and I do not.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—I always like to treat the members of the Government with due courtesy, but I think the Senate has a right to expect similar courtesy from members of the Government. I do not think that we have to-day been treated with the courtesy which is due to the Senate. This Bill comes to us now really as a stranger. We have not kept the matter in our minds, and we are asked to deal with these amendments without having had time to consider their effect upon the commercial and industrial interests of the community. Seeing that the Government have acted in this manner, I feel that in order to maintain the dignity of the Senate, we should oppose the action proposed, and if the motion is pushed to a division I shall vote for it.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—After the very direct statement of the leader of the Government in this Chamber, I am surprised that Senator Symon has not withdrawn his motion. The honorable and learned senator evidently has not considered the position in which he would place both himself and the Government.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable and learned senator has exposed the tactics of the Government at any rate.

Senator O'CONNOR.—The reason for the tactics of honorable senators opposite is obvious enough.

Senator STEWART.—If Senator Symon's motion is carried, it will take the conduct of the business of this Chamber out of the hands of the Government, and will place it entirely in the hands of the Opposition. We shall have this extraordinary state of affairs, that in one Chamber the Government will control the business, and in the other Chamber the Opposition will control it. I do not think that even Senator Symon himself can wish to bring about such an anomalous and such an unworkable state of affairs. I think that the representatives of the Government here have given very good reasons why the consideration of the Electoral Bill should be postponed at the present stage, and the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill should be taken up. Senator Clemons has reminded us that honorable senators were very urgent about pushing on the Electoral Bill at one particular portion of the session. No doubt we were, and if those of us who are anxious to see electoral reform carried, thought that by any means the Electoral Bill would be shelved, we should still be anxious to see it through. But we know that the Electoral Bill is all right, and that there is no particular urgency about it. We know that even if a member of the House of Representatives dies, even though the Bill were passed into law, the election of a successor would not take place under the Commonwealth law, but under the law of the State of which the deceased member was a representative. It will therefore be seen that there is no special urgency about the matter. On the contrary, in regard to the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, I believe that, as with the Tariff, the electors of the Commonwealth are exceedingly anxious that the telegraphic and postal rates should be settled, so that they may know exactly where they stand. We know that the Government are losing a large amount of revenue through this Bill being hung up. The newspapers of New South Wales are being carried free at present, whereas if the measure in our hands is passed, a large amount of revenue will be derived through the Postal department from that source.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And the readers of the newspapers will not pay any more.

Senator STEWART.—That is not a matter with which we are particularly concerned. There is a very strong reason why the Government should take this course. I was exceedingly surprised at the attitude taken by Senator Fraser. He said that he has come here this afternoon at great personal inconvenience, thinking that the discussion on the amendments in the Electoral Bill was to be continued. If he had chosen to be absent, I do not think that any of us in this corner would have missed him. We could have well spared him in the circumstances. He has let us see clearly what is passing in his mind. The Electoral Bill is of much more consequence to him than the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. He inconvenienced himself very much to attend this afternoon—no doubt to vote against what he regards as some of the too liberal provisions in the Electoral Bill. Before he stood for election to the Senate he should have considered all these matters. If he thought that he could not attend to the public business without loss and inconvenience to himself he should have remained in private life. It is out of place for honorable senators to say that they come here at inconvenience to themselves. Supposing that one of Senator Fraser's workmen said to him one morning that he had come to work at great inconvenience to himself, what would he say?

Senator FRASER.—I would let him go if I could.

Senator STEWART.—The honorable senator would simply say—"You can go about your business. I do not want a man who only comes along when it pleases him."

Senator FRASER.—Not at all.

Senator STEWART.—That is exactly the position in which the honorable senator is. He is doing things which he would not tolerate for an instant in an employé. He comes here when he pleases himself; he remains absent when he pleases himself, and I suppose he draws his money all the time.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that his remarks are relevant to the question?

Senator FRASER.—He is always personal.

Senator STEWART.—Whatever loss of time has occurred this afternoon may be fairly laid at the door of the Opposition. If Senator Symon had not in this unconstitutional fashion attempted to take the business out of the hands of the Government, probably the discussion on the amendments in the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill would have been finished by now. Even if the motion is carried, where will Senator Symon be? He will not be one inch further advanced than he is. He may get a majority against the Government, but he cannot compel them to alter the business-paper. He and his supporters must see that it is their duty to allow the Government to control the order of business as it thinks proper.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (In reply).—Senator Stewart having effectually wasted the time of the Senate for about a quarter of an hour in discussing everything but the motion, even some of the private affairs of Senator Fraser, and having been called to order, I think we may fairly come to the real question, which cannot justifiably be mixed up with any consideration of courtesy or otherwise to Senator O'Connor. The motion was not moved from any motive of that kind, but, on the contrary, after a request to him, for reasons which are obvious, and which have been stated by several speakers, that the consideration of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill ought to be postponed. I have not heard one reason given why that should not have been done. The attitude which has been adopted by Ministers is neither fair nor courteous to the Senate. It is not calculated to promote the discussion of these measures; and it is not calculated to expedite the passage of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill. Senator Drake gave as a reason some extraordinary chaotic notion of his own about giving notice to the newspapers in New South Wales. What has that to do with the question of considering the Bill to-day, or on Tuesday, or Wednesday next? Absolutely nothing. It is perfectly immaterial when the Bill is finally considered. That notice, I presume, will have to be given. When we remember that the Bill, which has been long in abeyance, which, in a certain sense, has been asleep, like Rip Van Winkle, for many months, is suddenly revived without any notice, on a message from the other House, received late last night under circumstances which prevented the possibility of our having the amendments before us, or our having an opportunity to consider the print of the Bill showing the amendments, it would have been a fair and courteous thing to the Senate for Ministers to have said—"Very well, we will postpone the consideration of the Bill until the other order of the day has been disposed of." But instead of meeting us fairly in that way—and I am very glad that we have had this opportunity of protesting most emphatically against the disarrangement of the business—the paper has not been arranged for the convenience of the Senate, which is the first thing to be considered. Some honorable senators have told us, as Senator Keating did, almost with tears in his eyes, that we are taking the business out of the hands of the Government. Surely the Senate has a say in the order of business for its own convenience, and when that expression of opinion is given by the Senate it is only right that the Ministers should yield to it, and give every possible facility for the proper transaction of the business. One honorable senator said that we were besmirching the good name—I suppose he meant the political good name—of my honorable friends at the table. That was sufficiently answered by an interjection of Senator Fraser's, that there is no prestige to be besmirched. Therefore, I need say nothing further on that ground. I am also told that the motion, if carried, would be equivalent to a vote of censure. I have not the least wish to pass any censure on the Government, and I certainly have no desire to take the control of business out of their hands, but I do submit that the Senate should express very emphatically its opinion, as it has done, about such an arrangement of the business as precludes the possibility of continuity in the consideration of questions. Senator Drake has referred to the debate last night on an amendment to clause 151 of the Electoral Bill. All the stuffing was knocked out of it by the speech of Senator Playford. There was not a squeak, if I may use a common expression, in the supporters of plumping after that speech was delivered. I entirely disagree with the contention of Senator Drake that the debate was not nearly finished last night, that it might have been continued for a considerable time, and that if resumed to-day it might have continued much longer. I venture to say that if resumed to-day it would have been concluded in the briefest possible time, because all the stuffing was knocked out of it last night by the speech of Senator Playford, as is admitted by Senator Higgs, who says that he is agreeable to the interposition of the Post and Telegraph Rates Bill, because it will delay the fall of the guillotine on the plumping proposal for a few days longer. Senator O'Connor said that I had some tactical reason for submitting this motion. I had none whatever. It is conceded on all hands that there is a big majority against plumping. If anything in the way of tactics has been introduced it has been by Senator O'Connor and his friends, who are supporting the plumping amendment. They are in terror of the immediate determination of the question by the Senate, and they hope that by a few days' delay they may be able to change the opinion of some absentees with the view of perhaps snatching a catch verdict.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There is no foundation for that statement.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have a far better authority for the statement than my honorable and learned friend had for his sneer about my motive being a tactical one, with the view of securing votes in favour of my contention. I have the authority of Senator Higgs, who rejoices that the consideration of the Electoral Bill will be put off for another day or two to save the guillotine from descending on the plumping proposal. When my honorable and learned friend says that I have no foundation for my statement, I reply that I have the foundation of his own suggestion to me, and the foundation of his supporter, Senator Higgs, who supports the idea of plumping.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I am not responsible for his conduct.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable and learned friend is not responsible for the view of Senator Higgs, but when he says we are submitting this motion for a tactical reason, I invite him to consider what his supporter says, who is largely interested in the question of plumping. I have no wish to increase the load of censure always resting on the Government. I do not wish to add one straw to that load on their backs; therefore I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Senator HIGGS.—I object.

POST AND TELEGRAPH RATES BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of the House of Representatives' amendments):

Amendment in clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Rates to be paid on Government correspondence).

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—The committee is aware that a request was made some time ago by the Queensland Government that telegraph messages with regard to meteorological information should be allowed to pass over the wires in that State free for a certain period. The matter was very carefully considered, and seeing that the Meteorological department in Queensland, under Mr. Wragge, had been in the habit of publishing weather forecasts, which were highly valued throughout Australia, it was considered that it would be almost a public misfortune if that work should suddenly cease. The Queensland Government proposed to subsidize Mr. Wragge's work to a considerable extent, and they requested that telegrams might be permitted to be carried free. It was arranged to allow the telegrams to go free to the extent of £3,500 per annum, pending the passing of this Bill. The amendment carried in the House of Representatives provides that, subject to regulations, meteorological telegrams may be transmitted without charge, until the establishment of a Commonwealth Meteorological department. The arrangement is of a temporary nature, and I think that no one, who knows the value of the work done by Mr. Wragge, will dispute the fact that public service will be rendered by allowing his messages to be transmitted without charge. I move—

That the committee agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives adding the words—
“Subject to such regulations as the Government may prescribe, telegrams may be transmitted without charge on behalf of the Meteorological department of, or subsidized by a State until the establishment of a Commonwealth Meteorological department.”

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—No one is more sensible than I am of the value of the meteorological institutions established in Australia. They are admirable, and render great services to the community. But that is no reason why they should be permitted to send their telegrams free. We have had some experience of the extravagance that is possible in a department of this character in Queensland, where a very large portion of the time of the telegraph officers was taken up in transmitting for the Meteorological department messages for which no money was paid. We, as a Commonwealth Parliament, are responsible for the carrying on of the Post and Telegraph department. The public look to us to see that this department shall be carried on at a profit, or, if there must be a loss, at as little cost to the community as possible.

My contention is that the department should be paid for any services rendered. In the case of services rendered to a State it would be a mere matter of bookkeeping to carry out what I suggest, and no money payments would be made. But so far as the Commonwealth is concerned the aspect of the question is entirely different. If there is a large deficit in the postal and telegraphic revenue at the end of the year the States will accuse us of extravagance. They will not take into consideration the fact that a very great amount of business has been done for them by the department free of cost. The best plan both in the interests of the States themselves and of the Commonwealth would be to place the department on a business footing. Let it be paid for any telegrams despatched in the ordinary way and at the ordinary rates. Then we shall have an exact account of the services rendered to the public by the department, and what they cost the various States.

Motion agreed to.

Senator DRAKE.—I move—

That the committee agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives inserting the following new clause:—

“7A. All Braille and Moon postal articles shall be conveyed without charge, under departmental regulations.”

The object of this new clause is to allow what are called Braille and Moon publications to be sent through the post without charge. These publications are issued for the use of the blind. They consist of pricked-out sheets of paper, prepared often by persons who do the work voluntarily, containing passages of literature which the blind people are able to read by touch. In the past these publications have been permitted to go through the post as newspapers. Strictly speaking, however, they are not newspapers, and difficulties may arise if we continue that plan in the future. The idea now is that the sheets shall go through the post free. The sum involved is quite inconsiderable. I am informed that it amounted to something like £100 in Victoria.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I must again raise my protest against this method of doing business. I have no objection to every consideration being offered to the blind, but I fear that if a certain privilege is given to one portion of the public, various other sections will demand similar privileges. In the end we shall find ourselves in exactly the same position as that into which the Victorian Post and Telegraph department got before federation. A very large amount of the work of the department will be done for nothing in the interest of a number of institutions.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—We are not aware of it in Victoria.

Senator STEWART.—Many things have been done in Victoria of which the honorable senator knows nothing. If he had known, probably he would have taken steps to stop them. If Senator Zeal will visit the office of the Postmaster-General, and ask him for particulars of the amount of franking that was done in Victoria before the Commonwealth took over the department, I believe he will be astonished.

Senator Sir FREDERICK SARGOOD.—Hear, hear.

Senator STEWART.—I am not objecting to what is being done in the interests of the blind, but I am afraid what is proposed will be taken as a precedent. The Postal department will be assailed from every quarter with demands for similar privileges. I hold that the department should do nothing for nothing. It ought to be paid in some way or other for every service performed for the public. There should be no franking.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

NEWSPAPERS.

On all newspapers posted (without condition as to the number contained in each addressed wrapper), by registered newspaper proprietors, or by newsvendors, or returned by an agent or newsvendor to the publishing office.—One penny per lb., on the aggregate weight of newspapers so posted by any one person at any one time.

On all other newspapers posted within the Commonwealth for transmission therein.—For each newspaper—One halfpenny per 8 ozs., or fraction of 8 ozs., avoirdupois weight.

Senator DRAKE.—I move—

That the committee agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives inserting after the word “posted,” line 1, the words “for delivery within the Commonwealth.”

The object of the first amendment is to meet the criticism that without these words the newspaper rate might be taken to apply to newspapers published outside the Commonwealth. They are dealt with by international agreement.

Motion agreed to.

Senator DRAKE.—I move—

That the committee agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives omitting the word “lb.,” line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words “20 ozs.”

This amendment is of importance, and I should like to explain clearly how the matter stands. Honorable senators are aware that at the present time a charge is made for the postage of newspapers through the Postal department in three States, while in the other three they are carried free of charge. In the three States, in which a charge is made the rate is $\frac{1}{2}$ d. up to 10 ozs. The amendment which I have introduced in the Bill, and which will be of great relief to newspaper proprietors in the States where a charge is made, provides for the carriage of newspapers in bulk at 1d. per lb., delivering them separately, so that eight copies of a newspaper, weighing 2 ozs., would go for 1d. But in proposing that rate I could not consistently allow a newspaper weighing more than 8 ozs. to go through the post for $\frac{1}{2}$ d., as it had gone before. The matter gave me considerable anxiety, because I was anxious to introduce what would be a very low rate for newspapers weighing only 2 or 3 ozs.; and, at the same time, I was not desirous of increasing any rate. I found that there was a very strong feeling against any increase, much stronger than I thought to be the case in the first instance; and, therefore, I was in this position, that either it was necessary to still further reduce the rate of 1d. per lb., or else charge a higher rate than we had charged before for newspapers weighing over 10 ozs. The amendment reduces the rate from 1d. per lb. to 20 ozs. for 1d. By carrying $1\frac{1}{4}$ lbs. for 1d., and charging by weight, we impose a still lower rate for the very light newspapers, while we enable the heavy newspapers to be carried at the same rate of postage as before. The amendment will enable a newspaper weighing over 8 ozs. to be carried as before for $\frac{1}{2}$ d., but it will make the rate lower than it was before to proprietors of the smaller newspapers. It means, of course, a certain loss of revenue. I have considered the matter, and although I can form only a rough estimate, I think we shall be able to bear the loss. In accepting this amendment, I have been influenced by the consideration, more than any other, that although it will mean a reduction of the rates in the States which have been paying newspaper postage before, we must, having regard to those States in which no charge has been made, make the rate now proposed as moderate as we can, consistently with the proper administration of the finances of the Post and Telegraph department. I hope the committee understand that under this Bill we shall derive a considerably larger amount of revenue from the carriage of newspapers than in the past, because we shall make a charge in the States where newspapers have hitherto been carried free.
